But Exxon Mobil may prove more resistant. According to the notices, the attorney general's office recently approached the company and asked it to take responsibility for stopping continuing leaks at one of two sites it owns. The company declined, the documents state, and Mr. Hernan predicted that it would fight the new action in court.

"Our expectations are not high," he said.

Global Warming Smear (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Mark Twain once complained that a lie can make it half way around the world before the truth gets its boots on. That's been the case of late in the climate change debate, as political and media activists attempt to stigmatize anyone who doesn't pay homage to their "scientific consensus."

Last week the London Guardian published a story headlined, "Scientists Offer Cash to Dispute Climate Study." The story alleges that the American Enterprise Institute (AEI), a conservative-leaning think tank in Washington, collected contributions from ExxonMobil and then offered climate scholars $10,000 so they could lobby against global warming legislation.

Another newspaper, the British Independent, picked up on the story and claimed: "It has come to light that one of the world's largest oil companies, ExxonMobil, is attempting to bribe scientists to pick holes in the IPCC's assessment." (The IPCC is the United Nations climate-change panel.)

It would be easy to dismiss all this as propaganda from British tabloids, except that a few days ago the "news" crossed the Atlantic where more respectable media outlets, including the Washington Post, are reporting the story in what has become all too typical pack fashion. A CNNMoney.com report offered that, "A think tank partly funded by ExxonMobil sent letters to scientists offering them up to $10,000 to critique findings in a major global warming study released Friday which found that global warming was real and likely caused by burning fossil fuels."

Here are the facts as we've been able to collect them. AEI doesn't lobby, didn't offer money to scientists to question global warming, and the money it did pay for climate research didn't come from Exxon.

What AEI did was send a letter to several leading climate scientists asking them to participate in a symposium that would present a "range of policy prescriptions that should be considered for climate change of uncertain dimension." Some of the scholars asked to participate, including Steve Schroeder of Texas A& M, are climatologists who believe that global warming is a major problem.

AEI President Chris DeMuth says, "What the Guardian essentially characterizes as a bribe is the conventional practice of AEI -- and Brookings, Harvard and the University of Manchester -- to pay individuals" for commissioned work. He says that Exxon has contributed less than 1% of AEI's budget over the last decade.

As for Exxon, Lauren Kerr, director of its Washington office, says that "none of us here had ever heard of this AEI climate change project until we read about it in the London newspapers." By the way, commissioning such research is also standard practice at NASA and other government agencies and at liberal groups such as the Pew Charitable Trusts, which have among them spent billions of dollars attempting to link fossil fuels to global warming.

We don't know where the Brits first got this "news," but the leading suspects are the reliable sources at Greenpeace. They have been peddling these allegations for months, and the London newspaper sleuths seem to have swallowed them like pints on a Fleet Street lunch hour.

So, apparently, have several members of the U.S. Senate. Yesterday Senators Bernard Sanders, Patrick Leahy, Dianne Feinstein and John Kerry sent a letter to Mr. DeMuth complaining that "should these reports be accurate," then "it would highlight the extent to which moneyed interests distort honest scientific and public policy discussions. . . . Does your donors' self-interest trump an honest discussion over the well-being of the planet?"

Every member of AEI's board of directors was graciously copied on the missive. We're told the Senators never bothered to contact AEI about the veracity of the reports, and by repeating the distortions, these four Democratic senators, wittingly or not, gave credence to falsehood.

For its part, Exxon appears unwilling to take this smear campaign lying down. Bribery can be a crime, and falsely accusing someone of a crime may well be defamation. A company spokesman says Exxon has written a letter to the Independent demanding a retraction.

One can only conclude from this episode that the environmental left and their political and media supporters now believe it is legitimate to quash debate on climate change and its consequences. This is known as orthodoxy, and, until now, science accepted the legitimacy of challenging it.

Who Pays To Stop A Pandemic? (NYT)

By Ruth R. Faden, Patrick S. Duggan And Ruth Karron

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

Baltimore

BIRD flu has not yet turned into a pandemic, but it is already killing the meager hopes of some of the world's poorest people for a marginally better life.

When poultry become infected with the deadly strain of avian influenza (H5N1), it is essential that all birds nearby be culled to prevent further spread. We all stand to benefit from this important pandemic prevention strategy, recommended by the World Health Organization and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization. Unfortunately, however, the world's poor are unfairly shouldering the burden of the intervention.

Last month officials in Jakarta, Indonesia, announced a ban on household farming of poultry there. The domestic bird population of Jakarta is estimated at 1.3 million. Thousands of families were given until Feb. 1 to consume, sell or kill their birds. Now inspectors are going door to door to destroy any remaining birds.

The Indonesian government pledged to pay about $1.50 for each bird infected with the H5N1 virus, a sum that may approximate the bird's fair market value. But most birds that have been killed under this policy are healthy, so their owners, most reports suggest, will receive nothing.

Moreover, it is not clear how Jakarta's poor will replace the income they once received from chickens and other birds. When officials impose widespread culling, industrial-scale poultry producers — like the company that owns the large British turkey farm where bird flu was found this month — usually have the resources to absorb the losses. But when the birds of small-scale poultry farmers are culled, entrepreneurs who were just beginning to move up the development ladder can be plunged right back into poverty. The most dependent and vulnerable members of the community become even more dependent and vulnerable. "Backyard birds" are the only source of income for many women and children.

Families whose birds are found to be infected with the virus may suffer even more. People in Cambodia, China and India whose poultry have been blamed for avian influenza outbreaks have often been subject to extreme stigma and isolation, and there have even been reports of suicides by desperate farmers.

It is inevitable that the world's poor will suffer most from a pandemic. A recent article in The Lancet predicted that if the next pandemic were to mimic the huge 1918 flu outbreak, 96 percent of an estimated 62 million deaths would occur in developing countries. But specific steps can and should be taken now to prevent or mitigate the injustices that are already occurring.

We are part of a group of 24 government officials, public health experts and scientists from 11 countries who recently met in Bellagio, Italy, with the support of the Rockefeller Foundation to call attention to how pandemic planning affects the world's disadvantaged. We created a checklist for avian influenza control that explicitly calls on the authorities to compensate people who suffer losses from bird-culling programs, regardless of whether the destroyed birds are infected with the avian influenza virus.

Such a program in Jakarta alone would be expensive. Just to compensate families for their culled birds would require nearly $2 million, not including the cost of administering the program. Indonesia's domestic bird population countrywide is estimated at 300 million, so if the culling program were to be expanded beyond Jakarta, the total compensation cost could run as high as $450 million.

Indonesia's avian influenza budget for the coming year is reported to be less than $50 million. Clearly, without donor assistance, the government cannot afford to compensate families and farmers fairly. So the burden of pandemic prevention must also fall on the world's wealthy nations.

Last year, the United States, the European Union and other nations pledged more than $2 billion to the global war chest for avian influenza response. Developing a program to compensate poor families in countries with limited resources is an enormous challenge. But it is time that the money pledged by the donor countries reach the people who are already the first victims of the next pandemic.

LA To Name Thugs In Anti-gang Effort (AP)

By Andrew Glazer, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Abandoning the long-held belief that naming the worst gangs boosts their street image, the mayor and police chief identified 11 of the most violent groups Thursday and promised to confront them with more law enforcement.

Authorities are reversing strategy in response to a surge in gang bloodshed that has defied the city's continuing drop in overall crime. The Police Department says the city has 400 gangs with about 39,000 members, though other agencies estimate there are more than 700 groups.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and police Chief William Bratton were to announce the plans Thursday at a police station in a San Fernando Valley neighborhood where gang crime more than doubled last year.

Gangs selected for the "Most Wanted"-style list have histories of assaulting police officers or targeting victims based on race, said Lt. Paul Vernon, a police spokesman.

Other parts of the initiative involve seeking more gang injunctions that ban members from congregating in certain neighborhoods, training residents on how to recognize gang members and creating a list of the 10 most wanted gang members, Vernon said.

Reaction from neighborhood activists and gang interventionists ranged from skeptical to negative. Posting a list simply will make gangs want to be on it, they said.

"To the gang members it is a badge of honor," said Najee Ali, an activist and former gang member.

Mike Cummings, a former gang member and pastor of the We Care Ministries in Watts, said the city should focus more on programs designed to keep children from joining gangs.

"If you're going to take away gangbangers, you need to replace them with something," said Cummings, who helps broker peace accords between rival gangs. "Job training. Recreation. We're talking about long-term stuff."

In a city-funded study, civil rights attorney Connie Rice last month said efforts to combat gang crime in the city should include $1 billion in a plan that would create economic and social opportunities in gang-infested areas. Rice also recommended focusing law enforcement efforts on the most violent gangs.

Villaraigosa has appealed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for millions of dollars in anti-gang funds and for more federal prosecutors to pursue racketeering and other charges mostly used in the past against organized crime. Gonzales has identified gangs as one of the country's greatest security threats.

The mayor is also working with FBI Director Robert Mueller, who has assigned agents to an anti-gang task force in the San Fernando Valley to work alongside police officers deputized as federal officers.

Another study released Thursday in Washington found that anti-immigrant backlash can marginalize young people from Central America and increase the risk that they will turn to gangs. The yearlong study of Latino gangs in the Washington area and five Central American countries also found no sign of transnational coordination among gang members, undercutting the idea that gangs are engaged in an organized effort to spread their influence.

The report was from the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico and the nonprofit advocacy group Washington Office on Latin America.

Heavy Crackdown On Youth Gangs Counter-productive: Study (AFP)

By Mauricio Rabuffetti

AFP, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129848

Tough police crackdowns on gang violence are counterproductive and lead to better-organized gangs, a new study showed amid talks between US and Latin American police chiefs to hammer out a global strategy to tackle the scourge.

The year-long study, conducted in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico and the US capital, said repressive police actions against youth gangs have actually made the problem worse.

"The research shows that gangs have grown more organized rather than less in response to hard-line police approaches. Public security has not improved as a result of these strategies," said the researchers led by the Instituto Tecnologico Autonomo de Mexico, a private institute of higher education in Mexico City.

The report, released by the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), comes a day after a three-day international summit opened in Los Angeles with the aim of forging a strategy to curb the menace of violent criminal gangs.

Latino gangs that originated in Los Angeles have been blamed for smuggling drugs and weapons as well as murders, rapes and robberies.

The report recommends following "best practices" seen elsewhere in Central America and the United States.

Recommended practices cited by the report included police efforts in Washington to treat the problem comprehensively, "police involvement in prevention programs" in Nicaragua and local efforts in Central America to develop community-based responses.

The report called for such successful methods to be considered in Mexico, "where there is a need of preventive and coordinated responses."

In the case of Mexico, the investigators said they had reached "a surprising conclusion": gangs made up of Central American immigrants -- or linked to Central American youth gangs such as the Mara Salvatrucha or the 18th Street Gang (Mara 18) -- are not widespread.

"Mexican youth gangs exist, and drug-trafficking criminal gangs are a serious security problem. But, despite alarmist rhetoric, research shows that Central American gangs are not a major problem in Mexico," the report said.

The investigators emphasized the nature of gangs varies from country to country.

"Youth gangs are a serious threat to public security in El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala" and represent "a much smaller problem" in Nicaragua, they said.

In the Washington area, gangs made up of Central American immigrants or the children of immigrants are active in certain areas, "but are not at this time a major public security issue," they said.

In San Salvador on Monday, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Central American counterparts weighed proposed cooperation projects to fight youth gangs which have become a criminal transnational problem.

The international summit underway in Los Angeles has drawn police chiefs from Mexico, Belize, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and the United States as well as officials from the FBI and the US Justice Department.

In Central America, according to local police estimates, more than 200,000 marginalized youths, many of them deported from US cities, are members of gangs, including the notorious Mara Salvatruch and Mara 18.

Cuba Sends Key Drug Suspect To Colombia (AP)

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Cuba deported reputed drug kingpin Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante to Colombia, which plans to extradite him to the United States to face trafficking and money laundering charges, officials said Thursday.

Gomez, an alleged boss of the Norte del Valle cartel known by his alias "Rasguno," had been held in Cuba since his 2004 arrest at Havana's main airport. He fled Colombia after Washington offered a $5 million reward for the capture of that country's top drug traffickers.

Cuba's government said Gomez was turned over to Colombian authorities Thursday at Havana's international airport. Oscar Galvis, a spokesman for the Colombia's DAS intelligence agency, confirmed to The Associated Press that Gomez arrived in Colombia on an air force flight from Cuba.

The Cuban statement did not mention Colombia's plans for Gomez. Cuba has no extradition treaty with the United States and harbors some suspects wanted in the United States who are considered political refugees here.

But a Colombian official said Wednesday that an order had already been signed to send Gomez to the United States. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to divulge the information.

Gomez is wanted on a U.S. indictment in New York on drug trafficking, racketeering and money-laundering charges.

His extradition appears to be more a result of his desire to get out of Cuban jail than a desire by Havana to improve relations with Washington. Last year, Gomez expressed to Colombian media his desire to leave the Cuban jail even if it meant extradition to the United States.

He would be the most senior reputed drug boss extradited to the United States since Cali cartel chief Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela was handed over in March 2005.

Gomez's Miami-based attorney, Oscar Rodriguez, told the AP on Wednesday he had no information on the deportation and would not answer questions about Gomez's intentions until he has had a chance to speak with his client.

The Norte del Valle cartel, the most powerful traditional drug organization in Colombia, is believed to account for as much as 60 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

However, many of its top bosses have been captured in recent years and a campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department had succeeded in freezing many of their assets, including front companies.

In March of 2004, Colombian authorities seized $100 million worth of Gomez's assets including 68 farms, 24 offices and 17 parking lots.

According to prosecutors, Rasguno went from pumping gas at a petrol station in 1991 to declaring property worth more than half a million dollars a year later.

Cuba Deports Suspected Drug Baron (BBC)

BBC, February 9, 2007

The Cuban government has deported to Colombia a suspected narcotics baron wanted in the US on charges of drug trafficking and money laundering.

Colombian officials escorted Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, 49, from Havana to Bogota on a government plane.

Mr Gomez Bustamante, who is also known as "Rasguno", or "Scratch", is an alleged head of Colombia's biggest drug cartel, Norte del Valle.

He was arrested in Cuba in July 2004 after entering on a false passport.

Officials in both Cuba and Colombia confirmed that the deportation had been completed.

The US is seeking his extradition and had offered a $5m (£2.55m) reward for information leading to his arrest.

An unidentified Colombian official told the Associated Press news agency that an order had already been signed to send Mr Gomez Bustamante to the US.

Norte del Valle became Colombia's most powerful drugs organisation after the dismantling of the Medellin and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 1990s.

According to the US Drug Enforcement Administration, it is believed to be behind as much as 60% of all the cocaine consumed in the US.

Landis Agrees Not To Race In Tour This Year (NYT)

By Graham Bowley

The American cyclist Floyd Landis agreed today not to defend his controversial 2006 victory in the Tour de France.

In return, France's anti-doping agency said it would postpone a decision on whether to suspend him from racing for two years after he was accused of using an illegal steroid to help him win the tour.

The agency's president, Pierre Bordry, said the French authority would resume its deliberations on the case no later than June, after the United States Anti-Doping Agency considers its own doping case against Landis.

The cyclist, who also agreed not to participate in any other races in France this year, is facing a two-year ban from cycling and the loss of his Tour title after he tested positive for a performance-enhancing drug the day after he won the Tour last July.

"He understood perfectly that if he didn't act today, we would start the procedure immediately," Bordry said in a statement, according to wire service reports. "We will let Landis defend himself as he wishes before the U.S.A.D.A."

During last year's Tour, Landis tested positive for an unusually high level of testosterone. Landis, 31, has denied any wrongdoing and is appealing against the charges.

Four and a half months ago, Landis underwent hip replacement surgery and has said that he would be unlikely to compete in the Tour de France this July. (He has agreed, however, to ride in the grueling Leadville 100 mountain bike race in Leadville, Colo., in August.)

If he loses his appeal, he would be the first cyclist in the history of the race to be stripped of his title.

In the U.S., Landis and his lawyers are expected to present their case before a three- person arbitration panel on May 14. Landis or the agency could appeal the result to the Court of Arbitration for Sport, and that decision would be final.

Should Landis lose his case, he would be banned from competing in countries that adhere to the World Anti-Doping Agency's code, according to the U.S. anti-doping authority.

Landis was in Brooklyn on Wednesday evening, taking part in a question and answer session where he defended himself against the charges. Landis did not attend the French agency's hearing today before a nine-member panel in Paris but was represented by his lawyer, who read his request for a delay, according to reports.

In his letter to the agency, according to The Associated Press, Landis said the dual cases in France and the United States were complicating matters, and asked the French agency to delay its decision until after the U.S. agency rules.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree to voluntarily not participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," Landis said in the letter, according to The A.P.

Under French law, the French anti-doping agency, the Agence Française de Lutte contre le Dopage, known as the AFLD, can suspend Landis from racing on French soil. Landis and his advisors believe there were inaccuracies and instances of sloppiness by the French laboratory that tested Landis' urine last summer.

The French agency, however, has no authority to suspend Landis from competitions in other countries.

The power to ban a rider in France was last used by the French agency in 2003 against the Spanish rider Igor González de Galdeano.

French Authorities Will Postpone Their Decision On Suspension Of Floyd Landis (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

Cyclist won't compete in Tour or other races there this year, and doping inquiry will be postponed. His appeal of charges is pending.

French authorities agreed Thursday to suspend their investigation of doping charges against Tour de France champion Floyd Landis after Landis agreed not to race in France for the rest of this year.

The decision will allow the California cyclist to focus on his appeal of charges brought under the international sports doping system and prosecuted by the United States Anti-Doping Agency (USADA).

That appeal hearing is scheduled to open May 14 before a panel of three arbitrators. They are Christopher Campbell, a San Francisco lawyer and former Olympic wrestler, who was selected by Landis; Richard McLaren, a London, Ontario, lawyer selected by USADA, and Patrice Brunet, a Montreal lawyer chosen as the panel's chairman by the other two arbitrators.

If the panel rules against him and he loses a further appeal to the International Court of Arbitration for Sport, Landis would face a two-year suspension from racing and the loss of his 2006 Tour de France title.

The French national anti-doping agency, which is known by its initials AFLD, is empowered only to bar Landis from racing in France. AFLD had been scheduled to open its hearing Thursday in Paris, but Landis and international anti-doping officials had requested that the case be postponed until after the USADA hearing was finished.

Both investigations stem from the same accusation — that Landis illicitly doped with testosterone during one stage of the 2006 Tour de France. Landis denies the contention, alleging that errors and sloppy procedures by the Paris anti-doping lab that tested his samples produced a false positive result.

AFLD said it would defer its investigation until no later than the end of June, as long as Landis complies with his agreement not to race in France.

The agreement will keep him out of the 2007 Tour de France, which is scheduled to begin July 7.

A spokesman for Landis said the cyclist had planned to skip the Tour this year anyway to attend to his doping defense.

Meanwhile, sources confirmed Thursday that Landis had rejected a request by USADA to retest eight of his urine samples, including six from the 2006 Tour, that had previously been ruled negative for doping. A report of the request appeared in L'Equipe, a French sports journal.

The sources say USADA proposed that eight backup samples be subjected to a carbon isotope ratio test at the Paris anti-doping lab that conducted the original tests on Landis' Tour de France samples. Landis' defense, however, has questioned the lab's conduct of the isotope test on those samples and challenged its interpretation of the results.

USADA did not respond to questions Thursday about its rationale for the request.

Landis Won't Defend Tour De France Title (HC)

By Dale Robertson, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 9, 2007

Hearing on win in last year's race postponed until USADA rules

It's official that Floyd Landis will not make an effort to defend his tainted Tour de France yellow jersey this summer. Whether he will be allowed to keep the prized maillot jaune, however, is still undetermined.

A hearing scheduled Thursday in Paris before French anti-doping authorities (AFLD) that was expected to result in Landis' being stripped of his 2006 title and suspended from racing in France for two years was postponed until after the 30-year-old American gets his day in court with the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on May 14.

In return for the stay, Landis promised not to enter any French races in 2007, first and foremost the Tour. His concession was somewhat moot because he had recently conceded delays in getting a hearing before USADA made it improbable he would be able to salvage the current season. He's also coming off major hip surgery.

"Mr. Landis requested that the AFLD allow him to first defend himself in front of the American agency," a statement from AFLD said. "He has agreed not to take part in any cycling competition in France before the end of 2007 and that includes this year's Tour de France.

"On the basis of that commitment, the agency has decided to adjourn the hearing to a later date that will be decided on how the American procedure proceeds — but no later than the end of June."

In addition to Landis' attorneys, France's minister of sport, Jean-François Lamour, speaking in his capacity as World Anti-Doping Agency vice president, had sought the postponement, saying Landis should have his hearing in the U.S. first.

Landis' near-term future in cycling rests in the hands of the USADA because USA Cycling, which controls his professional license, transferred jurisdiction. French authorities only have the right to keep him from competing in France. Ultimately, the decision as to whether he keeps his Tour title rests in the hands of the race organization itself.

Tour director Christian Prudhomme is on the record as saying he no longer considers Landis the champion.

France ratified the World Anti-Doping Code, which gives the final say in these cases to each athlete's national governing body, only following the conclusion of the Tour, so there was some sentiment inside AFLD that it still controlled Landis' fate.

Landis tested positive for an elevated testosterone/epitestosterone ratio after his heroic stage-17 ride through the Alps enabled him to regain control of the Tour one day after he had broken down on a similar rugged mountain stage. News of the failed test broke three days after his triumphant ride into Paris.

Whatever results from Landis' meeting with USADA or AFLD's final say on the matter, the case will wind up before the Court of Arbitration for Sport in Lausanne, Switzerland. The appeals process could drag things out until the end of the year, if not longer.

Landis To Skip Tour As Agency Delays Drug Decision (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Gregory Viscusi

Bloomberg, February 8, 2007

(Bloomberg) -- Floyd Landis will skip the 2007 Tour de France as part of an agreement to delay a disciplinary hearing by France's anti-doping agency over the test he failed while winning last year's race.

The Paris-based agency, known as the AFLD, said in a statement it accepted a written request by Landis to delay any judgment until after U.S. anti-doping authorities have made their decision. In exchange, the U.S. cyclist committed himself not to enter any French races this year.

``In response to this undertaking, the board of the agency decided to delay the examination of the dossier to a date that will be fixed in relation to the outcome of the procedure in front of the American anti-doping agency," the AFLD said.

Landis, who faces being the first Tour de France champion to be stripped of his title, is summoned in front of the USADA on May 14 to face the same doping charges. The AFLD said it expects to hold its own hearing by the end of June.

Landis, who denies taking banned drugs, has said he was unlikely to race this year anyway because he had hip surgery in September. The 31-year-old aims to return for the 2008 Tour de France. This year's edition of cycling's most prestigious competition begins July 7 in London and ends three weeks later in Paris.

Landis beat Spain's Oscar Pereiro by 57 seconds last year to succeed fellow U.S. rider Lance Armstrong, who won the event a record seven times.

Testosterone

Two urine samples taken after the 17th stage found inappropriate levels of testosterone in Landis's body. He won the stage by more than five minutes, riding solo for 130 kilometers (80.8 miles) to get back in contention after falling more than eight minutes behind the leaders the previous day.

The USADA, based in Colorado Springs, Colorado, generally is responsible for deciding whether to impose sanctions on U.S. riders, usually a two-year ban for a first offense. The ultimate decision on whether to strip him of the title would be taken by the sport's ruling body, the International Cycling Union.

Landis and his lawyers contend that his urine sample was mishandled and mislabeled by the French laboratory, that the test is unreliable and that the findings don't meet minimum standards for a drug offense.

French postpone doping decision

PARIS -- Floyd Landis will skip the Tour de France -- and all races in France this year -- as part of an agreement with French doping authorities in a case that could strip him of cycling's most prestigious title.

Last year's Tour champion had hip-replacement surgery 4 1/2 months ago and was unlikely to have competed in this year's Tour. He agreed yesterday not to race again in France until 2008, and in return the French anti-doping agency postponed its decision on whether to suspend him from competing in France for a maximum of two years because of a positive doping test.

"Floyd is pleased that the AFLD has agreed with his counsel's request that they suspend this proceeding," spokesman Michael Henson said.

Earlier, AFLD president Pierre Bordry said Landis "understood perfectly that if he didn't act today, we would start the procedure immediately."

Landis will go before the US Anti-Doping Agency May 14 and, following that, the AFLD will deliver its verdict in June.

"We will let Landis defend himself as he wishes," Bordry said.

The American, who has denied wrongdoing, didn't appear at yesterday's meeting of the AFLD's nine-member panel, but sent a lawyer who read his request.

In the letter, a copy of which was obtained by the Associated Press, Landis said the parallel cases in France and the United States were complicating matters. He asked the French agency to hold off until after the US agency rules.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree to voluntarily not participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," Landis said in the letter.

Bordry said Landis deserves to be heard by the USADA. But Bordry echoed Tour de France president Christian Prudhomme's sentiment that the American agency was dragging out its process.

Landis's urine sample after a 17th-stage win in last year's Tour de France was found to contain elevated testosterone to epitestosterone levels. He risks being the first rider in the 104-year history of the race to be stripped of his title. Prudhomme has said the Tour no longer considers him the winner.

Landis argues the Chatenay-Malabry laboratory that carried out the tests is unreliable.

Landis To Sit Out This Year's Tour (CNN)

CNN, February 8, 2007

PARIS, France -- Tour de France winner Floyd Landis will not take part in this year's race in order to concentrate on fighting doping charges on one front rather than two.

The American was facing disciplinary hearings in France and the U.S. after testing positive for the banned male sex hormone testosterone during the 2006 Tour.

On Thursday, however, the French Anti-Doping Agency (AFLD) agreed to postpone its investigation, due to be held that day, in exchange for a pledge by the Californian not to race in the country in 2007.

"Simultaneous proceedings in the U.S. and France risk the possibility of an inconsistent application of rules, contradictory judgements, and come at a great cost -- both personal and financial -- to Floyd," said Landis' representative Michael Henson.

In a letter read by his lawyer to the AFLD hearing, Landis asked for the chance to first defend himself in front of the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA).

"He says in this very letter that he promises not to take part in any race in France until the end of 2007, in particular in the 2007 Tour," the AFLD said in a statement.

"The AFLD subsequently decided to postpone the examination of his case to a date that will be set according to the course of the procedure before the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency," added the statement.

In the letter, Landis wrote: "Let me assure you that I fully share the goal of preventing illegal doping."

He added, though, that two disciplinary hearings dealing with the same facts could lead to confusion and asked for the a postponement of the French one.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree voluntarily not to participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," the letter read.

Landis, 31, is due to have a separate USADA hearing on May 14.

Speaking about the AFLD's postponement of their inquiry, said World Anti-Doping Agency vice-president Jean-Francois Lamour. "It is a common sense decision, which allows USADA to prepare their hearing in a proper manner.

"AFLD has the obligation to respect the WADA code and in delaying the decision they do so," he added.

The International Cycling Union (UCI) said they did not have any specific comment to make on the AFLD's decision because they only take into account the U.S. federation's actions, which will be based on the USADA recommendations.

If found guilty of doping, Landis, who denies any wrongdoing, faces a two-year suspension from the sport and the possibility of becoming the first Tour winner to be stripped of his title. However, the American could take the matter to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS).

His lawyers say the samples were mislabelled by the French laboratory which conducted the tests, the testing process was unreliable and the rider never in fact tested positive.

Corrupt Cop's Taped Conversation Heard (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 9, 2007

Jurors considering a lawsuit filed by a former federal agent against the city of Chicago listened Thursday as the ex-agent's lawyers played a secretly taped conversation between notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski and a police official who had been assigned to investigate him.

It was 1998. And while the internal look at Miedzianowski's activity had been over for years, a federal net was closing in on the corrupt cop and his home phone had been tapped.

On the tape, Raymond Risley, head of the Police Department's internal affairs division when Miedzianowski was being investigated, could be heard discussing the allegations that had been made by Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

The suit filed by Klipfel and her husband, who is still an agent, was progressing.

"It's so [expletive] muddied up," said Risley, a deputy chief at the time of the call. "I don't think she's going to get anywhere. It's [expletive] crazy."

Risley told Miedzianowski he had kept "all kinds of stuff" related to the internal investigation, which began in early 1993, about a year after Klipfel first contends she tried to report Miedzianowski for stealing from drug dealers.

In her federal civil suit seeking damages, Klipfel contends that Miedzianowski flipped internal investigations onto her as the city failed to root out a corrupt cop. She also says she left the ATF about a year before Miedzianowski was charged with leading a drug conspiracy. He was labeled the most corrupt cop in the history of Chicago by federal prosecutors and was convicted in 2001.

Risley could be heard on the recorded conversation telling Miedzianowski, "I got the prison tapes." The tapes were recordings of a call between Klipfel and the drug dealer at the center of her allegations, made while the dealer was in prison.

The plaintiffs' lawyers argue the tapes would have corroborated Klipfel's account, but they were missing in the case until just this week.

Risley and Miedzianowski could be heard trading opinions of Klipfel.

"If you scratch the surface on her you realize she's a [expletive] wacko," Risley could be heard saying.

"This lady is maniacal," Miedzianowski said. "She's not stupid by any means."

Risley questioned how Klipfel had come across some of her information used to make the allegations in her suit that Miedzianowski was at the center of a plot to destroy her with the help of friends throughout law enforcement.

Miedzianowski joked about it.

"If you're gonna lie, lie big," Miedzianowski said on the recorded call. "That's what it comes down to."

In his questioning of Risley, the plaintiffs' lawyer, Steven Fine, asked about how the internal investigation had been conducted. Risley testified that the investigation did not include interviews of the officers or Klipfel.

On cross-examination, a lawyer for the city, Sara Ellis, asked Risley to explain some of his decisions. Risley said the result of the probe was that investigators under him were simply unable to determine whether Miedzianowski and other officers were innocent or guilty of the accusations.

He said he did not interview Klipfel because the ATF did not allow it. The investigation showed the officers had a search warrant for a safe-deposit box Miedzianowski had allegedly stolen from and learned that the officers actually had inventoried more cash than the drug dealer had said was being stored there.

Bill To Eliminate 'gun Show Loophole' Draws Heated Debate (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) - Supporters and opponents showed up by the hundreds Thursday to hear testimony on a measure designed to prevent the unregulated sale of handguns at gun shows in Washington.

Backers said the bill would help prevent criminals from getting firearms; those against said it would only put further restrictions on gun ownership.

The crowd filled at least two hearing rooms and formed lines that nearly reached out of the John A. Cherberg Building near the Capitol.

"It's great to see this kind of crowd," said Sen. Rodney Tom D-Medina, the bill's primary sponsor. "I wish we could get this kind of attention at our Education Committee."

The bill has failed in past sessions, and doesn't appear to have much of a shot at passing this year. Leaders in both the House and Senate have said they don't see enough support for it.

But that didn't prevent partisans from turning out en masse. Members of the crowd had buttons identifying themselves as for or against the bill, but other than some heated debate and clapping and jeering during testimony, things stayed civil at the hearing in front of the Senate Labor, Commerce, Research and Development Committee.

Federally licensed firearms dealers - including those who operate at gun shows - must perform background checks on anyone who purchases a firearm and keep records of buyers' names and addresses. For handgun buyers, state law also requires a five-day waiting period.

But people who only make occasional sales at gun shows - such as collectors - aren't considered dealers, and can sell handguns without a background check or waiting period.

The measure would require all dealers at gun shows to be licensed and perform background checks.

Opponents say criminals do not obtain their guns at gun shows and that the bill would further restrict gun ownership rights. Supporters say the exemption is a dangerous opportunity for criminals to evade the background checks.

California and Oregon have passed similar measures.

Oregon state Sen. Ginny Burdick, D-Portland, who spearheaded the initiative movement to pass the measure in her state, told the hearing that many gun owners came around to supporting the idea once they understood it.

"This is all about crime prevention to me," Burdick said. "It's a no brainer; it's common sense."

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske also testified in favor of the bill. He said background checks required by licensed firearms dealers have prevented many criminals from obtaining guns. It's only fair to extend that requirement to unlicensed dealers at gun shows, he said.

"It just makes sense to level the playing field," Kerlikowske said.

Sen. Pam Roach, R-Auburn - who is not a member of the committee but was allowed to ask questions - said the only big gun shows held in the Seattle area are sponsored by the Washington Arms Collectors organization. To buy a gun at one of those shows, she said, you have to undergo a background check.

"There is no problem here," Roach said. "I really object with using words like loophole, because there isn't one."

National Rifle Association lobbyist Brian Judy said he was concerned the bill was just a starting point and soon all private firearms transactions would be regulated.

"The NRA is vehemently opposed to this bill," Judy said.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Raid Leaves Texas Town A Skeleton (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

CACTUS, Tex. -- The streets of this small, isolated city in the Texas Panhandle are virtually empty nowadays, and "For Rent" signs decorate dilapidated trailers and shabby 1940s-era military barracks that just weeks ago were full of tenants.

Sales of tortillas and other staples are down. Money wire transactions to Central America have mostly dried up. The "Guatemalas," as local residents call them, are almost all gone, and so are a significant number of Mexican nationals. An estimated 12 to 18 children are now living with only one parent since the other was arrested in a massive immigration raid at the biggest employer in town.

On Dec. 12, hundreds of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents clad in riot gear and armed with assault rifles descended on the Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in a coordinated raid of six of the company's facilities nationwide. The operation was the government's largest single work-site enforcement operation ever. The plant in little Cactus -- a town better known in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico, and in the department of QuichÃ©, Guatemala, where workers came from, than in Texas -- was the largest one raided. Almost a quarter of the 1,282 suspected illegal immigrants arrested in the raids were removed from the Cactus plant.

That an obscure town 600 miles north of the border and in the middle of High Plains country once owned by Anglo ranchers and farmers was a haven for illegal Mexican and Central American immigrants was no surprise to anyone here. The draw to Cactus has existed since American Beef Packers opened the meat-processing plant in 1974. Swift's predecessor company bought the plant in 1975, and it became known as Swift & Co.'s Cactus Beef Plant in 2002.

Although opened with local hires, Vietnamese and Laotian refugees became the dominant workforce by the late-1970s. By the mid-'80s the workforce was overwhelmingly Mexican immigrants, and by 2000 the Guatemalans, speaking the Mayan language of QuichÃ©, had started to arrive. Before the Dec. 12 raid, Swift employed 3,050 workers in Cactus at a starting wage of $11.50 an hour to slaughter, process and package several thousand head of cattle daily.

Work inside the plant is hard, dirty, stinky and dangerous, and it is where Cactus's biggest business owner and mayor, Luis Aguilar, and Cactus's largest landlord, Thanh Nguyen, got their starts in the United States. Aguilar, a native of Chihuahua, began working at the plant in 1976 using false identity papers, he admits. In 1986, he was able to legalize his status in the United States, along with 2.7 million illegal workers, under the amnesty program authorized by the federal Immigration Reform and Control Act.

Previously criticized by some local officials who thought he aided and even encouraged illegal immigrants to settle in Cactus, Aguilar took the raids almost personally. He canceled the annual city Christmas party because so many residents, including City Council members, had spouses or other relatives who had been arrested by immigration authorities. Aguilar subsequently lent one of his buildings to be used as a food and used-clothing pantry for residents whose relatives were caught in the raid.

"These are my people," said Aguilar, 50, who today owns the largest house in Cactus, a nearby 575-acre ranch, a laundromat and the town's only full-fledged grocery store. About half of his 26 rental units are empty now.

Nguyen and his family, part of the mass exodus of "boat people" who left Vietnam after the fall of Saigon, arrived as legal refugees in nearby Dumas, Tex., in 1979 under the sponsorship of a restaurant owner who wanted cheap labor. Within six months, Nguyen and his wife left for the better-paying meatpacking plant in Cactus, said Nguyen's son Phuong, 37, who is also known as Ben.

Except for the Nguyens, Asian immigrants moved out of Cactus, which is now 99.5 percent Hispanic. Some local officials recently said that 75 percent of the city's estimated 5,000 residents before the raid were illegal immigrants. Aguilar disputes that, saying it was only 15 percent.

To Ben Nguyen, that number is not important. His father usually offered a few weeks of free rent to immigrants until they got a job at the meat plant and their first paycheck and provided thrift store mattresses and clothes, if necessary, Nguyen said. Now only eight of his father's 60 rental units are occupied. Some were vacated the day of the raid, but the majority were abandoned within weeks, when frightened immigrants moved away. Since then, vandals have been kicking in the doors of the empty apartments, looking for any items of value that might have been left behind.

"I do believe in punishment for the crime, but this is too much," Ben Nguyen said. "You scare kids; you push people so far away that you destroy the economy of the town. . . . This town is built by immigrants. They were just like me when they come over here. They didn't have anything. They came over here just to work and start their lives."

But authorities charge that these immigrants had false identity documents, enabling them to get driver's licenses and jobs illegally, victimizing U.S. citizens and fueling the fraudulent document industry. Traffic stops or crime reports became confusing events in Cactus in recent years. Immigrants would offer two names, said former Cactus Police Chief Tim Turley. The had "el verdadero," as they called it -- the true name -- and their work name.

Mario Lux, 26, from the town of Canilla in QuichÃ©, said the piece of paper that gave him his work name cost him $1,400 and was obtained for him by a friend in Cactus. With that document, Lux said he got an identification card in nearby New Mexico and then a job at the Swift plant in March 2006, cutting fat and gristle off meat for $11.90 an hour. He was not working the day of the raid but now will not return for fear of being discovered and arrested. He says that he still owes $3,200 to the smuggling network that got him to Cactus and that he has been unable to send money to his wife and three children back home. He is also three weeks behind in his rent. He and his three roommates pay $120 a week for their small apartment.

"I have no idea how I will pay that now," Lux said as he stood in the food and clothes pantry established in the Cactus town center.

Illegal Immigrants Slain In An Attack In Arizona (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 8 — Three illegal immigrants were shot to death, three were wounded and others were missing Thursday near Tucson after gunmen accosted them as they traveled north from the Mexican border, the authorities said.

The shootings came a day after gunmen in ski masks and carrying assault-style rifles robbed 18 people who had illegally crossed the border 70 miles to the south, near Sasabe. On Jan. 28 a man driving illegal immigrants from the border several miles from the scene of Thursday's killings was ambushed and shot to death as the immigrants fled.

The federal and local authorities were investigating whether the spate of shootings was related.

Illegal immigrants crossing the Mexican border often encounter bandits, armed civilian patrols and rival smugglers bent on robbing or stopping them.

The violence has been particularly acute in Arizona, which in recent years has become the busiest crossing area for illegal immigrants.

The latest shooting appeared to be the work of bandits, law enforcement officials said, though they said they had not ruled anything out.

Investigators were still piecing together what had happened, but they said they believed that the gunmen had opened fire on the travelers, apparently all from Guatemala, about 7 a.m. along a known smuggling route in a remote area near a mine 20 miles northwest of Tucson.

Their pickup truck crashed, and two of the immigrants, a young man and a teen-age girl, were found inside, dead from gunshot wounds, said Alonzo Peña, the agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Arizona.

The gunmen forced the other immigrants into another vehicle and left, dropping off the wounded, including one person found dead later, along their way, Mr. Peña said. The others who were left were a woman with a gunshot wound in the neck, a 15-year-old girl and a man shot in the fingers.

The man with the hand wound hiked to a nearby mine, and workers there helped him call the police.

Mr. Peña said the authorities were trying to determine how many had been in the group of immigrants and how many were still missing. He said it appeared the smuggler driving the illegal immigrants and a guide had either escaped or were among the group taken captive.

The Associated Press, quoting officials of the Pima County Sheriff's Department, said six or seven immigrants had left with the gunmen.

"There have been similar cases where undocumented migrants have been taken to a location and relatives in Mexico contacted and extortion took place," Rick Kastigar, the criminal investigations chief for the sheriff's department, told The A.P.

Mr. Peña said the increase in border security in the past year, including scores of additional Border Patrol agents assisted by National Guard troops, had prompted more immigrants to employ smugglers commanding ever higher prices.

The going rate is about $3,000, or higher for trips from Central America, for a guide to lead immigrants by foot across the Mexican border or in a vehicle, usually through treacherous terrain.

Some smuggling rings, rather than risk capture at the border, have chosen to rob rivals, leading to violence.

"Smugglers look at them as a commodity, a product, and in some cases they would rather rip off a load and try to extort money instead of taking the risk to smuggle," Mr. Peña said.

The Border Patrol's Tucson sector has reported that arrests of illegal aliens dropped 11 percent last year and is down 9 percent since October compared with the previous year. Officials at the agency have attributed the decline to additional manpower and newly installed fencing, cameras and sensors deterring crossers, though advocates for immigrants suggest that traffic may have shifted elsewhere.

USA Today, February 9, 2007

TUCSON (AP) — Gunmen stopped a pickup full of illegal immigrants, shot some and took the rest captive Thursday in an attack that left at least three people dead and two wounded, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0129857

Officials have not determined who the gunmen were but believe at least two of the immigrants were Guatemalan. They believe that the driver, who was probably a smuggler, escaped along with a guide.

The men are believed to have shot five people, three fatally, along a known smuggling corridor near Tucson, and forced several others in the group of nine or 10 immigrants to leave with them, Pima County sheriff's officials said. The victims are believed to be two men and a 15-year-old girl.

The bodies of one man and the teenager were found in the rear seat of the pickup that had been carrying the group.

Another 15-year-old girl was later found with slight injuries, and another apparently uninjured person was found in the afternoon, officials said.

Two men who were not injured were in custody and telling authorities what happened. It was not clear whether anyone remained missing.

Investigators did not immediately know a motive for Thursday's attack, but gangs of bandits are known to roam border areas preying on illegal immigrants as they cross into the country. Feuding among smuggling organizations also is not uncommon, sometimes involving demands for ransoms from the immigrants relatives to gain their freedom.

The attack occurred on a dirt road near the Silverbell Mine, about 20 miles northwest of Tucson, said Rick Kastigar, the Pima County sheriff's criminal investigations chief.

The immigrants were heading north when four men armed with assault rifles in another vehicle forced the truck to stop, Kastigar said. During the confrontation, one man suffered a fatal wound, another was shot in the hand — losing several fingers — and a woman was shot in the chest and suffered a neck injury.

The two wounded immigrants were taken to a hospital with "very, very serious injuries," said sheriff's Sgt. James Ogden.

Authorities were trying to determine any link to a Jan. 27 confrontation about 40 miles to the north, possibly between human smugglers, that left one man dead and another wounded. In that incident, four men wearing camouflage uniforms and berets stopped a vehicle carrying illegal immigrants.

Three Illegal Immigrants Shot Dead Crossing US Border: Police (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

Three illegal immigrants were shot dead and two more were wounded after falling prey to suspected bandits as they crossed into the United States from Mexico, police said.

Sergeant James Ogden of Pima County Sheriff's Department said the bodies of three men were discovered early Thursday after ranchers found a group of immigrants stumbling through the desert in southwest Arizona.

One body was found by a roadside and two more bodies were found in a pick-up truck after police conducted aerial searches of the area outside Tucson, around 60 miles north of the border with Mexico.

Two of the immigrants were taken to hospital for treatment to injuries while two more were being questioned by police trying to piece together events leading to the killings.

Ogden told AFP police were working on the theory that the group had been ambushed by bandits lying in wait for them as they crossed the border.

"We're looking at the possibility of bandits," Ogden said. "They are normally armed, and stop vehicles that are being used for human trafficking. "Sometimes they take the vehicle -- and a lot times immigrants can be taken to another area and (bandits) will call family members in Mexico, and hold them for ransom."

Ogden said it was not known if there were other immigrants travelling in the group who had yet to be accounted for. "We just don't know that yet. We're trying to piece together the puzzle," he said.

The southern US-Mexico border is often used by people-smugglers and drug traffickers seeking to slip into the country unseen across stretches of isolated desert.

Latinos Lob A Few Words At Governor (LAT)

By Anna Gorman

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's off-the-cuff comments in recently released audio recordings about illegal immigration and the unwillingness of Mexicans to assimilate into American society have drawn angry responses this week from Latino community and political leaders.

"I made an effort," the Austrian-born Schwarzenegger told aides last April in conversations that touched on assimilation. "But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

The governor also used an expletive to disparage the 1986 federal law that granted asylum to more than 2 million illegal immigrants.

"His comments were highly offensive and outrageous," said Assembly Assistant Majority Leader Kevin de Leon (D-Los Angeles). "It's just mind-blowing that he continues to put his foot in his mouth."

If Spanish-language newspapers and radio are any guide, others were angered as well. The headline on one La Opinion piece this week: "Governor attacks Mexicans."

Even a former campaign aide weighed in. "Those comments are disturbing to many of us," said Arnoldo Torres, who worked for the governor during last year's reelection campaign and is a former political advisor to the League of United Latin American Citizens.

The controversy is the latest flap for the governor involving casual conversations that were not intended to become public.

The recordings were made by a speechwriter and temporarily stored on the governor's website.

A six-minute excerpt was first made public by The Times in September. The remaining 3 1/2 hours of recordings were recently obtained by The Times.

In the recordings released last fall, Schwarzenegger referred to a Latina lawmaker as "hot," casually saying that her fiery personality was the result of mixing "black blood" with "Latino blood."

The more recently released recordings provide the governor's most candid statements yet on illegal immigration.

The conversations were brainstorming sessions designed to help the governor talk out ideas, his communications director, Adam Mendelsohn, said Thursday.

"I think everyone in this state struggles with how to manage an issue as large as the immigration issue," Mendelsohn said. "The governor is working through that issue as anyone else, and he is trying to come up with a responsible position."

Mendelsohn said the recordings, however, fail "to reflect his deep respect for the Mexican culture…. He has a strong belief and understanding of what immigrants have contributed to this state in terms of economic growth."

Some immigration control advocates were pleased by his more hard-line positions.

Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said the governor "hit the truth" in his comments about the 1986 amnesty and the government's failure to enforce the law against employers who hired illegal immigrants.

"He was absolutely right," Mehlman said. "People who broke the law got rewarded, and the American people got a bunch of broken promises."

But the discussions suggest that the governor's views on immigration are mixed and sometimes difficult to categorize.

He denigrated, for instance, the idea of sending hundreds of thousands of immigrant workers back to Mexico and called the 700-mile border fence recently approved by Congress "ridiculous."

"We all know a 12-foot fence has never stopped anybody, because you can build tunnels," he said.

He compared the fence with the Berlin Wall, saying that the United States should not be looking at Mexico as an enemy.

"These are our trading partners," he said. "All of a sudden you're building a wall for a specific group of people, which are the people that are wanting to come over here. Are those necessarily criminals? No."

Schwarzenegger also critiqued guest-worker proposals and said he supported a path to earned legalization for undocumented immigrants.

"The governor seemed to be trying to work out a position for himself" in his taped conversation, said Harry Pachon, president of USC's Tomas Rivera Policy Institute.

Pachon said the governor's opinions are shared by many Californians.

"He reflects a segment of the California electorate that is really frustrated and puzzled with the immigration issue," Pachon said. "The answers aren't easy."

The governor's frankness is what worries immigrant rights groups, which say they now have a much clearer view of his true beliefs.

At one point, to illustrate immigrants' lack of assimilation, he described a shopping mall in Lynwood called Plaza Mexico.

"Literally I felt I was in Mexico City," he said. "Everyone only spoke Spanish, every shop was in Spanish, every sign was in Spanish. They create a Mexico within California."

And he compared the United States with a home where some guests help out and others don't.

"Look, you want to come in here as a guest … then behave as if you are a guest," he said. "But what do we see in return? We see protesters carrying the Mexican flag…. And stepping on the American flag and speaking in Spanish and talking about, 'We are here, and we're going to stay.' "

Immigrant rights groups said the governor was simply wrong about the lack of integration.

DOJ_NMG_0129859

"Integration is in the eye of the beholder," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. "Somebody might say that because of his accent, the governor hasn't integrated fully."

Salas added that the governor should be "more careful about what he says about the very people who are sustaining the economy."

"He needs to be much more appreciative of all the opportunities he himself has had as an immigrant," Salas said, adding that not everyone becomes a movie star or marries a Kennedy.

Eddie "El Piolin" Sotelo, a popular Spanish-language radio personality, said the governor's remarks made him want to work harder to prove that immigrants play a key role in U.S. society.

"We love this country, and we want to be a part of it," said Sotelo, who helped mobilize immigrants to march for their rights last year. "We are working every day to integrate."

State Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) called Schwarzenegger's remarks "abhorrent" and said he should visit her district in East Los Angeles.

"He would find Mexican Americans proud of their Mexican roots, but who call themselves American, speak English and aspire to the American dream, just like him and his family," she said.

Romero, however, praised Schwarzenegger for having compassion for undocumented immigrants with U.S.-born children. The governor said in the conversations that it would be "almost impossible" to send millions of illegal immigrants back home.

"Some have families," he said. "The children that were born here are American citizens. So how do you split that family up? So it doesn't make sense."

Torres, the former advisor, said the governor needed to learn more about the Latino community.

"We take solace in this one thing — that those comments were made in April and that they will not be made again, in public or in private," he said.

Immigration Becomes KKK Rallying Point (USAT)

By Theodore Kim And Emily Bazar

USA Today, February 9, 2007

The Ku Klux Klan is stepping up its activities in some parts of the country, a trend that its leaders and opponents tie to anti-immigrant sentiment.

In the past year, the Klan has rallied or distributed fliers in Bloomington, Ind.; Amarillo, Texas; Denison, Iowa; and elsewhere. In each case, the white-supremacist group denounced illegal immigration or targeted communities with growing immigrant populations.

"It surprised me they came," says police Sgt. Randy TenBrink in Amarillo, site of a rally in August by the Texas chapter of the Empire Knights of the KKK. It is the only local KKK rally he knows of in 30 years. "The content of their message surprised me. It was so disjointed."

The Anti-Defamation League, a group that fights anti-Semitism and racism, released a report this week citing "a surprising and troubling resurgence" of KKK activity by long-standing and new groups. "They use this immigration issue to bring in others who feel like America is under siege," says Deborah Lauter, the ADL's national civil rights director. "It's easy for hate to spread."

The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate groups, also has charted an overall increase in KKK activity and says anti-immigrant sentiment is a primary driver, says Mark Potok, director of the center's tracking operation. The number of KKK groups rose from 110 in 2000 to 179 in 2005 but fell to about 150 last year, Potok says.

The behavior parallels the periods after Sept. 11, 2001, and the launch of the Iraq war in 2003. Extremist groups recruited new members by targeting Muslims, says William Aponte, the FBI's supervisory special agent for civil rights.

Phil Lawson, who says his title is "imperial wizard" of the United Northern and Southern Knights of the KKK, would not give membership numbers but says his group is growing.

He says last year it distributed 6,000 anti-immigrant newsletters in Bloomington and other Indiana communities calling for a rally and blaming illegal workers for taking jobs.

"Everyday that our government allows this Illegal Mexican Invasion to continue, our membership numbers continue to grow in the KKK," he says in an e-mail responding to questions.

In Denison, KKK members put recruitment fliers on parked cars in August, Police Chief Rod Bradley says. Storm Lake, Iowa, also was targeted.

Bradley says, "The two communities they targeted in western Iowa are both communities that have seen an influx of immigrants in the last 10 years."

Anti-immigrant Sentiments Fuel Ku Klux Klan Resurgence (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

The Ku Klux Klan appears to be on the rise again after years of irrelevance and splintered obscurity.

"Due to the successful exploitation of hot-button issues," the Klan has seen "a surprising and troubling resurgence," states a new report by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

Gay marriage and urban crime are part of the picture. But, in particular, it is the debate over what to do about the nation's nearly 35 million immigrants, of whom about 11 million are in the US illegally, that has become the Klan's main recruiting tool.

"If any one single issue or trend can be credited with reenergizing the Klan, it is the debate over immigration in America," says Deborah Lauter, the ADL's civil rights director. "New groups [are] sprouting in parts of the country that have not seen much activity."

In addition to the South, where the Ku Klux Klan was founded by Confederate Civil War veterans in 1866, this now includes active or growing Klan chapters in Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Iowa, Nebraska, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

There is no centralized organization, and membership numbers are estimates at best – 5,000 to 8,000 in as many as 179 Klan groups, according to the ADL, a group that fights bigotry, especially anti-Semitism, and the Southern Poverty Law Center, a civil rights law firm and education center.

But it is the increase in activity, including rallies, recruitment drives, and distribution of racist literature, and the partnering with skinheads, neo-Nazis, and other kinds of hate groups, that civil rights groups find troubling.

As it did from its founding, the KKK views itself has having a religious dimension. Members see "lighting" a cross as a symbol of faith. Today, Christian Evangelicals are much more likely than mainstream Protestants or Roman Catholics to believe that "newcomers threaten traditional American customs and values," according to the Pew Research Center.

It is this trend in attitudes that the Klan hopes to use in recruiting new supporters among those opposed to US immigration policies and practices, according to Klan leaders and expert observers.

In a way, it's a reversion to the Klan's nativist origins.

"While we generally think of it as a white supremacist organization, the Klan at its peak was virulently anti-immigrant, particularly with regard to Catholic immigrants, Irish, and southern European," says Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University, San Bernardino.

That was in the 1920s, when the Klan numbered about 4.5 million. The KKK had dropped to an estimated 60,000 members during the civil rights era (1954-65) and had bottomed out at fewer than 2,000 members by the mid-1970s, says Mr. Levin, a civil rights attorney who teaches criminal justice.

Levin notes that any rise in KKK activity and membership today comes off a near-historic low, and "some of the chapters are rather slim pickings."

"I'm more worried about the exploitation of the immigration issue generally than I am about the Klan exploiting it," says Levin. "I think the Klan is going to hit a ceiling because of the negative symbolism, the negative baggage."

But, he adds, "The whole nature of hate group membership has changed with the advent of the Internet. You can take bits and pieces from whatever group you like without necessarily becoming a card- carrying member."

Although some KKK adherents still don robes and pointed hoods to hold rallies and burn crosses, younger followers are more likely to look like skinheads or neo-Nazis, decorated with racist tattoos and listening to white power rock bands such as Skrewdriver and Brutal Attack.

During the first half of this decade the number of hate groups in the US increased 33 percent to 803, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center. The Ku Klux Klan was an important part of that increase.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Defends Request For Jet (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi yesterday defended her bid for a large U.S. Air Force jet to take her home and back to Washington nonstop -- and the White House backed her up.

Mrs. Pelosi suggested that former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be involved in leaking information about her request.

DOJ_NMG_0129861

"It still raises the question, why would the Department of Defense not be denying this information that has been conveyed?" the California Democrat told reporters. "Why are they feeding the flames? Of course I have been a constant critic -- for nearly three years, I've called for the resignation of Donald Rumsfeld, who still has a desk at the Department of Defense, and I guess any chance they have ..."

Larry Di Rita, Mr. Rumsfeld's spokesman while defense secretary, responded, "Secretary Rumsfeld's priorities while in office did not allow for time to get too involved in member travel issues, and I doubt that has changed since he left."

The Washington Times first reported last week on Mrs. Pelosi's request, saying she wanted a larger plane and more passengers than afforded her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican. The Air Force allotted Mr. Hastert a small, 12-seat commuter jet to ferry him to his Illinois district.

As her office pressed the Pentagon for a large plane, and a staunch ally, Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, called defense officials on her behalf, Mrs. Pelosi said she does not particularly want a military jet and would be happy to fly commercially.

"I don't even like having the security," Mrs. Pelosi said. "I would rather travel on the plane with my friends to get some work done. I like my freedom, but there are certain sacrifices you have to make when you are speaker of the House."

The Pentagon told Mrs. Pelosi in a letter on Wednesday that it cannot guarantee her a plane capable of flying to California nonstop -- as she requested.

White House press secretary Tony Snow defended Mrs. Pelosi against Republican criticism and labeled as "silly" press coverage of her request for a plane and the flexibility of transporting aides, lawmakers and family members. President Bush has reached out to Mrs. Pelosi in a bid to reach agreement on major legislation, such as immigration reform.

"This is a silly story, and I think it's been unfair to the speaker," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Snow's defense put him at odds with the Republican Party, and also Republicans on Capitol Hill who have blasted Mrs. Pelosi for demanding a perk reserved for the president and vice president and a few Cabinet members.

Mrs. Pelosi also asked the Air Force to fly her and her colleagues to a Democratic Party retreat in Williamsburg, where Mr. Bush appeared. The Air Force declined the request, saying it was not allowed under Defense Department directives.

Mrs. Pelosi said, "I'm not saying that I am being discriminated against because I am a woman, I'm just saying as the first woman speaker, I have no intention of having less respect for the office I hold than all of the other speakers that have come before me."

Mrs. Pelosi stayed quiet after The Times first reported the story. But as criticism grew and the story was picked up by media outlets such as Fox News and CNN, she began making TV appearances to defend her request.

Asked later in the day if the White House differed with its own party, Mr. Snow said:

"And I'll just repeat our position, which is as speaker of the House, she is entitled to military transport and that the ... the proper arrangements are being made between the sergeant of arms office in the House of Representatives and the U.S. Department of Defense. We think it's appropriate, and so I -- again, I think this is much ado about not a whole lot. It is important for the speaker to have this kind of protection and travel. It was certainly appropriate for Speaker Hastert. And so we trust that all sides will get this worked out."

Republicans did not see it that way.

Members quickly drafted an amendment to an environmental bill on the House floor, forcing Democrats to debate Mrs. Pelosi and military planes for two hours.

"The Congress also finds that in order to lessen United States dependence on foreign sources of petroleum, and decrease demand for petroleum in aircraft, such as passenger planes with 42 business-class seats capable of transcontinental flights, the nation must diversify its fuel supply for aircraft to include domestically produced alternative fuels," says the amendment, a clear reference to the large jet requested by Mrs. Pelosi's office.

The Washington Times reported yesterday that the Defense Department sent a letter to Mrs. Pelosi that limits her choice of aircraft to commuter-sized planes that would have to be refueled. The letter said the Pentagon could not guarantee access to larger jets, and it stated rules for carrying family members and lawmakers.

The 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force base operates three jets that can make the nonstop flight year-round: the C-32 (Boeing 757); a C-40 (Boeing 737) and the C-20, a Gulfstream jet.

Mr. Murtha is playing hardball.

"I don't need to pressure them," he told reporters, when asked about his calls to the Pentagon. "I just tell them what they need to do."

Mr. Murtha warned the Pentagon against leaking information that makes Mrs. Pelosi look bad.

"They're making a mistake when they leak it because she decides on allocations for them," he said, referring to the Pentagon budget.

Rep. Tom Cole, Oklahoma Republican and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, responded:

"It is irresponsible and reckless for Congressman Murtha to use funding needed for the protection of our country and for our men and women in uniform as leverage in order for Nancy Pelosi to travel from coast to coast like a movie star. We are a country at war, and I think it is time for the Democrat majority to get their priorities straight."

In a statement yesterday, House Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood assumed responsibility for the decision to request a larger plane for Mrs. Pelosi.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security reasons, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," he said. "Such an aircraft will ensure communications capabilities and also enhance security."

He also said he regrets "that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

Speaker's Plane Becomes A Point Of Criticism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — It is quite a way from Washington to San Francisco, but evidently nothing like the distance separating House Democrats and Republicans when it comes to the air travel arrangements of Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Republicans, accusing Ms. Pelosi of putting on royal airs, on Thursday stepped up their campaign to portray her as a luxury-loving San Franciscan because her cross-country travel could require a larger military jet than the one used since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to ferry Speaker J. Dennis Hastert home to Illinois.

Ms. Pelosi and fellow Democrats said that House security officials insisted that she travel in a government plane and that if she had her way she would fly on commercial craft. They suggested that Republicans were hypocritical, scheming sexists trying to deny the speaker the same protection afforded her male predecessor.

The House debate poked fun at the speaker's love of chocolate, lamented the torment of missed connections and middle seats and speculated about whether Senator John McCain of Arizona or Senator Barack Obama of Illinois would draw bigger crowds in an airport than Ms. Pelosi.

The White House weighed in, as well. "This is a silly story," its spokesman, Tony Snow, said.

Mr. Snow said that the Republican criticism was unfair and that the Bush administration essentially sided with Ms. Pelosi.

The attention to the dispute illustrates that politicians are acutely aware that a jet-setting image can be dangerous, particularly given the travails of modern travel for average Americans.

President Bill Clinton spent a long time living down the tale of his haircut on Air Force One as flights were delayed at Los Angeles International Airport, even though there is dispute over whether other planes were affected.

The image of Newt Gingrich complaining about his forced rear-exit departure from Air Force One earned him a reputation as a petulant pol. And John H. Sununu, a former White House chief of staff, was ridiculed for using government jets to visit the dentist and the ski slopes.

When Republicans learned that Ms. Pelosi was trying to upgrade at taxpayer expense, they caricatured her as an imperial speaker even though no one uttered a peep about Mr. Hastert's reliance on military jets. Cornered by reporters on Thursday, Ms. Pelosi suggested that what she called a misinformation effort emanated from the Pentagon.

"Look, when I became speaker, the sergeant at arms said the speaker has transportation because of security," said Ms. Pelosi. "As a woman speaker of the House, I don't want any less opportunity than male speakers have had."

In a statement released on Thursday, the House sergeant-at-arms, Wilson Livingood, said he had been behind the call for the long-distance airplane. "The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security reasons," Mr. Livingood said, adding he regretted that the security concerns had become a political issue.

In a letter from the Pentagon that she received on Wednesday, Ms. Pelosi was assured that she would receive courtesy military shuttle service between Washington and San Francisco but that it might not always be nonstop. The letter said that she could not be given a plane to take her to political events and that family members would have to make some reimbursement.

House Republicans lined up on the floor to attack Ms. Pelosi and submitted a pointed amendment to a renewable energy bill that said the nation should decrease demand for jet fuel for aircraft "such as passenger planes with 42 business class seats capable of transcontinental fights."

Republicans said one plane that might be available for the speaker had a game room, stateroom, entertainment center and bedroom and seated 42 to 50 people.

“I hardly think these amenities help with security, and I personally would describe them as inappropriate and unnecessary extravagances,” said Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, chief deputy Republican whip and sponsor of the amendment.

Some Republicans were put off by the flight fight. “This is a bunch of baloney,” said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, who said he had flown on Mr. Hastert’s military plane.

“Next week,” Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, said, “we are going to steal their mascot and short-sheet their beds.”

White House Defends Pelosi's Access To Air Force Transport Plane (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrat Nancy Pelosi received some rare help Thursday from the White House against a barrage of Republican criticism over how the new House speaker intends to get back home.

For security reasons, Pelosi is entitled to fly to her San Francisco district on military planes.

The House sergeant-at-arms, who helps oversee security for the House, suggested that flying non-stop would be the safest way home for Pelosi, next after the vice president in the line of presidential succession.

Republicans, led by aggressive junior lawmakers, seized on the most extreme possibility: Pelosi's flying on the military equivalent of a Boeing 757 with the latest in travel comforts.

Too expensive, some critics said. Too polluting, others said. Too much ado about nothing, the White House weighed in.

"I have never asked for any larger plane," Pelosi said. "I have said that I am happy to ride commercial if the plane they have doesn't go coast to coast."

To presidential spokesman Tony Snow, "This is a silly story and I think it's been unfair to the speaker."

During debate on a bill that encouraged research on advanced fuels, Republicans proposed an amendment urging planes diversify their fuel load to include "domestically produced alternative fuels."

The amendment singled out "passenger planes with 42 business class seats capable of transcontinental flights" — exactly the specifications of an Air Force C-32 jet.

"The jet that Pelosi has produces 10,000 pounds of carbon dioxide an hour, far more than the previous speaker used," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. Pelosi's predecessor was Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Flying in a large Air Force plane, Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., said, "appears to remove any spending controls from our operations and dramatically increases our impact on the environment especially climate change."

Snow, too, came under criticism.

"He does not have a duty, as I do, to come to this floor and to discuss the consequences for our taxpayers," said Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration agreed to provide Hastert with a military plane for added security during trips back home. Hastert flew in a commuter-sized Air Force jet.

House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood said in a statement he recommended the Pentagon continue the practice, begun with Hastert, of flying the speaker back home.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making non-stop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," he said.

The Pentagon this week told Pelosi's staff she would be provided with a plane but the size would be based on availability and non-stop service could not be guaranteed.

The Defense Department's guidelines say Pelosi could be accompanied by family members, provided they pay the government coach fare. The plane could not be used for travel to political events. Members of Congress could join her if the House ethics committee clears the travel.

Pelosi speculated that Pentagon officials were distorting the story as retribution for her stance against the war and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"Why would the Department of Defense be not denying this information that has been conveyed?" she asked. "Why are they feeding the flames?"

Snow called Pelosi's office to make sure she knew the White House supported her use of a military plane.

He also distanced the White House from the GOP's take on the matter. The Republican National Committee said Pelosi was on a "power trip." Snow, asked whether the RNC is free to go after Pelosi on its own, said, "Well, apparently they did this time."

Sensenbrenner Stuns Pelosi, White House Defends Her (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 9, 2007

A new split has emerged between House Republicans and President Bush in dealing with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.): House GOPers have chosen to keep her close; Bush has chosen to keep her closer.

Pelosi experienced the effect of the new strategy yesterday when Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) stunned her by using a procedural tactic to force her to answer questions from members of the Science Committee and White House spokesman Tony Snow defended her right to travel nonstop across the country aboard a military jet.

After Pelosi finished making an opening statement on global warming before the Science panel, Sensenbrenner employed House Rule XI, which allows lawmakers to question witnesses for five minutes.

The move flustered Science Committee Chairman Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) and committee aides. Gordon asked for unanimous consent to waive the rules, but Sensenbrenner did not agree.

It is rare that the House Speaker, who does not vote on or sponsor legislation, would testify before a committee; it is rarer still that lawmakers would force one of their own to submit to questioning. Lawmakers testify in committees all the time, but their colleagues routinely dispense with all but the friendliest questions.

Pelosi delivered an opening statement at a hearing where scientists from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) testified about a report issued last week that said humans "very likely" have caused global warming.

"It's tough being in the minority, but the American people are looking for cooperation on this very serious issue and the Speaker showed today she's willing to talk about the issue with anyone anywhere," said a spokesman for Pelosi.

Sensenbrenner responded in a statement to Pelosi's allegation that "for 12 years, the [GOP] leadership stifled all discussion and debate of global warming. The long rejection of reality is over, to the relief of members on both sides of the aisle."

Sensenbrenner, chairman of the Science Committee from 1997 to 2001, said he held hearings on global warming. He then asked Pelosi to explain the economic impact of policies that would slow global warming.

"He's a rules kind of guy and he felt he had a right to question her," said Sensenbrenner's spokesman, Raj Bharwani. Whether Sensenbrenner's plan was premeditated or extemporaneous is unclear. Sensenbrenner rarely talks to reporters without an appointment.

Rep. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) asked Pelosi whether her views on the use of nuclear energy had changed since she arrived in Congress 20 years ago. Pelosi said she believed that all options to reduce global warming should be open for discussion.

Gordon then jumped in and asked Pelosi to talk about the proposed global-warming select committee.

"The hearing may have gotten off to a rocky start, but it ended up being one of Congress's most productive hearings on climate change to date," Gordon said.

Rep. Jerry Costello (D-Ill.) rescued Pelosi from further questioning. He noted that most lawmakers are extended the courtesy of not being subjected to questions and suggested that, in the interest of time and busy schedules, the panel should move forward.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) agreed and the questioning ceased.

It was an inauspicious start to a day when Sensenbrenner's younger GOP colleagues subjected Pelosi to withering criticism over whether she should be allowed to use a military jet to fly to and from her San Francisco congressional district and Washington, D.C.

On the House floor, Republicans sought to attach an amendment to legislation promoting alternative-fuels research — the first debate under an open rule in three years — barring Pelosi from using the plane.

But their move backfired when White House spokesman Tony Snow defended the Speaker.

"I think this is much ado about not a whole lot. It is important for the speaker to have this kind of protection and travel," he told reporters yesterday. "It was certainly appropriate for Speaker Hastert. And so we trust that all sides will get this worked out."

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally, said, "It's a silly issue. These guys [Republicans] tend to forget they lost."

After the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, Rep. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who was then the Speaker, began using a 12-seat Air Force jet to fly between D.C. and his district, close to Chicago.

The House sergeant at arms defended Pelosi, stating that it is his responsibility to ensure members' safety and that he made the recommendation to use military aircraft with the ability to travel cross-country nonstop.

"The Speaker requires additional precautions due to her responsibilities as the leader of the House and her Constitutional position as second in the line of succession to the presidency," he said in a statement. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

Pelosi Strikes Back At Plane Critics (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) struck back at her Republican foes who continued to blast her Thursday on the use of military transport to travel regularly back to her California district.

Pelosi released a rare statement from House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood on Thursday afternoon in which he took responsibility for requesting an aircraft that would enable the Speaker to fly coast-to-coast without stopping and expressed "regret" that the issue was being used for political purposes.

"In a post-9/11 threat environment, it is reasonable and prudent to provide military aircraft to the Speaker for official travel between Washington and her district," Livingood said. "The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable."

"I made the recommendation to use military aircraft based upon the need to provide necessary levels of security for ranking national leaders, such as the Speaker," Livingood added. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

At the same time, Appropriations subcommittee on Defense Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.), who lobbied the Pentagon for a larger plane, announced that he planned to hold hearings on the use of military aircraft for executive branch and Congressional travel over the past two fiscal years. Murtha predicted that despite the flap, Pelosi would end up with a plane capable of making the coast-to-coast trip.

"I would predict she would" get a larger plane, he said Thursday. "I'm seldom wrong on these kinds of things."

Meanwhile, Republicans continued to have a political field day with the Speaker's travel arrangements, expounding on the issue for much of Thursday afternoon on the House floor. In a direct jab at Pelosi, an amendment authored by House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) passed overwhelmingly, 385-23. The amendment called on the nation to "diversify its fuel supply" for passenger planes, especially those with "42 business class seats capable of transcontinental flights."

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill called the move a "ridiculous distraction from the real issues."

"It just shows just how desperate and devoid of ideas the minority party has become," he said.

After remaining relatively mum on the burgeoning public relations disaster, Pelosi addressed the issue publicly on Thursday. The new Speaker told reporters that she would be "happy" to fly commercially, but that the Sergeant-at-Arms had requested that she not do so for security reasons.

"I have never asked for any larger plane. I have said that I am happy to ride commercial if the plane they have doesn't go coast-to-coast," Pelosi said. "This is a myth that [the Republicans] are talking about on the floor. They have nothing to say to the American people about the war, the economy, global warming and the rest. So they have this game they're playing."

But Pelosi questioned the motives behind the "misinformation" flowing from the Pentagon on the issue, while pointedly noting that President Bush was "insistent" that she be provided a certain level of security.

And White House spokesman Tony Snow bolstered that view Thursday, saying of the plane controversy, "This is a silly story and I think it's been unfair to the Speaker."

Unnamed administration sources and Congressional Republicans have pounced on the issue of how Pelosi will travel between Washington, D.C., and her home district. They say the new Speaker has demanded a luxury aircraft used only by the vice president and first lady, top Cabinet officials and generals. But Pelosi insists she has not requested a specific plane, but has been told by the Sergeant-at-Arms and Air Force that it would be safer and more efficient for her to travel nonstop to California from Washington.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the policy was changed so that then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) would be granted military transport to his Illinois district for official business.

While Republicans claim Pelosi is asking for more than what Hastert was given, the problem actually lies in aircraft availability. The fleet used is from the 89th Airlift Wing located at Andrews Air Force Base and includes the small, Lear-type jet used by Hastert to fly to Illinois, as well as two Gulfstream jets, a C-20 and C-37, which could potentially make it nonstop to California under the right weather and weight conditions.

But if the weather does not cooperate, the only other options may be larger, more deluxe planes typically used by top government officials. For example, the 89th Airlift Wing contains a C-32A, the military equivalent of a Boeing 757 that often flies the vice president as "Air Force Two." That plane seats 45 and has 16 crew members. The Wing also counts in its fleet a C-40B, a refurbished Boeing 737 that can hold up to 32 passengers and 10 crew. The wing's Web site states that the C-40B is designed as an "office in the sky" and is equipped with a crew rest area, distinguished visitor compartment with sleep accommodations and business-class seating with worktables.

But in a statement on Wednesday, the Defense Department said that while it would provide Pelosi with a plane, it could not guarantee nonstop flights to California. Thus, it is unclear what kind of plane Pelosi ultimately will fly on, or even whether she will be able to consistently use the same plane in her trips home.

The Pelosi Non-story (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

IN CASE YOU WERE worried that the 110th Congress was producing debate of too much substance, this week House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) stands accused of everything from hypocrisy on global warming to wrongheadedness about Iraq — all based on a request she never exactly made for a jumbo-sized military jet that she has never actually flown aboard as speaker.

The fuss started last week, but conservatives waited until Wednesday to really let loose the dogs of warp. At issue is the appropriate mode of transport between Washington and Pelosi's home in the Bay Area. In the old days, the speaker of the House would have just taken a commercial flight, but after 9/11 it was decided that the No. 2 in line for the presidency should travel with more security, so the military began providing jets and Air Force crews.

Inconveniently for Pelosi, the small jets that were used to shuttle former Speaker J. Dennis Hastert between the Beltway and Illinois can't make it to the West Coast in bad weather without stopping to refuel. So her office asked if the rules allowed her to take a larger jet capable of flying nonstop, such as a C-40, which contains beds and business-class seating. Then a firestorm erupted.

The right-leaning Washington Times wrote a blistering editorial accusing Pelosi of being an elitist and wasting taxpayer money. Prominent Republicans in Congress followed suit, and CNN's Lou Dobbs groused that "Nancy Pelosi … can now fly in style at your expense."

At least 21 government officials can request transport via C-40, including those as far down on the presidential succession list as the secretary of education; to do so is hardly an abuse of power. Even the Bush administration, rarely shy about slinging partisan mud, seems disgusted by the attacks on Pelosi. "This is a silly story, and I think it's been unfair to the speaker," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday.

By then, the crazy train had long left the station. The New York Post, under an editorial headlined "Nancy Pelosi, Carbon Criminal," accused the speaker of being insincere about fighting global climate change. The Republican Study Committee, a coalition of conservative members of Congress, issued a statement equating Pelosi's inquiry with Democratic opposition to President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq; it seems the jet proves that Democrats have skewed judgment about what's in the national interest.

Hopefully, the federal government can figure out how senior political officials can fly coast to coast both in safety and nonstop. Until then, buckle up — the hot air ahead is likely to be turbulent.

Senate Weighs Spending Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Stalled on Iraq, the Senate turned to domestic business, hoping to send a giant spending bill to President Bush next week to fill the gap left by the collapse of the budget process under Republican rule last year.

The $463.5 billion measure keeps to the limits set by the White House, but imposes a strong Democratic imprint on funding for the rest of the fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

Veterans medical services, education, transit and health care will see spending increases. There are more subtle changes as well: $460 million in low-income housing assistance will be redistributed nationally, with cities such as New York and Los Angeles among the losers. And despite a self-imposed moratorium on spending earmarks for lawmakers' districts, oil and research programs at the National Energy Technology Laboratory, or NETL, in West Virginia could benefit, thanks to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.).

Most of the government has operated under a stopgap funding resolution that has become untenable and is due to expire Feb. 15. The budget package calls for keeping agencies at the same spending levels as in fiscal 2006, but with exceptions granted to meet targeted needs over the last eight months of this fiscal year.

In the case of NETL, Congress in 2006 provided more than $62 million, but had expected to cut back this year because a second source of funds came into play as a result of the 2005 energy act. That measure designated $50 million from royalty receipts go to this research, of which NETL would get $12.5 million.

But under the bill, both the 2006 appropriations and the extra money authorized by the energy bill look available. Sen. Byrd isn't alone among NETL's champions; it also has a big campus in Pennsylvania and smaller offices in three other states. But Sen. Byrd resisted House suggestions that offsetting cuts be made, in light of the new money.

Mr. Byrd's office said the energy secretary has complete discretion over how to distribute the funds within the total of $581 million provided for fossil-energy research in the bill.

This poses a test for the Bush administration, which has proposed to eliminate the oil and gas research programs and repeal the $50 million mandated by the energy act. "We're going to obey the law," a Department of Energy official said yesterday. He conceded that the administration has been slow in releasing the $50 million this year, and said it is an open question if the oil and gas research programs constituted an earmark.

In the case of allocating rental vouchers under the Section 8 low-income housing program, the updated distribution formula has been championed by public-housing groups, but also creates its own set of winners and losers at the local level.

The Los Angeles city housing authority could lose as much as $22 million, even as Oakland gains $15.4 million, for example. "We are concerned about the significant loss of the Section 8 funds," said Lourdes Castro-Ramirez, who oversees the program in Los Angeles.

On the House floor, another issue loomed larger: the cost of flying Speaker Nancy Pelosi to her home in California. Since the September 2001 terrorist attacks, a military plane has been available for the security of the speaker. But since Ms. Pelosi must travel across the country to return home, a dispute has flared about how big a plane should be provided to cover the distance without refueling.

Ms. Pelosi said she was happy to fly commercial, but Republicans took to the floor, saying the plane could cost as much as $22,000 an hour and was excessive.

Rep. Ralph Hall (R., Texas), upset he missed his own flight home amid the uproar, gently chastised his colleagues for "throwing things at one another when there's better work to do."

"It might be a little cheaper on my government for me to ride the bus from here to Dallas every week," Mr. Hall said. "Maybe we could talk about that some afternoon. Why doesn't Ralph Hall ride the bus to Texas and back every week."

Wartime Budgeting (WP)

IN AN OTHERWISE lean budget, President Bush's defense spending request has produced some sticker shock. The $481 billion proposal for fiscal 2008 reflects an 11 percent increase over this year; including funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the $623 billion total is 60 percent larger than the defense budget that Mr. Bush inherited in 2001. Some analysts argue that the spending is historically outsized, pointing out that the total spent or requested for the two ongoing wars is greater than the cost incurred in Vietnam.

In fact there is some excess in the Pentagon's spending plan -- but many of the comparisons being drawn are deceiving. As a share of the U.S. economy, defense spending was at a near-historic low before Sept. 11, 2001, and even if Mr. Bush's new budget is fully funded, it will still be well below the average over the past century. Defense spending is now just under 4 percent of gross domestic product, compared with 9.5 percent during Vietnam; the Reagan-era buildup took a 50 percent larger piece of national output.

A big part of the new spending meets demands that Democrats in Congress have been making for some time. There is $12 billion for a first installment in the long-overdue increase in the size of the regular Army and Marine Corps; more than $50 billion has been aimed at restocking equipment, including $21 billion for the National Guard. For the first time the administration has included a realistic cost figure for war expenses -- $142 billion -- in the regular budget.

The reality that the budget reflects is that U.S. defense spending will have to return in the years ahead to its historic level of 5 percent of GDP -- at least -- and remain there for some time. That's because the American role in heading off threats in an increasingly disorderly world will not change soon, and because the military faces the need to replace aging tanks, planes and ships with 21st-century systems. If anything, the new budget low-balls the numbers. Nothing has been budgeted to pay for the current "surge" of Iraq forces beyond the end of September, and only $50 billion is in the budget projections for war spending in 2009.

Acknowledging that defense spending must rise doesn't mean there is nothing to trim in the new budget. Tucked in the $170 billion of procurement spending is money for Cold War weapons systems that the Pentagon has tenaciously clung to: Among them are another nuclear-powered aircraft carrier and 20 more F-22 tactical fighter planes. There is another $10 billion for missile defense, even though the intercontinental defense system still needs considerably more testing.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) had a point this week in saying that, in view of the squeeze defense spending is placing on the rest of the budget, Congress ought to consider an exceptional means of funding it, such as a "war on terrorism tax." It remains the case that Mr. Bush has not asked citizens to make any wartime sacrifice to accompany those of military personnel and their families. If the United States is involved in a "long war" that will be the defining conflict of the 21st century, as Mr. Bush believes, then higher defense spending is certainly appropriate -- but so is some means to pay for it.

Budget Games That Hurt Children (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

It was one of those moments when a public official gives away a larger truth by offering what seems to be a throwaway line.

Testifying this week on President Bush's budget, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. suggested he would not mind a bit if the Democratic Congress added money to prevent cutbacks in coverage under the federal government's children's health insurance program.

"It just may be," Paulson said mildly, "that the Congress believes that that's something that should be funded at a higher level."

In other words, Bush's budget is a collection of artificial numbers -- including cuts in domestic programs that Congress will inevitably reverse -- that allow the president to claim fiscal responsibility while demanding that his tax cuts for the wealthy be made permanent.

The cutbacks in health coverage for lower-income working families are among the most egregious of the president's fiscal choices. And it's not just Democrats who are saying so.

"These cuts interfere with the fundamental responsibility of government: to safeguard the lives of its citizens," said Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell, a member of that small, hardy group of Northeastern Republicans to survive November's Democratic tide.

"Whether we are helping struggling families stay warm through the harsh winter months or protecting homes and residents against terrorism and natural disasters, we expect our federal partners to carry their fair share," she said. "The cuts to these programs place extraordinary burdens on the states."

Or consider the response of the Rev. Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA. "The president's new budget," he said, "hurts those living in poverty at a time when we should be doing even more to help the most vulnerable among us."

You'd think Bush would understand this since he regularly praises faith-based groups and long ago touted himself as a compassionate conservative. After all, the president made big news last week when he finally acknowledged what has been close to unmentionable in his administration. "The fact is," he said, "that income inequality is real." Facts, as Ronald Reagan observed, are stubborn things.

But this is a budget destined to make income inequality much worse. The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities has created a chart that should be a centerpiece of discussions concerning Bush's accounting.

The center examined what the White House's proposals would mean in 2012, the magical year in which Bush -- with much flimflammery -- claims his plan will produce a surplus. It found that, if enacted, the president's budget would lead that year to $73 billion in tax cuts for households with annual incomes of over $1 million and $34 billion in cuts to domestic discretionary programs, many of them benefiting Americans of low and middle incomes.

So here is a president who believes passionately in redistributing income -- upward.

As Rell suggested, there are plenty of problems with Bush's budget, and with Republican governors complaining (Rell is not alone), even members of Congress from the president's own party will quietly turn their backs on parts of his plan.

But the most shameful move may be the poorly disguised reduction in SCHIP, the program for working families with kids whose households earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but too little to afford private coverage -- exactly the sorts of hardworking citizens welfare reformers claim to love.

At a time when so many Americans are losing private medical insurance, the SCHIP program -- passed in 1997 with strong bipartisan support -- is one of the few government efforts working against that dangerous trend.

The program now covers about 6 million children over the course of a year. A president who cared about inequality would presumably be proposing to expand the program to cover the remaining 6 million lower-income children who still lack health coverage. At modest cost and in a rather simple way, Bush could get credit for taking a measured but significant step toward universal coverage.

Instead, Bush proposes what's called an increase in SCHIP funding of $4.2 billion over five years that has the practical effect of cutting into the number of children who are covered. Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the Finance Committee chairman and no flaming liberal, has estimated it would take $15 billion over that period just to maintain current coverage levels.

The president is far more committed to cutting taxes for Paulson's old Wall Street pals than to getting health coverage to kids with low-wage working parents. It's to Paulson's credit that, judging by his words at least, he appeared to be embarrassed. Clearly Bush isn't.

Potomac Watch It's A Trough Life (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

This budget week, there was one thing on which Democrats and Republicans agreed: It's time to do something about earmarks. And in a nod to voter disapproval with these special-interest projects, this year Congress will do its pork spending in secret.

Welcome to Congress's new and dirtier earmark game, in which the big spenders are setting all the rules. In front of the cameras, both parties claim to have found earmark religion, and are talking up a bill that would reform the way Congress asks for billions in goodies for lawmakers' home districts. Behind the scenes, they're working feverishly to keep the earmarks rolling, this time using a technique outside of the legislative process and hidden from public view.

The gears on this new underground earmarking machine started whirring late last year, when Republicans failed in a lame-duck session to pass the 2007 spending bills. The GOP pork crowd wanted to use its last weeks in power to push through 12,000 more bridges to nowhere. Saner heads noted that the party had just lost an election in part due to these corrupting payoffs and urged restraint. The standoff resulted in Republicans punting the 2007 spending responsibility to the Democrats.

That put the new House appropriations chief, Wisconsin's David Obey -- a spender for our time -- in the distasteful position of having to live up to his party's election promises to fix the earmark boondoggle. He begrudgingly promised a "moratorium." And last week, when Mr. Obey celebrated the passage of his $464 billion 2007 spending bill, he bragged that Democrats had fulfilled their promise and "stripped all earmarks from the measure."

"This decision doesn't come without pain," intoned Mr. Obey. "Many worthwhile earmarks are not funded in this measure, but we had to take this step to clear the decks, clean up the process and start over."

The key language here is "not funded in this measure," and it explains why Mr. Obey is still smiling through his pain. Congressional members, led by appropriators and an army of staff, have already figured out a new way to keep their favors in the money, and it might as well be called 1-800-EARMARKS (which unfortunately is already taken). All across Washington, members are at this moment phoning budget officers at federal agencies -- Interior, Defense, HUD, you name it -- privately demanding that earmarks in previous legislation be fully renewed again this year. There might not be a single official earmark in the 2007 spending bill, but thousands are in the works all the same.

And getting far less scrutiny than before -- if that's even possible. Under this new regime, members don't even have to go to the trouble of slipping an earmark into a committee report, where it might later (once the voting is over) come in for criticism. All the profligates need now to keep the money flowing is a quiet office and a cellphone.

Despite a congressional desire to keep this quiet, the evidence of marathon dialing is mounting. Lobbyists, thrilled their clients are still getting earmark handouts, are now publicly crowing about this underground program. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn -- anti-earmark warriors -- sent a letter to the Department of Energy last week wanting to know how that agency was handling the demands. On the same day, DOE chief of staff Jeffrey Kupfer delivered an internal memo to agency officers acknowledging that "offices have begun to receive requests from some Congressional offices, asking that the Department continue to fund programs or activities that received earmarked funds in prior years," and laying out a procedure for handling such orders.

The big question now is how aggressively the Bush administration intends to respond to this latest earmark insult. The president has made earmarks a priority, calling in his State of the Union for Congress to cut these special projects in half, and also for a more transparent process in which all earmarks are analyzed and debated. In a Manassas, Va., speech this week, President Bush complained again about how shady earmarks are, and referred to a stack of congressional committee reports (a favorite place for legislators to hide their pork) to make his point.

But by today's secret telephone standards, even conference reports look fulsome. This new practice also brings the added complication that the administration's own agencies could be complicit in this underground funding. Agency staffs understand they are dependent on Congress for funding, and that the 2008 budget process is now underway. Thumbing their noses at appropriators is an invitation for retribution. Which is why one appropriations lobbyist was gleefully quoted this week as noting that congressional calls were so far being answered by agencies wholly in "the affirmative."

The administration has taken some steps to follow up on its earmark demands. In January, Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman sent a memo to every department and agency announcing new earmark requirements. From now on, the government will be required to identify and catalog earmarks in most spending bills, including earmarks hidden in committee reports. The memo also provided agencies with a tight definition of just what counts as an earmark, to make it harder for Congress to disguise its pork under another name.

That's useful for upcoming spending debates, but it doesn't shut down the current dial-a-thon. In last week's Energy Department memo, Mr. Kupfer noted that Mr. Obey's 2007 spending bill does not include earmarks, and that the agency is also not legally bound to honor prior projects. He directs the staff to carefully review any requests to renew earmarks and then decrees that "only those with meritorious proposals or programs that effectively support and advance the Department's missions and objectives . . . should receive FY 2007 funding." This is probably easier said than done, but it's a start. No word yet if other agencies are following suit.

If President Bush is serious about earmark reform, it would seem clear he's going to have to shame legislators into better behavior. This latest escapade shows how determined some in Congress are to keep their pork in place, regardless of what they tell the public. It's time to blow the whistle on those who would preach an earmark "moratorium" on the one hand, while reaching for the speed-dial with the other.

Proposed Lobbying Limits Apply To Only One Senator (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ethics legislation designed to prevent senators' spouses from lobbying the Senate seems to have a limited reach, allowing some husbands and wives to go about their business.

In fact, the legislation appears to affect the spouse of only one lawmaker: Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat.

Mr. Conrad's wife, Lucy Calautti, is a top lobbyist for Major League Baseball and is affiliated with the firm Baker Hostetler. She became a lobbyist after her 1987 marriage to Mr. Conrad, disqualifying her from an exception in the bill that would allow some Senate spouses to continue lobbying.

The provision, added by amendment into a larger ethics overhaul bill passed by the Senate last month, aims to prevent Senate spouses from lobbying the Senate. But it has an exception allowing those who became lobbyists at least one year before their marriage or their spouse's election to still lobby the chamber.

That exception applied to several Senate spouses, including the wife of Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat. Kimberly Dorgan is executive vice president of federal relations at the American Council of Life Insurers and has in the past registered to lobby the Senate along with others at her organization.

Mrs. Dorgan first became a lobbyist in the early 1980s, a few years before she and Mr. Dorgan were married.

Also exempt is Bob Dole, former Senate majority leader and husband of Sen. Elizabeth Dole, North Carolina Republican. He became a lobbyist before his wife was elected in 2002.

Two groups that follow lobbying as a family business said they think that Mrs. Calautti is the only spouse who will be affected by the Senate legislation.

"Kent Conrad is the only person, according to my records, who is going to be affected," said Craig Holman, campaign-finance lobbyist at Public Citizen.

"From what we can tell right now, it looks like this would apply to just one lawmaker, and that's Senator Kent Conrad," said Bill Allison of the Sunlight Foundation. "It's a little bit strange."

Mrs. Calautti declined to comment on the bill, which will force her to scale back her activities if it becomes law.

Mr. Conrad also declined to comment until the bill moves through Congress.

The amendment's sponsor, Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, has maintained that he did not keep track of who would be affected by the legislation. During debate on the bill, he said on the Senate floor that he could see an argument for getting rid of all exceptions, but he "tried to bend over backward for what I considered any legitimate argument."

Mr. Holman said the amendment is a good one because it would prevent future spouses from becoming lobbyists after their husbands or wives are elected. It would be unfair to ask spouses who already are lobbying to close up shop, he said.

Rep. Miller Helped Pursuit (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 9, 2007

For over two years, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) helped members of a southern California city council in their pursuit of federal and state funds for a wilderness preserve project that included the purchase of 165 acres that he owned.

The FBI is looking into whether Miller violated tax laws. He failed to pay capital gains taxes on the sale of his land to the City of Monrovia, claiming that the city imposed eminent domain, which allows a government agency to force a sale if it is deemed to be in the public interest. City of Monrovia officials deny that they invoked eminent domain.

Miller has said he has done nothing wrong. He describes himself as a victim of a media smear campaign and has since threatened to sue local officials for their public statements on the matter. Several calls to his office were not returned.

But relations with members of the Monrovia City Council were much friendlier some five to six years ago, when the city was trying to preserve 700 acres of foothills from development and was looking for money to buy land from Miller and others who owned property in the area.

According to minutes of Monrovia City Council meetings and interviews with several southern California city officials and former Miller staffers, Miller and his office were actively involved in trying to help the city locate federal and state money for the massive open-space project.

Miller had planned to build 60 multi-million-dollar homes on the land, and he repeatedly told the city of Monrovia that he didn't believe the city could come up with enough money to purchase that acreage — given that his ambitious development plans elevated its worth.

The city then passed an initiative to increase local taxes to raise money for the wilderness preserve project, which was designed to produce $10 million over its 30-year lifespan. The city wanted to drum up another $10 million in grants.

Miller stepped in to help, and early talks floated the possibility of inserting an earmark into an undetermined bill to provide the funds to the city, several sources said. But those talks were quickly abandoned when Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) resisted, according to city council minutes.

"Members of the City Council concurred, that after talking to Congressman Dreier individually recently, there was not money readily available to purchase the properties," read the minutes of a February 29, 2000, Monrovia City Council meeting.

Then-Monrovia City Council member Lara Larramendi Blakely recalled in an interview last year that Dreier had refused to help secure an earmark to purchase land that included Miller's because he thought it raised obvious conflict-of-interest issues.

Congressman Dreier said that he really could not support going after federal funds because Gary Miller's property was involved," said Larramendi Blakely, a Democratic politician who later became mayor and now works for Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.) "He didn't think it was right to try to get federal money that would benefit a sitting congressman."

In the same interview, Larramendi Blakely said she was not involved in detailed discussions with Miller other than their face-to-face meetings because other Republican members of the council were closer to him.

When she would visit Washington during lobbying trips, she said, Miller would ask her about the city's progress in obtaining the funds for the wilderness preserve.

"He would always ask, 'How's it going?'" she said.

After abandoning the earmark route, Miller continued trying to help the city locate public funds, the sources said, and in early 2001 he identified California Wildlife Conservation Board (WCB) grants for land acquisition as the best source. The WCB is underwritten in part by federal funds. The city of Monrovia applied for the grant and eventually received $8.6 million.

"Early on, the Wildlife Conservation Board (WCB) was pinpointed as the best location to seek matching grants," read the minutes of a May 28, 2002 Monrovia City Council meeting. "By June 2001, the City had entered an agreement with the WCB for as much as $9 million in matching grants, pending certification of property appraisals by the state Department of General Services (DGS)."

One of the city's initial assessments of the value of Miller's land was $6.6 million, but Miller balked at that amount. City officials then commissioned another appraisal, which came in at $12.2 million. Recognizing the sensitive nature of the deal, they commissioned a review of that appraisal, which backed up the $12.2 million figure, according to the May 28, 2002 council minutes.

Ultimately, however, the DGS certified a lower appraisal of $11.77 million, the final price of the land.

"Recognizing that a great deal of scrutiny would be placed on the purchase, City officials requested that DGS staff come to Monrovia to tour the property for themselves," the minutes state. "DGS ultimately certified a value of $11.77 million on the Miller property."

Miller, who had held the land since the 1980s, netted $10 million on the deal, but the purchase consumed a large portion of the funds the city had amassed for the wilderness project from both the tax and the WCB grant, leaving little for the 150 acres the city still wanted to attain.

Again, Miller agreed to help and was more open about doing so because the city had already purchased his land, according to Sept. 24, 2002 council minutes. That month, city officials traveled to Washington to meet with Miller and the office of Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) to discuss efforts to secure federal money for the project.

After the trip, Rob Hammond, who was serving as Monrovia's mayor pro tem at the time, reported that the trip had been worthwhile.

"[Hammond] also met with Senator Boxer's office and presented acquisition needs for open space in Monrovia," the minutes state. "Councilmember [Joe] Garcia and [Tom] Adams met with Congressman Gary Miller who does want to assist Monrovia now that he no longer owns property in Monrovia."

Then-Assistant City Manager Scott Ochoa reported that Boxer and Miller provided the city with an "account number" for the Environmental Protection Agency that would help them apply for grants for the wilderness project.

"Assistant City Manager Scott Ochoa reported that an EPA account number to apply for funds had been received from both Senator Boxer's and Congressman Miller's offices in response to the Council members [sic] trip," the Sept. 24 minutes continue. "Mayor Pro Tem Hammond stated that it was a worthwhile trip [sic] thanked the City's lobbyists and announced that he would go again in January."

At the same meeting, councilmember Adams concurred that the trip to Washington was "fruitful," adding that Hammond and fellow councilman Garcia had met with Miller, "who called yesterday to say that he had identified some federal funding and was hopeful there would be good news next month."

The city of Monrovia is not located in Miller's district, and it is rare for a member of Congress to help a local municipality outside his district obtain funding, especially when the lawmaker stands to benefit financially from it.

The House ethics manual warns members to avoid conflicts of interest, referring to the definition under federal law and regulation: "it denotes a situation in which an official's conduct of his office conflicts with his private economic affairs" with the ultimate concern being "risk of impairment of impartial judgment, a risk which arises whenever there is temptation to serve personal interests."

As an example of a conflict of interest, the manual refers to a case in which a member sponsored legislation to remove restrictions on the development of property in which he had a personal financial interest. "Thus, the Member was found to have wrongly used his official position for personal benefit," the manual states.

In an interview last year, Miller denied having anything to do with trying to secure federal money to help purchase his land.

"I had nothing to do with anything [involved in the effort]," he said, refusing to acknowledge that there was an effort to secure federal funds to help purchase his property.

If there was an effort to attain an earmark or any kind of federal money for the project, he said, "it was on the part of the City of Monrovia."

Pelosi Names Ethics Panel Members (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

More than a month after the start of the 110th Congress, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Thursday filled out the Democratic roster on the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Pelosi named Reps. Gene Green (Texas), Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.), Mike Doyle (Pa.) and Bill Delahunt (Mass.) to serve under ethics Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio.).

Pelosi's choices were approved by the full Democratic Caucus Thursday morning. House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) named the panel's GOP Members earlier this week.

Delahunt Named To Ethics Panel (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) will join the House ethics committee, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced yesterday.

Delahunt will fill the spot left open by the departure of Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) from the panel.

The other members selected for the committee are the Democrats who had already been on the panel in the 109th Congress. They are Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio), Rep. Gene Green (Texas), Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.) and Rep. Mike Doyle (Pa.).

Delahunt, even though he was not a member of the ethics panel, served on an investigative subcommittee in 2004 that looked into allegations related to the 2003 vote on the bill that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare.

"With their commitment to the highest ethical standard, this group of members will serve with integrity, building on our bipartisan efforts to restore accountability, honesty, and openness to the House of Representatives," Pelosi said.

Senators Try To Recoup $3.1 Billion For BRAC (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) yesterday moved to shorten debate on the continuing resolution (CR) that must pass next week or risk a government shutdown, but he signaled willingness to negotiate with Republicans on opening the spending measure to amendments.

Republicans are amplifying their calls for votes on several changes to the $463 billion CR, reiterating their concerns about minority rights that also have stalled a bipartisan nonbinding resolution on Iraq. Restoring $3.1 billion that was sliced from funding for the military's base realignment and closure (BRAC) program tops the GOP's agenda, which also includes more funding for infant AIDS treatment and payments to victims of crime.

Reid told reporters yesterday that he is discussing with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) whether to allow votes on a limited number of amendments, including some from Democrats. Yet Reid warned Republicans not to resort to obstruction.

"I would hope Republicans don't march to the well, as they did on this Iraq thing, because this well has no bottom," Reid said.

In the battle to restore BRAC funds, Republicans have snagged at least one Democratic ally in Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Finance Committee. Baucus joined 25 Republicans on a letter to Senate leaders sent late Wednesday that noted the BRAC cut would obstruct troop movements and hurt local economies in military communities.

"Democrats have once again robbed from military funds and spread it to other areas," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), GOP Policy Committee chairwoman, said yesterday.

Hutchison added that environmental cleanup of former military base sites also is jeopardized by the BRAC cuts in the CR, which would keep the government funded at 2006 levels from Feb. 16 to the start of the next appropriations cycle. Reid began debate on the CR yesterday by "filling the tree," blocking Republican amendments for the time being.

The lost BRAC funds would have benefited a transition program for the Montana National Guard, but Hutchison said Baucus is not the only Democrat whose home state would be hit; bases in Virginia and Florida are also at risk. Hutchison's plan would offset the restored funds by imposing a 0.73 percent across-the-board cut on domestic accounts, excepting veterans' affairs.

Reid asserted that Republicans would not shy away from filibustering the CR, which several GOP senators already have threatened. But Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who is proposing a new 15-day CR to allow time for full debate, tamped down such talk.

"Nobody's going to shut down the government," said Coburn, part of a conservative cadre that urged last year's departing GOP leadership to halt the appropriations process and extend earlier funding levels until Democrats took control.

Democratic appropriators have said they will attach the trimmed BRAC funds to the war supplemental, a prospect that Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), another leading fiscal conservative, decried on the floor as budgetary trickery.

"This is not the time to cut defense and national security spending and add them to social programs," DeMint said late Wednesday.

Leahy, Bond Fight Bush's Control Over National Guard (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Leaders of the Senate National Guard Caucus are fighting to repeal legislation slipped into the latest defense authorization bill that would make it easier for the president to declare martial law and assume control of the National Guard.

The law, which President Bush signed last fall, revised the 200-year-old Insurrection Act, which empowered the president to use the military as a police force during a rebellion.

The new provision crafted by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and John Warner (R-Va.), former chairman and now ranking member, says the president can call up troops to deal with natural disasters, epidemics and terrorist attacks, among other events.

Governors across the country were angered by last year's legislation, and have mounted an intense campaign to keep the National Guard under their control during natural disasters and emergencies.

Backed by the National Governors Association (NGA) and the National Guard community, Sens. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Kit Bond (R-Mo.), co-chairmen of the National Guard Caucus, introduced a bill this week to revive the previous authority on the domestic use of the military.

The legislation has been referred to the Armed Services Committee, where it will probably face some opposition from Warner and Levin, who said that the provision clarifies existing law and does not give the president powers at the expense of the governors.

Leahy disagrees. "Expanding the president's powers under the Insurrection Act was a sweeping, ill-considered and little-noticed grant of authority to the executive branch, at the expense of the National Guard and the governors," he said. "That change in longstanding law treads heavily across basic constitutional issues relating to the rights of the people, the separation of powers, and state and local sovereignty."

Even though the bill has been referred to the Armed Services panel, the issue is of interest to the Judiciary Committee, which Leahy chairs, according to his spokesman.

The change to the Insurrection Act went unnoticed among lawmakers, but governors were alarmed and united.

"NGA does very few letters where … all governors sign on because it is very difficult, but it did twice last year," said a source close to the matter. "Governors do not need to look over their shoulders to see when Washington, D.C., is going to drop in."

Bond, a former governor, said he was very concerned with "this imprudent change in law," which would give the president "unnecessary and unprecedented power to invoke martial law."

The change was prompted by a conflict between Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) over who should control Guard units in the days after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Bush sought to federalize the Guard, but Blanco refused to give up command, leading to a feud, which hampered the response to the disaster.

The National Guard Bureau is leaving the fight to the governors, according to a Pentagon source, who added that the bureau did not know about the changes and was surprised to see the language in the defense authorization bill. Some in the Guard are concerned that the new law is a slippery slope; others view the issue as political rather than legal.

"It makes it much easier, more politically palatable for the president to declare an insurrection," said the source.

Because the change in law was instituted without consulting the governors, they are calling for an open debate. In a letter to the Senate National Guard Caucus, North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley and South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, the NGA's lead governors on the National Guard, insisted that the citizen soldiers should remain under the control of the governors.

The changes are likely to "confuse the issue of who commands the Guard during a domestic emergency," they wrote.

Waxman Sees Potential Coverup In Ship Contract (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Faulting Program Managers, He Says Warnings About Design Deficiencies Were Hidden

Managers of the U.S. Coast Guard's $24 billion fleet-overhaul program appeared to cover up a Navy engineering report that highlighted design flaws in a new flagship cutter under scrutiny by government investigators, a senior House Democrat said yesterday.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the December 2005 report included "bottom-line" warnings in red ink on a pair of briefing slides that concluded the national security cutter, as it is known, would not last the required 30 years.

But the warnings were deleted in a copy of the report given by Coast Guard officials to Department of Homeland Security auditors and altered in an edited version included in a wider briefing on the $1 billion-a-year fleet-replacement program, known as Deepwater, to the Coast Guard's commanding officer at the time, Waxman said.

"Sugarcoating of the situation may have made life easier for the program management, but it certainly is a disservice to you, to the Coast Guard community and to the taxpayers of this country," Waxman told DHS Inspector General Richard L. Skinner in a hearing.

The accusations, under investigation but partly disputed by the Coast Guard commandant, Adm. Thad Allen, came as Waxman's oversight panel focused on two giant DHS contracts that give unusual leeway to private firms. The companies have been given the authority to plan, design and deliver an overhaul of the Coast Guard's ships, aircraft and systems, and, separately, to build a "virtual fence" at U.S. borders using a blend of surveillance technology and physical barriers.

Waxman challenged the deals, saying they gave contractors too much power and taxpayers too little oversight. As of December, he said, 65 of 98 people hired by DHS to oversee the border project, known as SBInet, were themselves contract employees. So were 76 of the 135 tracking Deepwater, reflecting a dearth of government specialists, he said.

"There seems to be no task too important to be outsourced to private contractors," Waxman said. Federal agencies "outsource thinking through what they even want, then they outsource doing it, then they outsource oversight."

Gregory L. Giddens, director of SBInet, acknowledged difficulty hiring federal contract managers but said contract staff members are support personnel who only gather and relay data. "Support contractors do not provide oversight for prime contracts. That is a government responsibility," he said.

On the Deepwater project, Skinner's office reported last month that the Coast Guard's failure to properly oversee contract team Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin led to problems with the new cutter. The flaws may reduce the cutter's operating days by as much as 20 percent and could help to potentially double the cost of completing the first two of eight planned vessels, Skinner said.

Skinner called Coast Guard officials' handling of the Navy report "highly troubling" and a sign that they wanted to conceal flaws because they had committed to construction.

Allen vowed to investigate, but he noted that information about a hull-fatigue problem came from an interim Navy report, and its data were included elsewhere in the later briefing to his predecessor.

He said the Coast Guard this week changed the contract to lower the cutter's required operating days by 20 percent, blaming the gap cited by Skinner on confusing terms in the original contract.

Allen said lead ships in new vessel programs typically experience problems. He said the Coast Guard needs to quickly replace aging vessels.

Housing Worries Trim Dow (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

Warning signs from the housing sector, courtesy of HSBC Holdings and Toll Brothers, weighed on the market Thursday, pushing aside more-positive news from retailers on January same-store sales.

A day after setting a new intraday high just above 12700 points, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell all the way back below the 12600 mark. But the Dow industrials rebounded to finish the day down 29.24 points at 12637.63.

Financial components weighed on the blue-chip average, with Citigroup down 0.9% and J.P. Morgan Chase off 0.6% on the HSBC news. Also, Boeing lost 0.9% after Northrop Grumman said it would compete against1 the aerospace giant for a bid on a $40 billion Air Force refueling-plane contract.

Higher oil prices also weighed on stocks, with the exception of energy companies such as Exxon Mobil, up nearly 1%. Crude futures made a late surge Thursday, finishing up $2, or 3.5%, to $59.71, their highest closing price of the year. The gains came amid more cold weather in the U.S., a big draw in U.S. natural gas storage and after Occidental Petroleum shut in 95% of production at its Elk Hills crude field in California.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 1.71 to 1448.31. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.83 to 2488.67, coming off strong gains in the previous session led by Cisco Systems and TiVo. Shares of Cisco continued to rise, but TiVo gave up some gains, falling 1.2%.

In recent days, stocks have vacillated in tight ranges, making today's pullback more notable. Many analysts have been saying the market is overextended and that a correction is overdue. "It's just normal to have this type of pullback," said Chris Murray, president of Murray Financial Group. "It would be healthy for the market to pull back, get smacked down, regroup and plod along higher as the year goes on."

The key housing and financial sectors were in focus after HSBC warned14 that bad debt provisions would be 20% higher than analysts had forecast for 2006, blaming a weak U.S. sub-prime lending market, which the bank had aggressively entered.

The American-traded shares of HSBC declined 2.7%. Other mortgage lenders also slumped, with Countrywide Financial down 2.6% and Washington Mutual off 2.6%.

Subprime lending is "one of those issues that had been lingering in the shadows for some time during the housing slowdown, where a lot of questions were asked of companies like HSBC and Countrywide that overexposed themselves to this more-unattractive type of mortgage program," Mr. Murray said.

"On balance, what you're starting to see, as housing values come down, is that banks realize they are on the hook for some of these mortgages," explained Michael Strauss, chief economist at Commonfund, who expects more such announcements to follow. "It's a hint that there will be more stringent lending standards -- and not just for banks, but for mortgage companies as well."

Adding to the woes in the housing sector, Toll Brothers said quarterly home-building revenue dropped15 19%, though it added that the pace of cancellations is starting to abate. But the news was still troubling, as it shows even luxury home builders such as Toll are not insulated from the slowdown in housing. Shares of Toll sank 3%, and other home builders fell in sympathy, with D.R. Horton off 3.3%, Lennar down 2.8%, and KB Home sliding 2.4%.

The housing sector has seen a significant slowdown in the past year, but for the most part has failed to drag down the larger economy, which has continued to show steady growth. However, today's news could cause some to reassess housing's impact on the economy.

"In general, housing is having an impact on lowering or keeping GDP in a low-growth mode as opposed to a modest-growth mode," said Mr. Strauss. "In the first quarter, we'll still get a pretty good drag from housing in GDP." One firm, Macroeconomic Advisors, came out today with a forecast of a 2.5% growth rate for gross domestic product in the first quarter, down a full percentage point from 3.5% in the fourth quarter of 2006.

In other economic news Thursday, wholesale inventories dropped unexpectedly16 in December, the Commerce Department said. Inventories fell 0.5%, the biggest decline since May 2003. Sales at wholesalers increased 1.8% in the month, the largest increase since May. Earlier, the Labor Department said claims for unemployment insurance rose 3,000 to 311,000 last week.

Retail stocks were mixed after companies posted17 mostly stronger post-holiday sales results, as shoppers took advantage of their gift cards. Gap, a long-time underperformer, reported flat same-store sales for January, much better than the 7.7% decline analysts expected. The company also boosted its earnings estimate. Shares of Gap jumped 2.6%.

Wal-Mart Stores affirmed Saturday's announcement that it had a higher-than-expected 2.2% rise in sales at stores open at least a year for the five-week period ended Friday, a five-month high. Costco Wholesale fell short of analysts' estimates, posting a 2% increase in same-store sales. Wal-Mart's shares slipped 0.6%%, while Costco was off 0.9%.

Retailers Ring Up A Solid Start To Year (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Shoppers armed with gift cards went on a belated holiday shopping spree last month, but many in the industry fear retail sales will soften in the coming months.

Overall, the nation's retailers reported solid sales for January, putting a rosier glow on the Christmas selling season. Luxury stores like Saks Inc. rang up big increases from a year earlier as the stock market's advance helped to fuel stepped-up spending by their clientele.

Midprice department stores and specialty chains also shared in the postholiday bonanza, selling inventories of winter clothing that had languished through an unusually balmy December. A notable bright spot was Gap Inc., which held successful clearance events and raised its full-year profit forecast.

Still, a late cold snap has disrupted the start of the spring selling season at many stores, contributing to the uncertainty about whether strong sales will last. Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, said wage growth and low unemployment will support solid consumer spending this year. But rising consumer debt and a cooling housing market could begin to damp momentum this spring, said Bill Hampel, chief economist at the Credit Union National Association.

"The consumer began 2007 on a fairly strong note," Mr. Hampel said. "But that doesn't change the fact that the consumer is facing some issues for the rest of the year."

Of particular concern to analysts is the effect of gift cards on sales figures. Industrywide, consumer purchases of gift cards over the holidays soared 50% to $27.8 billion, according to the National Retail Federation. Retailers don't record gift cards as sales until they are redeemed. Because 40% of holiday gift cards are redeemed in January, they inflate sales figures for January at the expense of December sales. The effect is especially pronounced for retailers like Gap that cater to teens, said Dan Horne, a marketing professor at Providence College in Rhode Island.

A tally of 55 major chains by Thomson Financial showed retailers' same-store sales -- or sales at stores open at least a year -- rose 3.9% last month, exceeding analysts' expectations of a 3.1% increase. However, it fell short of the 4.9% gain posted a year earlier, when a brisk Christmas was followed by a warm January that spurred early, full-priced sales of spring fashions.

Same-store sales are considered indicators of the industry's health and trends in consumer spending, one of the main drivers of the economy. But the monthly figures don't provide a complete picture. They don't include many online purchases, and some large retailers, such as Home Depot Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp., don't report monthly sales.

Last month's same-store sales at Gap were flat with a year earlier. It was only the fourth month since June 2004 that Gap has managed to avoid a decline. The San Francisco company expects full-year earnings per share of 89 cents to 91 cents, up from a previous forecast of 83 cents to 87 cents.

Gap said "initial reaction to spring deliveries has been mixed." The company, which ousted former Chief Executive Paul Pressler last month amid a strategic review, said Charlotte Neuville, head designer for its North American Gap stores, has stepped down, and the company will search for a successor.

"I worry what they would have done without the gift cards," Providence College's Mr. Horne said of Gap, noting that gift cards also boost profits since they tend to coax shoppers into buying more goods at full price.

Likewise, a 17% same-store sales increase at American Eagle Outfitters Inc. may not herald continued strength this spring. Abercrombie & Fitch Co. had a 6% same-store sales decline.

Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said same-store sales jumped 8.6%, beating its forecast for 1.5% to 3% growth. The Cincinnati retailer boosted its fiscal fourth-quarter earnings forecast to $1.55 to $1.60 a share from $1.40 to $1.50.

In addition to benefiting from gift cards, department stores are improving their holiday results with better inventory management. "Retailers are absolutely getting better at getting the right quantity in the store for the holiday and getting out at the right price point for the time," said Janet Hoffman, managing partner of Accenture Ltd.'s North American retail practice.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Bentonville, Ark., confirmed an estimate given on Saturday for a 2.2% same-store sales gain, outstripping an earlier forecast for a 1% to 2% increase. The world's biggest retailer still is experiencing problems at its Wal-Mart stores in the U.S., where sales growth is running well below historical levels.

Target Corp., Wal-Mart's smaller, trendier discount rival, posted a 5.1% increase, in line with its expectation for a 3.5% to 5.5% gain. But Costco Wholesale Corp. posted a 2% increase -- its lowest monthly gain since November 2002, according to Thomson Financial. The Issaquah, Wash., warehouse-club chain blamed the weakness on a calendar shift.

Spending by wealthy shoppers isn't significantly boosted by the gift-card phenomenon, but luxury sales were brisk nonetheless. Saks reported an 11% increase, and Nordstrom Inc.'s same-store sales rose 11%.

Modestly, Stores Beat January Sales Outlook (NYT/AP)

The nation's retailers rebounded in January from their disappointing holiday season as shoppers redeemed gift cards to buy winter and spring merchandise. The arrival of frigid temperatures in much of the country helped sales of cold-weather items.

Winners included Limited Brands, Nordstrom and Federated Department Stores. Wal-Mart Stores beat Wall Street estimates, though its monthly gain was modest. Even the long-struggling Gap beat analysts' expectations, though sales languished at its namesake chain.

Among the losers were the Abercrombie & Fitch Company, the Ann Taylor Stores Corporation and Chico's FAS.

"Across the board, the numbers are decent," said Ken Perkins, president of RetailMetrics, a research company in Swampscott, Mass. The one area of weakness was women's apparel stores, which he said were hurt by the late arrival of winter weather.

Separately, Goldman Sachs said its index, which tracks about 30 retailers, rose 3.2 percent for January sales.

The solid performance in January follows a largely disappointing November-December period, which averaged a gain of 2.9 percent in same-store sales, according to Thomson Financial.

While January is the least important month of the retail calendar, its significance has grown over the last five years because of gift cards. Retailers do not include gift card sales in their monthly tallies until the cards are redeemed, and the bulk of cards given for the holidays are used in January.

The delayed arrival of winter weather helped stores that sell snow blowers and shovels or that still had plenty of heavy boots and coats to clear out, but hurt those that were heavily stocked with spring merchandise.

Merchants also benefited from a steady job market, which helped send consumer confidence slightly higher last month.

Wal-Mart, the world's largest retailer, reported a 2.2 percent rise in same-store sales, beating the 1.8 percent estimate from Wall Street analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial. The Costco Wholesale Corporation reported a same-store sales gain of 2 percent, below the 3 percent forecast.

Federated had an 8.6 percent gain in same-store sales, well above the 4.6 percent analysts predicted. The same-store results include only the Macy's and Bloomingdale's stores that existed before September, when the company transformed most of the former May Department Stores branches to Macy's units.

Gap, whose chief executive resigned last month after a string of disappointing quarters, said same-store sales were unchanged from the year ago, better than the Wall Street estimate for a 7.7 percent decline. The business was helped by strong sales at its Banana Republic stores, and the retailer raised its earnings outlook.

Dad Wasn't Dad After All, But Still Owes Child Support (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.

Sixteen months after his divorce, Richard Parker made a devastating discovery. A DNA test revealed that his 3-year-old son had been fathered by someone else.

Mr. Parker immediately filed a lawsuit claiming fraud by his apparently unfaithful ex-wife. He took his case all the way to the Florida Supreme Court.

Last week, the Florida justices ruled 7-0 against him. They said that Parker must continue to pay $1,200 a month in child support because he had missed the one-year postdivorce deadline for filing his lawsuit. His court-ordered payments would total more than $200,000 over 15 years to support another man's child.

"We find that the balance of policy considerations favors protecting the best interests of the child over protecting the interests of one parent defrauded by the other parent in the midst of a divorce proceeding," writes Justice Kenneth Bell for the court.

"We recognize that the former husband in this case may feel victimized," he writes. He then quotes a scholar to explain the ruling: "While some individuals are innocent victims of deceptive partners, adults are aware of the high incidence of infidelity and only they, not the children, are able to act to ensure that the biological ties they may deem essential are present."

In effect, the high court is saying it's partly Parker's fault for trusting his wife.

The Parker case illustrates an increasingly contentious debate over the rights and responsibilities of divorced fathers who have been duped and don't challenge paternity at or near the time of divorce. But it also raises fundamental questions about the nature of fatherhood and the legal responsibilities that can attach to a father-child relationship – even when that relationship is the result of fraud and deception by a wife and mother.

Most states have laws that permit courts to order men who have been deceived to continue to make child- support payments even when they have no biological connection to the child. The idea is to minimize any disruption in the life of the child. In recent years, some states have begun passing laws that give deceived dads some ways to fight back.

There are no reliable estimates of how often "paternity fraud" takes place. Some findings suggest 4 to 10 percent of fathers, but no definitive study has been completed.

Unlike most duped ex-husbands in the US, Parker may still prevail in court. Last summer the Florida legislature passed a law that allows men to use newly discovered paternity evidence (like Parker's DNA test results) to overturn a court order to pay child support for someone else's child.

The June 2006 law is aimed at preventing the kind of outcome ordered by the Florida Supreme Court. The policy approach taken by the Florida Legislature stands in sharp contrast to the "policy considerations" cited by the state supreme court justices.

Supporters of the Florida law see it as a major step toward justice for deceived ex-husbands. Critics see it as a potential danger to the well-being of mothers and their vulnerable children.

In addition to Florida, Ohio, Georgia, Maryland, Alabama, Indiana, Virginia, Arizona, and Wyoming have laws allowing ex-husbands to overturn a child-support order when deception or fraud by an ex-wife is discovered, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. By contrast, most other states set a one- to four-year deadline for fathers to file lawsuits challenging paternity determinations.

The idea behind the deadline is that any action taken in a marriage breakup should be completed while the child is as young as possible to avoid a major disruption during the most formative years.

"We don't want a system where a child is 10 years old and you have people who come in and undo what has been put in place many years before," says Susan Paikin of the Center for the Support of Families in Silver Spring, Md.

Ms. Paikin says that it is up to the adults in the relationship to thoroughly investigate any paternity issues at the time of the divorce.

But fathers' rights advocates say that few husbands are aware of a paternity deadline and its legal implications. And many have no idea that their wives have been unfaithful.

In generations past such infidelity might have gone undetected. But the advent of DNA testing is changing that. It is giving new momentum to a debate over how best to provide for broken families.

"There is no perfect answer," says Paikin. "There are a lot of people who will argue that it is always in the child's best interest to have a relationship with the biological parent and that should override everything else. There are others who believe just as fervently that being a parent has more to do with being caring and nurturing, and that is what makes you a father."

Part of the difficulty in paternity disestablishment cases is that once the financial contribution of the nonbiological father is terminated, the courts do not recognize a legal right to continued contact between the child and the man.

"It is the ultimate Catch-22 for my client," says Parker's lawyer, Scott Lazar of Miami. "On the one hand he has a relationship with this child and cares about this child and would probably be willing to provide money for this child, but he doesn't want to provide it to the mother to use as she wishes."

Family court judges aren't interested in fostering a continuing relationship between men and the children of their ex-wives, says Carnell Smith, who runs a DNA-testing company and is founder of Atlanta-based US Citizens Against Paternity Fraud. "The court is only concerned about financial payments."

Judges generally view the man in a divorce proceeding as nothing more than a "walking checkbook," he says.

Smith says that instead of targeting deceived ex-husbands, the legal system should investigate the conduct of the wife and hold the mother and biological father responsible for the child they produced.

"In no other area of the law do we punish the victim for the conduct of two other people," Smith says. "For me it is disingenuous for the Florida justices to turn around and say [to Parker] 'Well, it is your fault that you didn't find out sooner.' "

The Florida legislature tried to balance the law to avoid forcing children onto welfare rolls, says Tom Sasser, chairman of the family-law section of the Florida Bar. It rejected a proposal to allow ex-husbands to recover prior child-support payments. It also rejected a proposal to allow triple damages against deceptive mothers. Instead, the law allows ex-husbands to be released from future payments.

And that, advocates say, opens the door for some ex-husbands to attempt to build a trusting relationship with someone new and perhaps start a family without the burden of a court-imposed financial debt hanging over his new wife and children.

White House On Sidelines In 2008 Contest (WP)

By Peter Baker

No one in the West Wing is booking tickets to Iowa. No one is scouring matchup poll numbers or hiring campaign managers or dialing for dollars. As candidate after candidate jumps into the race for president, the White House sits unaccustomedly on the sidelines.

This is the first White House in 80 years without someone running for president, a twist of history that will shape not just the campaign but also the remainder of the Bush administration. With neither a president seeking reelection nor a vice president positioned as the heir presumptive, the Bush team will increasingly turn into a spectator in the nation's political debate.

Its absence in the contest will spare the White House the trials of a campaign, easing the tensions between governing priorities and election imperatives that traditionally tear at the institution. Yet, at the same time, it means that no one will be making the case for the Bush legacy as 2008 nears. To one degree or another, all of the candidates, including the Republicans, will distance themselves from the president, particularly if he remains as unpopular as he is today.

"It creates a fundamentally different situation than we've known in the past," said Craig Fuller, chief of staff to then-Vice President George H.W. Bush as he prepared for his 1988 presidential run. "What's so starkly different about this situation is that not only is the president, by virtue of the calendar, a lame duck, but there's no champion out there on the field for him."

The early and especially intense start of the 2008 race, marked by a rush of announcements in recent weeks, has foreshadowed the changing dynamics. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), the Republican most closely identified with Bush's Iraq policy, made a point of assailing the administration's performance as a "train wreck." And the focus is turning to the future. Voters dislodged Bush's Republican majorities in Congress in November, and a Newsweek poll last month found that 58 percent would like the Bush presidency to be over; 21 percent of Republicans agreed.

For Bush, the challenge will be to assert his leadership anyway. As a wartime commander in chief sending more troops to Iraq, he is more relevant than most lame-duck presidents. But he seems eager not to let the election debate pass him by. When Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in Iowa criticized Bush's actions as "the height of irresponsibility," the White House called reporters to denounce her "partisan attack that sends the wrong message to our troops."

Still, Bush's advisers see advantages in not having a candidate in the race. Bush can push energy, immigration and Iraq plans without gauging electoral consequences. When he proposed a dramatic increase in ethanol production, no one linked that to Iowa caucus politics. "I actually think it is liberating in some ways, and it keeps them from being distracted," said former Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman. "The fact that you have a White House that isn't thinking at all about politics . . . is good for the nation and good for the president."

Other advisers said the White House will still think about politics but will be free to focus on broader goals, such as party building. And they take solace that top Republican candidates -- McCain, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney -- have backed Bush's troop increase. But they recognize that the support will not last if the situation in Iraq does not improve in six months.

The situation for Bush defies modern tradition. The last time neither president nor vice president actively ran was in 1928, when Calvin Coolidge did not seek reelection and hated Vice President Charles G. Dawes so much that he made it clear that fellow Republicans should not consider him. Even so, Coolidge had a stake in the election, with his commerce secretary, Herbert Hoover, carrying the banner. The only election since then without a president or vice president on a major-party ballot was in 1952, when Vice President Alben W. Barkley, at 74 and with no support from Harry S. Truman, lost the Democratic nomination to Adlai Stevenson.

Friction typifies relations when vice presidents step forward to seek the Oval Office. Even George H.W. Bush, who vowed not to disrespect Ronald Reagan during his own presidential bid, began to distinguish himself in the summer of 1988, first by publicly disagreeing with administration talks with drug-running Panamanian leader Manuel Noriega and later by promising a "kinder, gentler" presidency.

This can fracture a White House, with the president's staff focused on polishing his legacy and the vice president's on winning votes. The schism between Bill Clinton and Al Gore after the Monica Lewinsky scandal grew so pronounced that, at one point in 2000, Tipper Gore refused to go into a reception with the president. Gore chose a Clinton critic as his running mate and kept the president off the campaign trail.

"There are always tensions," said Roy Neel, a longtime Gore adviser who also served as Clinton's deputy chief of staff. "In the Clinton-Gore years, the tensions were minimal until Gore's campaign had to begin. And then what happened was all of the expected tensions . . . [were] exacerbated substantially by the problems that Clinton was having and the backlash onto Gore."

George W. Bush avoided that in 2000 by tapping Dick Cheney, who swore off interest in the Oval Office from the start. "My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa will look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses," Cheney told CBS News last year. "And when I speak out on an issue, it's because somebody needs to speak out on the issue, and I can do it without fear, in a sense that I'm not here trying to burnish my image."

With no campaign at stake, Cheney's influence within the White House, though still potent, has clearly diminished. The rise of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the fall of ousted defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld signaled a shift. Cheney's handling of a hunting accident last year, in which he shot a friend in the face and kept quiet about it for a day, drove a wedge between him and Bush aides who blamed him for needlessly exacerbating the president's political problems.

Since then, according to some in the administration, the Cheney mystique within the White House has faded. Presidential aides are no longer as intimidated by Cheney's staff as they once were, and some who have seen the vice president in private lately said he seems personally down. His combative tone in a CNN interview last month, even as Bush was trying to reach out to Democrats, surprised presidential aides and hinted at his frustration over the turn of events.

Advisers played down reports of tension and noted that Cheney's decision not to run makes him the most loyal vice president in modern times. "Contrary to popular belief, he doesn't freelance," said Mary Matalin, a former aide. "You don't have to work parallel agendas -- the president's and your own."

Bush plans to remain neutral in the GOP primaries -- "helpful to all, partial to none," in the words of one aide. His political guru, Karl Rove, is likewise staying out of the race and refuses to handicap it even among friends for fear of showing favoritism. Some Bush advisers, such as media strategist Mark McKinnon, have signed on with McCain, while the candidates compete for the president's fundraisers.

Within the White House, there is no sentimental favorite, no candidate in the Bush mold who excites his loyalists. McCain's long rivalry with Bush makes him anathema to many, but some top aides appreciate that he has always supported the president on the issue that matters most, the Iraq war. On domestic matters, many in the White House are attracted to Romney, seeing him as the most electable conservative. Giuliani has admirers for his performance on Sept. 11, 2001, but many consider him too liberal on social issues.

As the campaign begins to heat up without him, Bush may find it irritating not to have a role. As Timothy Walch, a historian and director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library, put it: "It's very hard, I think, psychologically and politically, for somebody who has been the most powerful person in the world to begin gradually to detach themselves from power."

'08 Slate Without Standout For GOP (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

Many conservatives say they pick "none of the above" when faced with a choice of Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani as the 2008 Republican presidential nominee.

"When I look at these top three guys, I think of Shania Twain singing 'That don't impress me much,' " said former House Majority Leader Dick Armey, referring to the popular country singer.

Such dissatisfaction with the leading Republican presidential candidates is widespread among the party's conservative stalwarts, including many of the 150 alumni of the Reagan administration who attended an annual reunion at the Heritage Foundation on Tuesday night.

"We are without a viable candidate for 2008 at this point," said Mary Ann Meloy, who was an official in the Reagan White House.

Eagle Forum President Phyllis Schlafly counts herself in the "none of the above" category because, she said, the top three candidates are wrong, ambiguous or suspect on "limiting court jurisdiction, the loss of U.S. jobs from globalism and the immigration-amnesty-guest-worker, pro-life and same-sex marriage issues."

Similar discontent has been expressed by conservatives as prominent as radio host Rush Limbaugh -- who said last month that "there's nobody out there that revs me up" in the 2008 Republican presidential field -- and from many other longtime activists who are influential, if not quite household names.

"No one of the three top-tier individuals is a conservative," said Tom Carney, a Florida lawyer and Republican fundraiser. "But even more importantly, none of them have original thoughts. They are all ultimate pragmatists. They want to be president without the necessary vision in this time of international crisis."

Faith Whittlesey, who headed the Reagan White House liaison office and was ambassador to Switzerland, said she is trying to find hope in the situation. "I hear the three choices are all we got, so I would like to see their positions evolve on the core issues that face the nation -- and I am, let's say, hoping for the best," she said.

Christian Josi, senior vice president of Dezenhall Resources, a Washington-based public relations firm, said, "I am a conservative. I have had all I can stomach of Republicans."

"To put it very simply, it is very clear that McCain and Giuliani both have demonstrated that they have significant problems with key elements of the Bill of Rights," Mr. Josi said. "And that is frightening. Don't get me started on Romney. Suffice to say, I find his ideological commitment to the core conservative principles to be highly suspect."

At the Reagan reunion, there were some warm words here and there for former House Speaker Newt Gingrich for his breadth of public-policy knowledge, for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee for his sticking to his conservative social views, for former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III for his nuanced foreign policy and homeland security views, and for Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, whose criticism of the Iraq war resonates with many conservatives disaffected with the Bush administration.

But these men are part of a long list of Republican contenders who are trailing far behind the three leading candidates in opinion polls.

"I say 'none of the above' because none of them fits the model of what I think we need as president," said conservative campaign adviser Eddie Mahe. "Some have philosophical flaws. From 2009 to 2017, international affairs is where we will have to focus -- China, Africa, India Russia, the Middle East. I don't see McCain, Romney or Giuliani or any of the others understanding this changing world, how some of those societies function and how we can best relate to them."

Mr. Armey said none of the top three Republican contenders "dwells very much on the big issues of our time," including the direction of foreign policy since September 11, 2001, especially in Iraq.

"I'm not sure what their views are on America exporting democracy by force," the Texas Republican said. "The only thing that could endear one of these candidates to voters is saying, 'I know how to get us out of there.' I'm not sure voters want to hear any more argument about how or why we got in there in the first place."

Despite such discontent, the Republican Party's habits may prove hard to break, said one campaign strategist.

"Some conservatives are saying 'none of the above,' but history says it will be one of the Big Three -- McCain, Romney or Giuliani," said Republican operative Charlie Gerow, chief executive officer of Harrisburg, Pa.-based Quantum Communications. "It's part of Republican culture that we nominate front-runners."

The 2008 Ad Blitz Begins (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Presidential campaign advertising will start hitting the airwaves in the coming months, far earlier in the election cycle than during the 2004 race, and the ads will barrage the American public for much longer, delivering a windfall to television and radio stations, industry experts say.

In the age of television, there never has been a presidential race so wide-open.

“In the history of modern broadcasting, we haven’t had an election where we haven’t had a White House incumbent,” said George Reed-Dellinger, who tracks the industry for Washington Analysis, a political intelligence consultancy. “The broadcasters are licking their chops.”

For the first time since 1972, both Republican and Democratic presidential nominees are expected to forego public financing entirely, allowing them to raise and spend unlimited sums on the largest item of any campaign budget: television spots.

Moreover, the nominees may be decided by February if four large states — Florida, California, New Jersey and Illinois — succeed in moving up their presidential primaries. Such a shift would push candidates to market themselves earlier in these states that are not traditional battlegrounds, but are home to some of the most expensive media markets in the country.

“The 2008 election will begin in earnest in terms of ad buys in late spring,” predicted Evan Tracey, the head of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, which tracks political ad spending for TNS Media Intelligence.

The scramble has already begun. White House hopeful Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) hit the airwaves on Dec. 19 with a television ad in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. Funded by his PAC, Peace Through Strength, it touted his tough stance on border control.

By contrast, Howard Dean went on the air first on June 17, 2003. “It’s a full seven months earlier than 2004,” Tracey said.

Moveon.org has run ads on local stations in Des Moines, Iowa and in Manchester, N.H., as well as nationally on CNN, that attack Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the frontrunner for the Republican nomination. The spot criticizes President Bush’s plan to raise troop levels in Iraq and asserts the idea came from the senator.

The rush to run ads will no doubt serve as fodder for groups that push for campaign finance reform.

“Do you realize how much pain these ads are going to cause the American public?” the president of the group Democracy 21, Fred Wertheimer, asked. “They just got done bombarding them and here we go again.”

Tracey predicted that the 2008 cycle will be roughly in line with the record-breaking $2 billion spent on all political advertising in the 2006 midterm elections, and should easily top the $1.7 billion spent in 2004. More has been spent in midterm years than in presidential years because of the higher number of gubernatorial races.

“We’ve never seen the money that we’re going to see spent on this campaign,” said Pat Roberts, the head of the Florida Association of Broadcasters, which represents both television and radio stations in the state.

If Florida shifts its primary date, political ads will start hitting the airwaves in November, he predicted.

The national sales manager for KCRG-TV in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Steve Lake, said he already has received calls about running issue ads from some outside groups. In recent presidential races, such ads weren’t aired until late summer.

But earlier primaries in some big states, especially in the battleground of Florida, may siphon money from Iowa and New Hampshire.

"It may split the candidates' attention, time and money and negate a tidal wave of money in New Hampshire," the general manager of WMUR in Manchester, Jeff Bartlett, said.

Tracey estimates it will cost $3-5 million a week to reach the bulk of voters in California. That could be prohibitively expensive for some candidates, and it could prompt those with bigger war chests to buy ads on the national cable networks. Within 60 days of the election, federal candidates are guaranteed airtime and cut rates for their ads.

"If you're talking about having all these states frontloaded, it might be more efficient to buy the whole country," he said.

The cable industry is predicting that it will get a bigger slice of campaign dollars.

"I think they're going to ramp up their cable advertising as a whole, on a national and local basis," said Chuck Thompson of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau.

Celebrity Candidates Look To Adjust To Retail Politics In N.H. (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

Former New Hampshire Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D) remembers former Vice President Al Gore's early trips to the site of the first-in-the-nation primary as he tried to transition from vice president to presidential candidate.

The sitting vice president, accompanied by a traveling circus of media, supporters, and Secret Service, suddenly had to grapple with the tiny diners, the house parties and the town halls. These venues were often bursting at the seams with voters used to interviewing candidates as if they were applying to work in the local factory or restaurant.

"The campaign figured they needed to lose a lot of the entourage and really engage the people," Shaheen said. "And when he started doing that, he started doing well."

And now that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is making her first trip to the Granite State in more than 10 years this weekend, the campaign and the state are bracing for crowd turnouts and a media reception that would make the Pope blush.

But in a state considered to be the Super Bowl of retail politics, a number of strategists who have worked in New Hampshire say the campaigns of both Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) would do well to focus on the voters, not the cameras. According to reports, Obama had more than 150 reporters in tow when he visited in mid-December.

Peter Greenberger, who served as the New Hampshire political director for Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) in 2004, said the celebrity candidates will have to come out of "their bubbles" if they want to do well on primary day.

"I think the star power of Hillary and Obama will have to bend to people-power," Greenberger said.

Greenberger cited then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush's initial strategy in 2000, when he "tried to run a star-power campaign of inevitability … and he was thumped in New Hampshire."

"I think the strategists working for the tier-one candidates are wise to learn that lesson early," he said.

Former Ambassador George Bruno, Gen. Wesley Clark's top political adviser in the state in 2004, agreed along those lines, adding that the unique flavor of the early contest always withstands the early hype surrounding famous candidates' first trips to the state.

"Retail politics in New Hampshire is still alive and well," Bruno said. "Once some of the celebrity candidates … take their first official dips into the New Hampshire snow, it will still go back to retail politics. There's always that phenomenon of here today, gone tomorrow."

Bruno said Granite State voters also have their own filters to get beyond the media coverage, and he cited as one example the reports painting Sen. Joseph Biden's (D-Del.) recent trip to the state as a nonstarter with voters.

Bruno, who has spoken with many of the candidates but not yet declared his support for any of them, said that Biden is in fact "a man of tremendous substance … and I think that will come out in the retail process."

This weekend, Clinton is scheduled for three town halls, which are open to press, and two house parties, which are open to local press but allow only pool coverage for national media.

Clinton campaign staffers said they are mindful of the traditional demands that voters there have of their candidates.

"We're going to do everything we can to protect that interaction," said Clinton campaign spokesman Mo Elleithee, who worked in New Hampshire for Clark in 2004.

Elleithee said the Clinton campaign feels it is striking the right balance between media needs and voter demands, citing its efforts in Iowa last month. It plans to continue that strategy in the Granite State this weekend despite the crushing amount of media requests it has received.

"We're going to make sure the media circus doesn't interfere with her ability to connect to the voters," Elleithee said.

He added that despite the expectation of a tremendous entourage around Clinton, the candidate will still make the rounds at traditional stops like the Merrimack Diner and the Puritan Backroom, both in Manchester.

DOJ_NMG_0129884

The Puritan Backroom's owner and manager, Chris Pappas, said that despite the larger crowds, both he and voters in the diner still expect the contenders to "go booth to booth."

"I think that essential conversation still happens," Pappas said.

Pappas said he has already had visits from White House hopefuls like New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) and Biden. He added that given the size of the fields in both parties, the crowds will eventually divide themselves up among the different candidates.

Shaheen, who now works as director of Harvard's Institute of Politics at the John F. Kennedy School of Government, said the Granite State voters she knows are not easily star-struck and generally keep an open mind until they see each of the candidates in action.

"They're keeping their powder dry," Shaheen said.

For her part, the former gubernatorial and Senate candidate said she will probably not endorse anyone, at least publicly, because her current position at Harvard implies neutrality.

Obama Touts Non-political Résumé (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

CHICAGO — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who will announce Saturday that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination, says the brevity of his political résumé is his "greatest strength."

His work as a community organizer, civil rights attorney, constitutional law professor and state legislator "provides me with insights into solving problems at the federal level and at the local level and at the neighborhood level," Obama said in an interview with USA TODAY. That experience "is what's needed right now," he said.

Obama, 45, has been in the U.S. Senate for two years and served seven years in the Illinois Senate.

Only New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had more support for the nomination in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken last month. Among respondents, 18% of Democrats and independents who lean Democrat supported Obama; 29% backed Clinton.

A year ago, Obama said, he didn't plan to run for president. But as he traveled across the USA campaigning for Democrats and signing his best-selling book The Audacity of Hope, he discovered "an enormous hunger for a new kind of politics — an enormous desire to end business as usual and to focus on a politics that brings us together."

That won't preclude "vigorous debates and serious differences" with rivals, Obama said. The Iraq war, which he opposed when other Democrats voted to authorize it, will be a "dominant issue," he said. "I'm proud that … I stood clearly and forthrightly in opposition." He supports a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops by March 31, 2008.

Obama also said:

•He and his wife, Michelle, worry about losing privacy. "We tend to be pretty private people, we don't like a lot of fuss," he said. "What I dread most is being away from my kids" — daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5.

He'll make that sacrifice, he said, because he believes he can bring "people together to find common-sense, practical solutions" to economic, health care, education, energy and security problems.

•Although he would be the first African-American president, race is not "the main focus" of his campaign. If there are "symbolic benefits from it, that's great," he said.

•He hopes to generate "the kind of enthusiasm and interest" that motivates many people to make $5 or $10 donations online.

•He doesn't wake up every day certain he'll win. "I am absolutely convinced that …we've got a message that I think will appeal to the American people."

Dem Cites "Unique" Skills As Key To His Campaign (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama talked with USA TODAY's Judy Keen as he prepared to announce Saturday in Springfield, Ill., that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination. Excerpts:

Q: What will you say about why you want to be president?

A: We face enormous challenges, challenges that are going to set the course of this country for the next generation. … The only way we're going to make progress is if we can build a strong consensus in this country to bring people across divisions of race or religion or region or ideological predisposition.

Q: How did you decide you're the best person to lead the nation toward the solutions?

A: (I asked) myself, is there something unique about my potential candidacy that might allow us to advance as a country in a way that wouldn't happen if I didn't run. And I decided that I might have the kind of skills and life experience that were unique and it would be worthwhile for me to take the plunge.

Q: How can you sustain that new approach in a campaign?

A: We try to get past some of the simplistic, ideological arguments that have characterized Washington over the last several years and that we focus on bringing new people into the process that, frankly, over the last several years have felt completely left out.

Q: Will Iraq be the dominant issue in the campaign, and does it work to your advantage if it is because of your long-standing opposition to the war?

A: I think the voters are going to be looking for someone who has a good grasp of the issues facing us in the Middle East, recognizes that we've got very real national security interests there and we can't act foolishly or based on politics at this point, but that we have to change course in a fundamental way.

Q: You talk often about restoring hope to America. Will you be more specific about domestic policy proposals that will accomplish that goal?

A: Absolutely. Look, I think that the press and folks in Washington have created an accelerated timeline. I read a column the other day talking about the various midcourse corrections the campaigns have to make, and I haven't even announced yet. The truth of the matter is I probably have a more detailed and specific record of what I think and where I stand than any candidate in this race. I mean, I've written two very detailed books that give people a pretty good window into my heart and soul. I've given major policy speeches on just about every important issue.

Q: You have said that you worry about forfeiting your privacy. How big a factor was that in your decision, and is your wife 100% in favor of this idea?

A: My wife is 100% behind the race. She was a partner in making the decision, but obviously there are sacrifices. … I'm not somebody who enjoys a big entourage. The difficulty in just going out and taking a walk or taking my kids to the zoo — the inability to do that is a major sacrifice, but we think the sacrifice is worth it.

Q: Are you making your announcement in Springfield, Ill., because of the connection you feel to Abraham Lincoln?

A: Not only is Lincoln one of my political heroes, but like Lincoln, I served for seven years in Springfield in the state Senate, and it's there that I learned how to legislate. It's there that I developed many of my political ideas. … I've got a lot of friends from all throughout Illinois coming down, and I can't think of a better place from which to embark on this journey.

Q: What are you most looking forward to in the campaign?

A: I'm most looking forward to retail politics: sitting in folks' living rooms and talking to them in small groups or one-on-one and hearing their stories and what their hopes and dreams and aspirations are and figuring out ways that we can create a government that helps them achieve it.

Q: Who will your toughest opponent be?

A: Cynicism.

Race In Background Of Run (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten, Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama said his campaign for the presidency "will send a wonderful message to young people of color and to immigrants around the country" if successful.

He makes clear, though, that he hopes to make race irrelevant in his bid to become the first black to occupy the White House.

"If I'm talking about the issues that matter to people, if we do a good job in letting people know who I am and what I stand for … they'll make their judgment not based on my race but based on how well they think I can lead this country," Obama told USA TODAY.

As he begins campaigning in earnest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Obama cannot assume that he will be the favorite of black voters, who are crucial to the success of Democratic candidates in states such as South Carolina, which holds one of the earliest primaries. Blacks accounted for nearly half of the state's Democratic primary voters in 2004.

Obama's background doesn't fit the mold of previous black presidential candidates or that of traditional civil rights leaders. He is the son of a black Kenyan father and a white American mother. He grew up in Hawaii and spent some of his childhood in Indonesia. He was the first black president of the prestigious Harvard Law Review and spent some time as a community organizer on Chicago's South Side.

Obama "has demonstrated a great deal of popularity with white people," said David Bositis, an expert on black voter opinion at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "There is almost always, on the part of some African-Americans, a thing in their back of their minds that says, 'What's the catch?' "

Wilbur Rich, a political scientist at Wellesley College, said: "This is the kind of thing people talk about in black barbershops: Is he really a brother?" With his résumé, Rich said, Obama "has earned the right to call himself whatever he wants."

The debate is playing out not just in barbershops, but in blogs, magazines and newspapers. In the New York Daily News recently, columnist Stanley Crouch, a prominent black social critic, said that when "black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about."

Other blacks dismiss such criticism. The real test will be whether "he is the best qualified person for the job," said Bruce Gordon, president and chief executive officer of the NAACP. "Black folks will not vote for Barack simply because he's black. Not all women will vote for Hillary," he said, referring to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, another Democratic contender.

Clinton leads Obama in polls of black voters. Recent ABC News/Washington Post polling, for instance, found that 60% of black, Democratic-leaning voters supported Clinton, and 20% backed Obama.

Cornell Belcher, a Democratic activist and pollster for Obama, said the story behind those numbers is simple: "African-Americans know the Clintons. They don't know Barack Obama. Those are numbers that are going to move."

Evan Brunson is among the black voters Obama will have to win over.

Brunson, president of the College Democrats chapter at Howard University in Washington, said he felt a surge of excitement as he watched Obama speak at a recent event.

Still, the 22-year-old senior from Dallas said he's more interested right now in a fellow Southerner, former North Carolina senator John Edwards. "I like that someone is picking up the mantle of social justice," he said about Edwards.

Obama's race will be a factor in his choice, Brunson said, but not the only one. "You don't give your vote away; they have to earn it."

Obama Forged Political Mettle In Illinois Capitol (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 8 -- When Sen. Barack Obama heads downstate to Springfield on Saturday to announce his candidacy for president, he will speak in lofty tones of America and Abraham Lincoln, but also of a more prosaic topic: his own eight years in the Illinois Senate.

The heart of Obama's political rÃ©sumÃ© lies in Springfield, where he arrived in January 1997. He was a newcomer to elective politics after time as a community organizer and University of Chicago law professor operating largely outside the city's Democratic machine.

From a district on the South Side of Chicago, he reached Republican-dominated Springfield as a committed liberal, later writing that he understood politics in the capital "as a full-contact sport, and minded neither the sharp elbows nor the occasional blind-side hit."

Yet he emerged as a leader while still in his 30s by developing a style former colleagues describe as methodical, inclusive and pragmatic. He cobbled together legislation with Republicans and conservative Democrats, making overtures other progressive politicians might consider distasteful.

Along the way, he played an important role in drafting bipartisan ethics legislation and health-care reform. He overcame law enforcement objections to codify changes designed to curb racial profiling and to make capital punishment, which he favors, more equitable.

"When you come in, especially as a freshman, and work on something like ethics reform, it's not necessarily a way to endear yourself to some of the veteran members of the Illinois General Assembly," said state Sen. Kirk W. Dillard, a Republican who became a friend. "And working on issues like racial profiling was contentious, but Barack had a way both intellectually and in demeanor that defused skeptics."

"He wasn't a maverick," said Cynthia Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform. "There were other legislators I would turn to if I just wanted to make a lot of noise. That wasn't his style."

Obama was a persistent foe of social conservatives on issues of reproductive rights. He was also a reliable vote for gun control and backed a ban on assault weapons, although he took a political hit from Democrats for missing an important gun vote while in Hawaii for the Christmas holidays.

In 1997, Obama was not instantly embraced, Dillard said: "The fact that he was a law professor -- and a constitutional-law professor -- and he was a Harvard graduate made many members of the General Assembly roll their eyes."

Obama went to work. Afterward, he played golf and pickup basketball. He made the social rounds at Springfield cocktail parties. He joined a weekly poker game with legislators and lobbyists in which the ante was a dollar or two.

One regular, former Democratic state senator Larry Walsh, said Obama was competitive yet careful -- and always hard to read.

"One night, we were playing and things weren't going very well for me," Walsh said. "I had a real good hand and Barack beat me out with another one. I slammed down my cards and said, 'Doggone it, Barack, if you were a little more liberal in your card playing and a little more conservative in your politics, you and I would get along a lot better.' "

The campaign finance effort came at the initiative of former U.S. senator Paul Simon (D-Ill.). A Republican and a Democrat in each legislative body were tapped to tighten a system that, among other things, allowed politicians to use campaign accounts for personal expenses.

Obama was given the job of representing Senate Democrats by state Sen. Emil Jones Jr., who chose him on the recommendation of Abner J. Mikva, a former judge and Democratic congressman.

"He was very aggressive when he first came to the Senate," said Jones, now president of the state Senate. "We were in the minority, but he said, 'I'd like to work hard. Any tough assignments or things you'd like me to be involved in, don't hesitate to give it to me.' "

Obama favored more ambitious changes in campaign law, including limits on contributions, but nipped and tucked in search of consensus.

"What impressed me about him was his ability in working with people of the opposite party," said Mike Lawrence, director of the Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University. "He had definite ideas about what ought to be contained in a campaign finance reform measure, but he also was willing to recognize that he was probably not going to get everything he wanted."

The result, according to good-government groups, was the most ambitious campaign reform in nearly 25 years, making Illinois one of the best in the nation on campaign finance disclosure.

Five years later, Obama waded into a complex capital-punishment debate after a number of exonerations persuaded then-Gov. George Ryan (R) to empty death row.

Obama wrote in his recent memoir that he thinks the death penalty "does little to deter crime." But he supports capital punishment in cases "so heinous, so beyond the pale, that the community is justified in expressing the full measure of its outrage by meting out the ultimate punishment."

In proposing changes, Obama met repeatedly with officials and advocates on all sides. He nudged and cajoled colleagues fearful of being branded soft on crime, as well as death-penalty opponents worried that any reform would weaken efforts to abolish capital punishment.

Obama's signature effort was a push for mandatory taping of interrogations and confessions. It was opposed by prosecutors, police organizations and Ryan's successor, Democrat Rod Blagojevich, who said it would impede investigators.

Working under the belief that no innocent defendant should end up on death row and no guilty one should go free, Obama helped get the bill approved by the Senate on a 58 to 0 vote. When Blagojevich reversed his position and signed it, Illinois became the first state to require taping by statute.

"Obviously, we didn't agree all the time, but he would always take suggestions when they were logical, and he was willing to listen to our point of view. And he offered his opinions in a lawyerly way," said Carl Hawkinson, the retired Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee. "When he spoke on the floor of the Senate, he spoke out of conviction. You knew that, whether you agreed with him or disagreed with him."

Obama paid a political price for missing an important vote on a crime package. That was during the 1999 Christmas holidays, as Obama -- who describes himself as suffering from "chronic restlessness" -- embarked on an ill-fated attempt to unseat Rep. Bobby Rush, a popular Chicago Democrat.

When the legislature was called into special session to vote on gun control, Obama and his family were visiting his grandmother in Hawaii. His 18-month-old daughter, Malia, was sick and unable to fly. The measure was narrowly defeated, and Rush criticized him. Obama lost by 31 points, his only electoral defeat.

"I take my legislative responsibilities extremely seriously," Obama said after the measure fell five votes short. "In the midst of a congressional race, I'm well aware of the potential risk of missing a vote, even if that vote doesn't wind up making the difference on a particular piece of legislation. But at some point, family has to come first."

Obama was a steady supporter of abortion rights, said Pam Sutherland, Planned Parenthood's chief lobbyist in Springfield, although he caught flak from the political left in 2004 as he ran for the U.S. Senate.

The reason was a series of votes on such issues as late-term abortion and parental notification when Obama voted "present" instead of yea or nay. He said he was not tacking toward the center, but an opponent in the Democratic primary sent mailers portraying a rubber duck and proclaiming, "He ducked!"

Obama said his votes helped provide cover for other legislators. Sutherland said the votes were part of a strategy designed with Obama's help to deny Republicans easy campaign sound bites.

"The Republicans loved to put out legislation all the time that would put their opponents in a trick box during the elections," Sutherland said. "It was a strong statement to those who promoted bad legislation that we're not going to take this; you can't use this against us."

Obama To Skip Nevada Presidential Forum (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

AP, February 9, 2007

Democratic Presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., talks to reporters on Capitol Hill in Washington, Tuesday, Feb. 6, 2007, at the conclusion of a news conference on Iraq.

Wyoming Republican Party

Sen. Barack Obama is skipping a forum for Democratic presidential candidates in Nevada this month - his first opportunity to share a platform with his rivals for the 2008 nomination.

Seven other announced or expected Democratic candidates, including front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, have told organizers they will participate in the Feb. 21 forum in Carson City, Nev. It's the first such candidates forum of the 2008 presidential campaign.

Obama, who is scheduled to be in southern Nevada the same week, couldn't work the Nevada forum into his itinerary, campaign spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said.

"It was a difficult decision. He very much wants to spend time getting to know the people of Nevada, talking about how we move the country forward, but there are only so many days in the calendar," Pfeiffer said. "He has a vigorous Senate schedule, it makes it very difficult to do all things he wants to do."

Pfeiffer said Obama will campaign in the Las Vegas area on Feb. 18, but did not release details on the senator's schedule. Obama is scheduled to formally announce his candidacy Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

The Senate is not in session the week of the Carson City forum, which is sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and the Nevada Democratic Party.

"We're disappointed that Senator Obama chose not to attend the AFSCME forum, it will be a great opportunity for candidates to begin a dialogue with Nevada voters," said party spokeswoman Kirsten Searer.

Besides Clinton, a senator from New York, other Democrats who have confirmed their participation are: Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards, Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

WASHINGTON (AP) - The federal government will test and certify voting systems for the first time after the U.S. Election Assistance Commission approves the labs to conduct the tests.

The commission expects to approve two labs - Ibeta Quality Assurance and SysTest Labs - by the end of February. The federal testing and certification program would start by early March, elections officials said Thursday.

Up to four more labs could be considered later to help with the equipment testing.

The commission voted Thursday to end an interim program that was used for testing modifications to some voting systems.

"We will put our own stamp of approval on any voting equipment," commission chair Donetta Davidson said Thursday. "We're not grandfathering in equipment."

Voting machine companies and the counties that buy their hardware and software aren't required to participate, but many states require national certification.

A 2002 law, the Help America Vote Act, created the commission and said it should establish a testing and certification program for voting systems. Voting problems in the disputed 2000 election prompted the law.

Security of the voting equipment - both hardware and software - and access for the disabled will be top goals of the certification program, Davidson said.

Edwards Learns Campaign Blogs Can Cut 2 Ways (NYT)

By John M. Broder

DOJ_NMG_0129889

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — John Edwards learned the hard way this week of the perils of grafting the raucous culture of the Internet to the decidedly staider world of a presidential campaign.

Mr. Edwards announced on Thursday, after 36 hours of deliberation, that he would keep on his campaign staff two liberal feminist bloggers with long cybertrails of incendiary comments on sex, religion and politics.

Deliberations over the fate of the two bloggers, Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, created a crisis in Mr. Edwards's nascent campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 and illuminated the treacherous road ahead as candidates of both parties try to harness the growing power of the online world. The case of the two women had left Mr. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, with difficult choices.

Mr. Edwards could keep the women on his staff and have to answer for the sometimes vulgar and intemperate writings posted on their personal blogs before he hired them late last month. He could dismiss them and face a revolt in the liberal blogosphere, which is playing an increasingly influential role in Democratic politics and could be especially important to his populist campaign. Some bloggers saw the controversy as manufactured by conservative groups.

Or, as Mr. Edwards did Thursday, he could keep the two bloggers on staff, but distance himself from their views.

In deciding to retain Ms. Marcotte and Ms. McEwan, he extracted public apologies from them for some of their work and a promise from them to maintain a civil tone while in his employ. Mr. Edwards stumbled into this minefield ahead of his rivals for the presidency, but many of the other candidates could face similar problems as they try to integrate the passionate, provocative and freewheeling political discourse that flourishes on the Internet into more tightly controlled means of traditional campaigning.

"This is all being made up as we go along," said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democrat Network, a political action organization that tries to serve as a bridge between traditional politics and the Wild West world of the Internet. "It is difficult to apply the old ways campaigns were run in the late 20th century to this new wide-open, citizen-led politics."

All the major presidential candidates in both parties have hired people with Internet experience to try to mine money and political support from the online community.

In a statement Thursday, Mr. Edwards distanced himself from the two bloggers' most inflammatory statements, which, he said, "personally offended me." He said that no one on his campaign would be allowed to use such intolerant language, even if intended as satire.

"But I also believe in giving everyone a fair shake," Mr. Edwards said in a statement. "I've talked to Amanda and Melissa; they have both assured me that it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

He also said he would not allow his campaign to be "hijacked" by religious conservatives who had pointed out the bloggers' most provocative comments and demanded their dismissal.

In some of their online writings, Ms. Marcotte and Ms. McEwan used vulgar language to characterize religious conservatives and Roman Catholic teachings on birth control, homosexuality and the virgin birth.

On her personal blog, Shakespeare's Sister, Ms. McEwan had referred to conservative Christians as "Christofascists." On the Pandagon blog site, Ms. Marcotte had said that the Catholic Church's prohibition on the use of birth control forced women to bear "more tithing Catholics."

This week, William A. Donohue, the president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, had called for Mr. Edwards to dismiss the women. Stunned to learn that he did not, Mr. Donohue said in an interview Thursday, "The bloggers are no longer the issue. Edwards is the issue."

The Edwards campaign released statements from the two women Thursday afternoon.

"My intention is never to offend anyone for his or her personal beliefs," Ms. Marcotte wrote, "and I am sorry if anyone was personally offended by writings meant only as criticisms of public politics."

Ms. McEwan said she did not expect Mr. Edwards to agree with everything she had ever written.

"It has never been my intention to disparage people's individual faith," Ms. McEwan said, "and I'm sorry if my words were taken in that way."

In a brief note on her personal blog on Wednesday, Ms. McEwan said that in the 2004 presidential election she had voted for Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who is a Roman Catholic, which she said was evidence that she was not anti-Catholic.

Ms. McEwan will serve as the Edwards campaign's so-called Netroots coordinator, in charge of outreach to the online community.

Neither woman responded to e-mail messages requesting further comment.

Jennifer Palmieri, a spokeswoman for Mr. Edwards, said he had not wanted to decide the women's fate without first speaking to them personally.

Asked whether the campaign had sufficiently screened the two women before they were hired, Ms. Palmieri said it was difficult to find and read every word a prolific blogger had written over a period of years.

Problems with bloggers have already bedeviled other campaigns. In last year's Democratic senatorial primary in Connecticut, some bloggers who supported Ned Lamont attacked his opponent, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, and one posted a picture of Mr. Lieberman in blackface.

Last summer, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, hired Patrick J. Hynes, a conservative blogger and political consultant, to be his campaign's blog liaison. Mr. Hynes quickly ran afoul of fellow bloggers by initially concealing his relationship to the McCain campaign while he was writing critically about other Republicans.

He then came under fire for declaring that the United States was a "Christian nation" in a book and television appearances that predated his work for Mr. McCain. Last November, while employed by Mr. McCain's campaign, Mr. Hynes posted on his personal blog a picture of Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, and invited readers to submit nicknames, some of which were anti-Semitic.

In an interview, Mr. Hynes said the Internet was a place where overheated language and vicious personal attacks were often tolerated, even encouraged. But, he said, "I would caution against holding candidates responsible for what their bloggers and blog consultants have said in the past."

"The blogosphere is a conversation; it's not reportage," Mr. Hynes said. "We're all trying to figure out, what does this mean for the convergence of all these media? It's a Pandora's box and no one knows where it's going to end up."

Mr. Hynes remained on the McCain campaign staff and maintained his personal blog.

Edwards To Retain Embattled Bloggers (WP/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Thursday he was personally offended by the provocative messages two of his campaign bloggers wrote criticizing the Catholic Church, but he's not going to fire them.

Edwards issued a statement and answered questions about the fate of Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, two days after the head of the conservative Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights demanded they be fired for messages they wrote before working on the campaign.

"I talked personally to the two women who were involved. They gave me their word they, under no circumstances, intended to denigrate any church or anybody's religion and offered their apologies for anything that indicated otherwise. I took them at their word," Edwards told reporters during a campaign stop in Charleston, S.C.

An angry Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, which counts 350,000 members, criticized Edwards for not firing the two bloggers. Donohue also promised a nationwide public relations campaign in newspapers, magazines and Catholic publications to tell voters what the candidate had done.

"When Mel Gibson got drunk and made anti-Semitic remarks, he paid a price for doing so. When Michael Richards got angry and made racist remarks, he paid a price for doing so. ... But John Edwards thinks the same rules don't apply to him, which is why he has chosen to embrace foul-mouthed, anti-Catholic bigots on his payroll," Donohue said.

Edwards has never met the two bloggers and his first conversation with them came when he called to discuss the uproar. The 2004 vice presidential nominee told reporters in South Carolina: "It will not happen again. That you can be sure of."

The campaign distributed written regrets from the two women, who stressed they were writing on personal blogs. Edwards said in the statement he believes in giving everyone a "fair shake."

On Tuesday, Donohue called for Edwards to fire the bloggers, citing posts that the women made in the past several months in which they criticized the church's opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity.

"The tone and the sentiment of some of Amanda Marcotte's and Melissa McEwan's posts personally offended me," Edwards said in the statement. "Everyone is entitled to their opinion, but that kind of intolerant language will not be permitted from anyone on my campaign, whether it's intended as satire, humor or anything else."

The two were hired last week as part of Edwards' outreach to liberal voters and online activists.

Edwards spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said the campaign was aware that Marcotte and McEwan, like many bloggers, had written provocative postings on their personal sites. But the campaign had not read them all and had not seen the postings criticizing the church until Donohue put out a statement Tuesday, Palmieri said.

For instance, Marcotte had written that the church wants "to force women to bear more tithing Catholics" and McEwan had written that the pope is among those who "regularly speak out against gay tolerance." Other postings used more graphic language.

Edwards remained silent for two days as the controversy grew on the Internet. Most of those posting on liberal Web sites were calling for Edwards to keep the bloggers on staff and stand up to Donohue, and many were vowing to work against him if he didn't.

Donohue is a frequent critic of those who speak out against the church and what he calls "political correctness run amok," such as the separation of Christmas and the holiday season.

Donohue also doesn't shy from blunt language sometimes in his criticism of gays, Hollywood's control by "secular Jews who hate Christianity" and even the Edwards bloggers, whom he referred to as "brats" in an interview Wednesday on MSNBC.

Palmieri said Edwards had been traveling through Michigan, Missouri and Oklahoma and wanted time to discuss the bloggers' statements with them and weigh their future.

"We're dealing with people's careers and reputations and livelihoods," Palmieri said.

In her statement, McEwan said she doesn't expect Edwards to agree with everything she's posted, but they share "an unwavering support of religious freedom and a deep respect for diverse beliefs.

Marcotte's statement said her writings on religion on her blog, Pandagon, are generally satirical criticisms of public policies and politics.

Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, a nonprofit formed to highlight Catholic social justice teachings, also issued a statement condemning the bloggers' remarks but accepting Edwards' assurances that he was also offended.

"Catholics comprise more than one quarter of the U.S. public, and neither John Edwards nor any other candidate can afford to take this constituency for granted," said executive director Alexia Kelley, who served briefly as a religious adviser to 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry.

Edwards Blogger Flap Discomforts Religious Left (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 9, 2007

As the flap over alleged anti-Catholic writings by two John Edwards campaign bloggers devolves into a shouting match between conservative religious voices and liberal bloggers, some members of the "religious left" say they feel – again – shoved to the margins of the Democratic Party.

"We're completely invisible to this debate," said Eduardo Penalver, a Cornell University law professor who writes for the liberal Catholic journal Commonweal. He said he was dissatisfied with the Edwards campaign's response. "As a constituency, the Christian left isn't taken all that seriously," Penalver said.

Democrats -- and Edwards in particular -- have embraced the language of faith and the imperative of competing with Republicans for the support of religious voters. His wife, Elizabeth Edwards, even sits on the board of the leading organization of the religious left, Call to Renewal. But in private conversations and careful public statements today, religious Democrats said they felt sidelined by Edwards' decision to stand by his aides.

"We have gone so far to rebuild that coalition [between Democrats and religious Christians] and something like this sets it back," said Brian O'Dwyer, a New York lawyer and Irish-American leader who chairs the National Democratic Ethnic Leadership Council, a Democratic Party group. O'Dwyer said Edwards should have fired the bloggers. "It's not only wrong morally – it's stupid politically."

O'Dwyer e-mailed a statement to reporters saying: "Senator Edwards is condoning bigotry by keeping the two bloggers on his staff. Playing to the cheap seats with anti-Catholic bigotry has no place in the Democratic Party."

In a comment that several Catholic Democrats told The Politico they found particularly offensive, Edwards aide Amanda Marcotte asked, in a posting to her personal blog, "What if Mary had taken Plan B after the Lord filled her with his hot, white, sticky Holy Spirit?"

The other Edwards blogger, Melissa McEwan, has come under fire for referring to Christian conservatives as “Christofascists” in her personal blog.

Thursday, the campaign issued a statement from Edwards saying that he had been personally offended by the remarks and that the bloggers "have both assured me that it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

The campaign also sent out semi-apologetic statements from each blogger saying she was sorry if anyone was offended.

And so religious liberals find themselves in a quandary. They have no interest in associating with the likes of William Donohue, the Catholic League president who is closely aligned with the GOP and led the charge against Edwards' aides. Donohue said Thursday he would take out newspaper advertisements attacking Edwards as anti-Catholic. But religious liberals also think Edwards' aides merit more than a slap on the wrist.

"I thought his explanation was not satisfying," said Cornell's Penalver. "It's obvious that they did mean to give offense."

"You imagine a similar kind of comment directed at the Jewish community or at the gay community – something at this level of intentional offensiveness -- and I have a hard time believing it gets resolved in the same way," he said.

The Catholic Alliance, which stresses that fighting poverty and social injustice are Catholic values, sent out a careful public statement Thursday afternoon,

"We accept Senator Edwards' assurances that he too was offended by comments made by recently-hired staffers and that religious intolerance has no place in his campaign," the group's executive director, Alexia Kelley, said in the statement.

But in a mark of how religious Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts, Kelley also took a passing shot at Donohue in an interview.

She said she hoped that Donohue would hew to the Catholic value of forgiveness in forgiving the bloggers – as Donohue had notoriously forgiven Mel Gibson.

Edwards Gets It Right (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

What a difference two years makes! At this point in 2005, the only question seemed to be how much of America's social insurance system — the triumvirate of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid — the Bush administration would manage to dismantle. Now almost all prominent Democrats and quite a few Republicans pay at least lip service to calls for a major expansion of social insurance, in the form of universal health care.

But fine words, by themselves, mean nothing. Remember "compassionate conservatism?" I won't trust presidential candidates on health care unless they provide enough specifics to show both that they understand the issues, and that they're willing to face up to hard choices when necessary.

And former Senator John Edwards has just set a fine example.

At first glance, the Edwards health care plan looks similar to several other proposals out there, including one recently unveiled by Arnold Schwarzenegger in California. But a closer look reveals extra features in the Edwards plan that take it a lot closer to what the country really needs.

Like Mr. Schwarzenegger, Mr. Edwards sets out to cover the uninsured with a combination of regulation and financial aid. Right now, many people are uninsured because, as the Edwards press release puts it, insurance companies "game the system to cover only healthy people." So the Edwards plan, like Schwarzenegger's, imposes "community rating" on insurers, basically requiring them to sell insurance to everyone at the same price.

Many other people are uninsured because they simply can't afford the cost. So the Edwards plan, again like other proposals, offers financial aid to help lower-income families buy insurance. To pay for this aid, he proposes rolling back tax cuts for households with incomes over $200,000 a year.

Finally, some people try to save money by going without coverage, so if they get sick they end up in emergency rooms at public expense. Like other plans, the Edwards plan would "require all American residents to get insurance," and would require that all employers either provide insurance to their workers or pay a percentage of their payrolls into a government fund used to buy insurance.

But Mr. Edwards goes two steps further.

People who don't get insurance from their employers wouldn't have to deal individually with insurance companies: they'd purchase insurance through "Health Markets": government-run bodies negotiating with insurance companies on the public's behalf. People would, in effect, be buying insurance from the government, with only the business of paying medical bills — not the function of granting insurance in the first place — outsourced to private insurers.

Why is this such a good idea? As the Edwards press release points out, marketing and underwriting — the process of screening out high-risk clients — are responsible for two-thirds of insurance companies' overhead. With insurers selling to government-run Health Markets, not directly to individuals, most of these expenses should go away, making insurance considerably cheaper.

Better still, "Health Markets," the press release says, "will offer a choice between private insurers and a public insurance plan modeled after Medicare." This would offer a crucial degree of competition. The public insurance plan would almost certainly be cheaper than anything the private sector offers right now — after all, Medicare has very low overhead. Private insurers would either have to match the public plan's low premiums, or lose the competition.

And Mr. Edwards is O.K. with that. "Over time," the press release says, "the system may evolve toward a single-payer approach if individuals and businesses prefer the public plan."

So this is a smart, serious proposal. It addresses both the problem of the uninsured and the waste and inefficiency of our fragmented insurance system. And every candidate should be pressed to come up with something comparable.

Yes, that includes Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton. So far, all we have from Mr. Obama is inspiring rhetoric about universal care — that's great, but how do we get there? And how do we know whether Mrs. Clinton, who says that she's "not ready to be specific," and that she wants to "build the consensus first," will really be willing to take on this issue again?

To be fair, these are still early days. But America's crumbling health care system is our most important domestic issue, and I think we have a right to know what those who would be president propose to do about it.

Clemons To Head Clinton's New Hampshire Campaign (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 9, 2007

MANCHESTER – As Democratic Presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton prepares for her first visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state tomorrow, her state campaign has its top staffer on board.

Clinton's campaign has hired New Hampshire Democratic Party executive director Nick Clemons as its state campaign director.

The hiring was first reported on UnionLeader.com yesterday afternoon.

Clemons, 33, of Portsmouth, has been party executive director since November 2004. He directed John Kerry's campaign in the state during the 2004 general election and was Kerry's field director during the New Hampshire primary campaign.

Clinton campaign national field director Karen Hicks called Clemons' hiring "a really good catch for us and I'm pleased that he is going to do it. He has the experience that allows us to hit the ground running." She called Clemons "one of the best political organizers in the state. He will bring a wealth of experience, a savvy and great set of contacts to the Clinton campaign."

Clemons said he was "excited at the opportunity to work for Senator Clinton. She's got a fantastic campaign team in place at the national level and here in New Hampshire."

State Democratic Chair Kathy Sullivan called Clemons "the best executive director in the country. He ran the most successful Democratic campaign in the country in 2006. He is very smart, and this is the best hire that Senator Clinton's campaign could have made. In addition to being a smart strategist, he also has an in-depth knowledge of New Hampshire. And he made me look really good!"

Sullivan said she intends to appoint an interim executive director pending approval of the party executive committee.

She is leaving her post in late March and said it will be up to the next party chairman to hire a new top party staffer.

Former President Clinton's Focus: Cooperation (DMN)

By Gromer Jeffers

The Dallas Morning News, February 9, 2007

GRAND PRAIRIE – Former President Bill Clinton on Thursday called on Americans to move from interdependence to an integrated society that focuses on security, diplomacy and improvements on such issues as health care and energy.

Mr. Clinton's speech, given at Nokia Theatre, was a sprawling lecture nearly devoid of politics.

He even refrained from discussing the presidential aspirations of his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

When the crowd of about 4,000 cheered when he referred to her, he told them, "The cause of your applause means I won't get to see her much in the next few months."

Mr. Clinton's speech focused on the United States' role in a modern global society.

His call for diplomacy and coalition building could have been a direct rebuttal to the war in Iraq. Although he said military force should always be an option for protecting a nation's interest, he added that war was a costly, sometimes incorrect action.

President Bush has been criticized for not developing a strong world alliance before going to war in Iraq.

"You've got to have more partners and fewer enemies," Mr. Clinton said during a speech that lasted just over an hour. "Then when you fight your enemies, you have a better chance to win."

Mr. Clinton said humanitarian aid to tsunami victims improved America's approval rating in Indonesia from 30 percent to well over 50 percent.

He said American aid helped change the minds of residents in the storm-ravaged country.

"They realized it was better to build than to tear down," Mr. Clinton said.

The former president called for the U.S. to develop a more efficient and affordable health-care system.

And, he said, businesses should find a way to develop and profit from cleaner energy.

"If I were young and going into business, I would get into clean energy and make a fortune," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0129894

Mr. Clinton said many people in the U.S. – and the world – have benefited over the last century. But, he said, hundreds of millions remain poor, uneducated and unnecessarily ill.

"The modern world has been real good to me," he said. "But it is unequal, unstable and unsustainable."

Former President Clinton Urges Positive View (HC)

By Alexis Grant

Houston Chronicle, February 9, 2007

Telling Rice students "there's plenty of doing that needs done," former President Clinton on Thursday encouraged them to help steer the country in a positive direction while taking a global view of today's challenges.

"Private citizens have more power to do good in public areas than ever before," he said. "People with no money at all who can just give a little bit have the chance to change the world if they all agree on the same thing at the same time."

The Autry Court speech, sponsored by Rice University's Baker Institute for Public Policy, was attended by about 4,000 students and faculty.

"It was a very good message to Rice students because we really consider ourselves active in trying to change the world," said Matthew Broussard, 18, a mechanical engineering student.

Clinton also emphasized the importance of what he calls global interdependence.

In just over an hour that included a brief Q&A period, he talked about the need for new energy sources and better health care around the world, explained his philosophy on holding developing countries to certain standards while providing financial aid, and backed the two-term limit for presidents.

"You do have to have a security policy, but building a world with more partners and fewer terrorists is always cheaper than going to war," he said.

Clinton, who sometimes pulls in more than $100,000 for an appearance, according to published reports, spoke at Rice for free. He owed a favor to James A. Baker III, former secretary of state and founder of the institute, said Rice University spokesman Franz Brotzen.

But Clinton, whose wife is expected to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, joked that he had other reasons for visiting the university. He alluded to Baker's prominent role in the 2000 presidential recount in Florida that gave Republican George W. Bush the presidency over Al Gore.

"I got the biggest speaker's fee I've ever received," Clinton said. "Not one red cent. But I got Jim Baker's solemn promise that in the event of an election challenge in 2008, he will not represent the Republican nominee for president."

Williams Can't Duck Campaign Pushes (WT)

By Robert Stacy McCain

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Conservative economist Walter E. Williams says he's flattered at being urged to seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- even if the draft committee is headed by a cartoon duck.

The "Mallard Fillmore" comic strip has spent the past two weeks promoting the George Mason University economics professor as a 2008 candidate -- with some success, judging from Mr. Williams' e-mail in-box.

"I've been inundated," the 70-year-old Mr. Williams said of responses to cartoonist Bruce Tinsley's strip, which has prominently featured Mr. Williams' e-mail address (wwilliam@gmu.edu). "I've only gotten one or two ugly [e-mails], and I've gotten hundreds" of positive messages.

A popular syndicated columnist who often fills in for Rush Limbaugh when the top talk-radio host is on vacation, Mr. Williams said in a telephone interview that he was surprised when Mr. Tinsley began a series of "Draft Walter Williams" cartoons Jan. 29.

"I found it very funny, and I found it quite flattering as well," said Mr. Williams, whose column appears in The Washington Times, as does the "Mallard Fillmore" strip.

The idea for the series was simple, Mr. Tinsley said: Mr. Williams is "an actual conservative, and who better to run for elective office than somebody who's been writing his ideas down for us to read for years? He can't waffle. Also, Adam Smith and Bill Buckley weren't available."

Like many other conservatives, the Indiana-based cartoonist said he's less than enthusiastic about the current crop of Republican presidential contenders.

"Philosophical conservatives are tired of 'moderates,' who try to be all things to all people and end up pandering to those who wouldn't vote for them in a million years," Mr. Tinsley said in an e-mail. "Reagan was genuinely conservative, take it or leave it. And it worked."

While Mr. Tinsley said "maybe" he (and his cartoon alter-ego, Mallard) could support former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, he said he was disappointed that Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, "has said unequivocally that he's not interested" in a 2008 White House bid.

"But I believe him, since he's one of the few legislators who seems to consistently mean what he says," Mr. Tinsley said.

Right now, however, Mr. Tinsley says he's "not giving up" on his campaign to promote the candidacy of Mr. Williams.

The George Mason professor says he shares Mr. Tinsley's disdain for career politicians.

"I personally think that if we chose the president of the United States at random, we'd get a better president than any president since Ronald Reagan," said Mr. Williams.

Mr. Williams' own '08 favorite is Rep. Ron Paul, Texas Republican and a 1988 Libertarian Party presidential nominee, who last month announced the formation of an exploratory committee.

"If the framers of the Constitution were somehow to come back, Ron Paul is one of possibly only three people in Congress that they'd even talk to," said Mr. Williams, adding that most politicians have a "generalized contempt" for the values of the Constitution.

The biggest obstacle to his own candidacy, Mr. Williams said, is his wife of 47 years, Conchetta.

"She said that if I ever thought about it seriously, she'd assassinate me," he said.

While his age (he'll turn 71 next month) might seem a problem to a presidential run, Mr. Williams says he is in excellent health, thanks to a regimen that includes a personal trainer, bicycling, two glasses of wine each day -- and smoking half a pack of cigarettes daily. "My grandfather smoked a pack of Camels a day, drank almost a half-pint of Old Grandad every day and died when he was 94," he said.

Though he has no plans for trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, Mr. Williams would not completely rule out a 2008 run for the White House.

"I've learned that one should always keep his options open," he said. "You should never say never, but I haven't gone to the trouble of forming an exploratory committee."

Lawmakers Closer To Moving Up Florida's Presidential Primary (AP)

By Stephen Majors

AP, February 9, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. - Defying national Republican and Democratic party threats, Florida lawmakers in a House committee Thursday unanimously approved a proposal to hold the state's presidential primary as early as January.

If the bill (HB 537) becomes law, Florida's primary - currently in March, when it's virtually irrelevant - would take place either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. That would mean Florida's 2008 contest could be in late January or earlier. New Hampshire's secretary of state is waiting to schedule the primary until other states set theirs, to preserve its first-in-the-nation status. National Democrats have recommended that New Hampshire hold its primary Jan. 22.

An identical bill has been filed in the Senate.

With states around the country, including California, jockeying for position to challenge the traditional dominance of the Iowa Caucus and the New Hampshire primary, Florida legislators on both sides of the aisle don't want to be left behind. They believe a state as large and diverse as Florida should play a fundamental role in the nomination process.

And they believe candidates would then have to pay more attention to Florida's needs - such as the idea of a national hurricane catastrophe fund, which Florida supports but has so far failed to gain traction nationally.

The national parties want to prevent a nationwide arms race for the earliest primary. Both parties could punish states like Florida that move their primary earlier than Feb. 5 by taking away delegates to the nominating convention. The Democratic Party could even punish candidates who campaign or advertise in states that move their primaries earlier than Feb. 5 by essentially keeping them from getting the state's vote.

Those threats pale in comparison to the influence Florida could gain, the bill's sponsor, Rep. David Rivera, R-Miami, told the House Ethics and Elections Committee.

"I think that having 67 less individuals attend five days in Minneapolis is a very, very small price to pay to increase Florida's relevance on the national stage," said Rivera, referring to the number of Florida Republican delegates that could be lost at the site of the 2008 Republican National Convention.

Rep. Dan Gelber, D-Miami Beach, the House Democratic leader, said Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called him to say the move could have consequences. But Gelber said it wouldn't make sense to punish Democrats for the actions of a Republican-controlled Legislature. Florida Democratic Party Chair Karen Thurman also wrote the House committee members in a letter, warning them not to push the primary any earlier than Feb. 5 to avoid potential backlash.

"I don't have any constituents in the DNC," Gelber said. "I only have constituents in my district. They would like to be more relevant."

According to a recent Quinnipiac University poll of 1,003 Florida voters, 46 percent of those surveyed said they wanted to move up the primary, compared to 36 percent opposed to it, and 19 percent unsure.

Lawmakers and some experts think the national parties are bluffing, and would never take away a candidate's delegates if it meant hurting a party's chances overall in a national election.

Some committee members expressed concern that giving a state the size of Florida a greater say earlier in the nominating process could shut out presidential hopefuls with less money.

"I think we should all recognize that money does have too much (influence), and that's problematic," said Rep. Keith Fitzgerald, D-Sarasota. "I don't think the balance of that argument ... weighs against this."

Good For NH, Bad For Everybody Else (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 9, 2007

MANCHESTER – Actions by officials in various states to move up their presidential nominating primaries or caucuses to early dates to compete with the first-in-the-nation New Hampshire primary will backfire, the state's Democratic and Republican chairmen say.

"Everything like this that happens is just making New Hampshire more important," Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan said yesterday. "The more states that move up, the more important we become and, ironically, the less important they become because there will be so many of them."

"I agree completely," said state Republican Chairman Fergus Cullen. "These other states will just cannibalize themselves."

Sullivan said New Hampshire "will have the best primary ever, but we will have the worst process nationally" because the post-New Hampshire "front-loading" will likely have the nominees chosen by the first week of February 2008 and leave no time for debates across the nation among candidates of either party.

"As a New Hampshire person, this doesn't upset me," she said. "But as an American, having all these states move up is appalling."

Cullen added, "This front-loading makes New Hampshire yet more important but it's bad for the process and bad for democracy."

In 2004, seven states held primaries or caucuses a week after New Hampshire's primary. Other states spread out their primaries and caucuses through late winter and spring.

It's unclear today how the 2008 calendar will end up, but it appears that if the New Hampshire primary is held on Jan. 22 - and that has not been determined - there could be as many as 16 states holding primaries or caucuses either the following week or two weeks after New Hampshire.

In the latest developments, Florida lawmakers are quickly moving bipartisan legislation that would jump that's state's primary - currently in March - to either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. Wyoming Republicans voted to hold county conventions on the same day as the New Hampshire primary, regardless of when it is held. Wyoming Democrats are skeptical of breaking their national party's rule by jumping up the date of their conventions.

Large states such as California, New Jersey and Michigan are on the list of states that have either moved, or are on the verge of moving, caucuses or primaries to within two weeks of New Hampshire, while officials in Illinois are talking seriously about it as well.

Will candidates be forced to spend less time in New Hampshire and, as a result, diminish its importance to the nominating process? Sullivan doesn't think so.

"As more and more chaos is created in the calendar," she said, "the two known stable states that everyone knows are going to be early are Iowa and New Hampshire."

The Democratic National Committee wants Nevada to hold a caucus between Iowa and New Hampshire, and candidates are going to Nevada to campaign.

But neither national party holds any influence over when the New Hampshire primary date is set. Only Secretary of State William M. Gardner can do that under the authority given to him by a state law mandating the primary be held at least seven days before any "similar election." He has strongly indicated he will set the date of the primary ahead of Nevada, and possibly even

Iowa's leadoff caucus, under what he considers a broad authority granted to him in the law to protect the primary's traditional status and influence on the nominating process.

Bill ensures primary power

Gardner could not be reached yesterday, but Deputy Secretary of State David Scanlan said: "This is the same story that just gets repeated every time a state tries something. There is really nothing new in the latest moves."

Scanlan said that Gardner "will set the date when he thinks the time is appropriate and he will set the date in accordance with state law."

Sullivan noted that as long as other states stay at least a week behind New Hampshire, "that would not violate the letter of our law. We could have Iowa and New Hampshire and 48 other states."

Nevada is the only state at the moment that could trigger the law. It is unclear what Gardner would do about Wyoming. The question there will be whether elections of county convention delegates would constitute a "similar election."

Cullen agrees with Gardner's strategy. He also said New Hampshire's primary is a nationally recognized event not only because it is first.

"It's also that we're a small state where candidates can meet voters one-on-one," he said. "Florida can hold a primary in December and it wouldn't be a place where candidates can do that."

The rush to the front by a dozen or more states shows the national parties "have lost all control," Sullivan said. "Instead of focusing on a process that would have given all 50 states an important say in who the nominees are," she said, "they created chaos. There is clearly a lack of respect for the national party rules."

A Republican Florida lawmaker scoffed at the notion that his state would lose delegates at the national convention if Florida holds a primary outside of the party rules.

"I think that having 67 less individuals attend five days in Minneapolis is a very, very small price to pay to increase Florida's relevance on the national stage," said Rep. David Rivera, R-Miami, referring to the number of Florida Republican delegates that could be lost at the site of the 2008 Republican National Convention.

But she did not give Democratic National Chairman Howard Dean a pass, saying that "both national parties are at fault here."

She suggested that the candidates themselves now "step up and use their influence over their supporters, who are officials in these states, and say, 'Stop!'"

In Florida, a House committee yesterday unanimously approved a proposal to push the state's presidential primary to late January.

If the bill becomes law, Florida's primary would take place either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. New Hampshire has not set its date. An identical bill has been filed in the Senate.

Florida legislators on both sides of the aisle don't want to be left behind. They believe a state as large and diverse as Florida should play a fundamental role in the nomination process.

And they believe candidates would then have to pay more attention to Florida's needs - such as the idea of a national hurricane catastrophe fund.

Rep. Dan Gelber, D-Miami Beach, the House Democratic leader, said Dean called him to say the move could have consequences. But Gelber said it wouldn't make sense to punish Democrats for the actions of a Republican-controlled Legislature. Florida Democratic Party Chairman Karen Thurman also wrote the House committee members a letter warning them not to push the primary any earlier than Feb. 5 to avoid potential backlash.

"I don't have any constituents in the DNC," Gelber said. "I only have constituents in my district. They would like to be more relevant."

Primary Madness (WP)

BY THIS TIME next year, the races for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations are likely to be over. Bemoaning the front-loaded primary calendar has become a quadrennial event, but this campaign could be more speeded up than ever and even less healthful for the democratic process. Under the plan, the Democrats' 2008 sprint starts with caucuses in Iowa (Jan. 14) and Nevada (Jan. 19), followed by primaries in New Hampshire (Jan. 22) and South Carolina (Jan. 29). New Hampshire, angry that its first-in-the-nation status is being threatened, could jump the starting gun and move its contest even earlier, to 2007.

But the worst news is that a number of larger states, including California, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Illinois, are considering moving their primaries to Feb. 5, the first permissible date for other states to hold contests. On the part of each individual state, this is a rational act: Why should voters from smaller states determine the outcome while big-state voters are shut out? But the overall result will be a worsening of all the ill effects of front-loading, and for both parties: In most states, the Republican primary is held the same day.

Front-loading benefits better-known candidates with big bank accounts more than it does dark horses who might be able to do well and gain momentum in a more rationally paced system. It deprives most voters in most states of having a say in who their party's nominee will be. It short-circuits a process that could test candidates' capacities for connecting with voters and conveying their views.

The Democratic National Committee has tried to bribe states into waiting by offering them bonus delegates for going later, but this doesn't seem likely to work. As a result, for 2008, there's not much to do about this state of affairs other than lament it. Regarding 2012, now is the time for both parties to get together on a reform. Because Republicans will set their rules for 2012 at the 2008 convention, the parties' consultation needs to happen soon.

The National Association of Secretaries of State has proposed a calendar that would allow Iowa and New Hampshire to go first, followed by four regional primaries held every month from March through June. The regions would rotate their positions on the primary calendar each cycle. We supported the plan in 2000, when it seemed the process couldn't become much crazier. Now, when that campaign looks measured and sedate by the light-speed standards of 2008, we agree more than ever.

Three Vulnerables Buck Parties; Loyal Sununu, Smith Under Fire (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Vulnerable Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Mary Landrieu (D-La.) spent much of the 110th Congress's first month burnishing their centrist credentials, while other 2008 targets largely have stuck by their parties thus far, according to a review of Senate roll call votes by The Hill.

Coleman and Collins capped off a month of bucking their party by voting to move forward with debate on legislation critical of President Bush's proposed troop increase in Iraq. Sens. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) and John Sununu (R-N.H.), meanwhile, are drawing heat for standing with their party on the vote.

Coleman and Collins were the only two Republicans to vote for cloture, and they also teamed up on three other close roll call votes. The two voted with Democrats on amendments to consider Indian tribes as corporations for political-giving purposes and to ban family from campaign and political action committees, as well as on cloture to increase the federal minimum wage.

On the other side of the aisle, Landrieu, widely considered the most vulnerable Democratic senator, voted with Republicans on those amendments and two others, to the ethics bill. One of the amendments allowed for pre-approved travel paid for by 501(c) 3 groups; the other struck a provision related to grassroots lobbying.

The only Democrat to vote with Republicans more frequently was Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), regarded as the most centrist Democrat in the Senate. For Republicans, only Collins's Maine colleague, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R), approached Coleman's and Collins's independent streaks.

Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said the departure of Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) from the chamber has left a void waiting to be filled at the left reaches of the Republican Party, and Collins and Snowe are the most likely candidates to fill it. Coleman and Landrieu, she said, have gradually built on their centrist credentials in recent months.

"They're up for reelection; they're not going to take one for the team right now," Duffy said.

Other vulnerable Republicans largely have voted the party line in 2007. Smith and Sununu joined with Democrats a few times during the ethics bill debate, but both are weathering criticism for not voting for cloture on the Iraq debate.

Liberal activist group MoveOn.org has spent $140,000 on ad buys nationwide and locally in Oregon and New Hampshire criticizing Smith, Sununu and others for their votes, and Democrats smell blood.

Smith has been a focal point in the Iraq war discourse since his impassioned post-election speech against how the war is being waged, and he opposes the troop increase.

Priding himself as an independent Republican, he broke away from his party at several points on the ethics debate. But Iraq remains at the forefront, and Democrats see potential fodder in his vote against cloture.

At the same time, explaining the vote to voters poses a challenge for Democrats, and if the resolutions do get to a vote, Smith likely will weigh in more clearly. On Wednesday, he was one of seven senators, including Coleman and Collins, to sign a letter pledging to bring Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) anti-increase resolution to a vote — a move the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) labeled "hypocrisy."

"Voters will do addition and subtraction; they won't do algebra. And cloture votes are algebra," a West Coast Democratic consultant, Jim Ross, said. "You have to say, 'This guy opposed the bill,' and make him defend his action."

Smith spokesman R.C. Hammond said the MoveOn ads deceive voters because Smith wanted to vote on all of the Iraq resolutions.

"Sen. Smith opposes the troop surge, and he's helped draft the consensus Warner resolution," Hammond said. "Oregonians know who's against the troop surge, and they know that the advertising is misleading."

Sununu, who along with Snowe and Collins is of a waning breed as a Northeastern Republican, voted with Democrats even less frequently than Smith. Formerly red New Hampshire experienced perhaps the largest Democratic swing in November, seeing about a quarter of its state legislature flip and its two Republican House members fall.

Sununu has not gone as far as others to separate himself from Iraq and did not sign the letter on Warner's resolution.

A political science professor at Manchester, N.H.'s Saint Anselm College, Dante Scala, said Sununu needs to work on billing himself as New Hampshire's senator rather than the Republicans' senator — "what [Sen.] Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) does so well" — by finding non-GOP issues with which to identify himself.

"He's not going to become [Sen.] Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) or something," Scala said, referring to the most ardently anti-Iraq GOP senator. "I don't think anybody would buy that."

The DSCC also attacked Sununu Wednesday, charging him with evasiveness on Iraq: "Sununu may try to run from his blind support for the war in Iraq, but he won't be able to flee voters next election," DSCC spokeswoman Deirdre Murphy said.

Sununu has avoided speaking on the issue of late and his office did not return requests for comment.

Red-state Democrats who could face strong challenges in 2008, such as Sens. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), largely stuck with their party. Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) voted with Republicans on some amendments to the ethics bill.

Warner, who is up in 2008, voted with the Democrats on cloture for the minimum-wage bill.

Less Is More, But In Idaho, Not For Long (NYT)

By William Yardley

BOISE, Idaho, Feb. 2 — When Gov. C. L. Otter took office last month and immediately halted construction work on the state Capitol his objections went beyond the $130 million price tag for the renovation and addition.

"My concern is also about the expansion of government," said Mr. Otter, a Republican. "When you have more space, bureaucracy doesn't like an empty office. It creates a vacuum. It sucks people into it, and all of a sudden you've got to have more people."

The governor has since reached a deal with the Republican-controlled Legislature to cut the project in half, allowing construction to go forward, although not until the new individual offices for legislators are removed from the blueprints.

Yet if Mr. Otter won this round, he might well savor the moment because Idaho's government is growing whether or not government buildings grow with it.

In a conservative state that has long viewed government with suspicion, that still means conflict. But even the governor's fellow Republicans concede that the momentum here shifted years ago from bait-and-bullet to New West boutique. As with so many other decreasingly rugged places in the inland West, there is more of everybody in Idaho now: techies, Democrats, immigrants, environmentalists. Ten thousand people showed up at Boise State University last month to hear Al Gore talk about global warming. Ten thousand people. To hear Al Gore. In Idaho.

The state's population, almost 1.5 million, is up nearly 50 percent since 1990 and some projections show it gaining another 50 percent or more by 2020.

While the growth has brought a sophisticated new economy, it has also brought demands for more spending on education and transportation and concerns about high taxes, too much development and a trampled environment.

And a ton more government.

In 1991, the state budget was $900 million. This year it is $2.6 billion. In 1985, there were 11,876 state employees. In 2005, there were 17,528.

In 1985, the number of pages of legislation passed was 759. Last year it was 1,581.

The public spaces where many of the issues are aired, however, are the same small hearing rooms, some with a single row of chairs for the public, where part-time lawmakers and a few interested stakeholders once wrangled largely over matters of mining, farming and logging.

Now, although the Legislature is still part-time, people squeeze into the back of hearing rooms, huddle in doorways or crowd around speakers that broadcast committee discussions out into the rotunda. (The volume dial on the speaker outside one hearing room was turned all the way up to 10 this week.)

"It was designed to not have very much public participation in the process," Speaker of the House Lawerence E. Denney said of the Capitol.

While there now are more citizens who follow the Legislature, more people are paid to participate as well. About 75 lobbyists were members of the Idaho Legislative Advisors when Jan Eyth first started serving coffee and snacks in the group's tiny lounge on the Capitol's fourth floor in 1985. Now, Ms. Eyth said, there are more than 150 members, and there are more than 300 registered lobbyists in the state.

Still, some say, interpret this change carefully.

"You know what lobbyists are?" said Russell Westerberg, a lobbyist from Soda Springs who came to Boise as a state representative in 1975. "They're the people that the people have to pay to protect them from the people that they elected." He added, "It's still Idaho; the government that governs least, governs best."

The Capitol, in which a light-filled rotunda is lined with bright marble, once housed the Legislature, the governor's office, the Supreme Court and even a mineral laboratory. Now, some key offices, including parts of the secretary of state's office, are hidden in windowless corners of the basement or they have moved out.

The state spends $13 million a year renting about 900,000 square feet of private office space.

All of that eventually prevailed upon Mr. Otter, to a degree. Under the compromise with the Legislature, which had approved the expansion a year ago, new underground wings will be reduced in size and many new offices will be cut. Larger hearing rooms will be built, however, and renovations at the Capitol will go forward.

Still, neither side claims to be happy with the deal, and no one is certain whether much money will be saved. The commission overseeing the project has asked to see a revised budget before moving forward. That could take weeks.

In the meantime, as the Legislature debates lowering grocery taxes, restricting elk ranching and building a new prison, it also is preparing to move out of the Capitol.

The Legislature, which had planned to hold its 2008 and 2009 sessions in temporary quarters in two aging buildings, including the former Ada County Courthouse, now probably will be there through the 2010 session because of the delays in construction.

The governor, whose office on the second floor of the Capitol has one of the few fireplaces in the building, says the state should renovate the older buildings and use them permanently for offices. Under the compromise, he agreed to move some of his staff out of the Capitol.

Mr. Otter, a former three-term congressman, took few specific stands in his campaign for governor last fall, but he did run commercials saying the expansion project was wasteful. He said he would "run government the old-fashioned way, lean and smart." Back then, he said he would rather spend the expansion money, more than $40 million of the overall amount, on education and other needs.

In an interview in his office on Friday, he popped up from his chair to retrieve photographs of a schoolyard cluttered with temporary classrooms. Then he showed a picture of the state Capitol in Texas, whose underground expansion wings were a model for the Idaho plan.

"This is where they want kids to spend nine months," Mr. Otter said. "This is where they want to spend three months."

Senator Robert L. Geddes, who is the president pro tem and one of the leaders of the expansion project, conceded that legislators could only put up so much of a fight, even in a changing state.

"The vision of a grandiose Taj Mahal being built for the comfort of me," Mr. Geddes said, "that doesn't sit real well in my conservative district."

The A.B.A.'s Judicial Ethics Mess (NYT)

At a moment when judicial independence is under heightened political attack, the nation's legal establishment should be doing everything it can to shore up public trust. Instead, the special commission charged with recommending revisions to the Model Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association has been flip-flopping around on some of the most important aspects of the code, which the states use to set standards for their courts.

For decades, the code's overarching charge to judges has been to avoid not only actual impropriety, but also the appearance of impropriety. Recently, however, quietly adopted changes to the commission's "final" report demoted this gold standard of judicial conduct from an enforceable rule to a mere aspirational guideline.

When the misguided switch came to light, the panel reversed field again yesterday and went back to the previous formulation. But that does not excuse the fact that the panel was following internal politics, not sound legal principle. The change might have eluded pubic attention if Robert Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct, had not protested and Adam Liptak had not reported on the matter in The Times this week.

Mark Harrison, chairman of the flailing ethics panel, claimed just days ago that the "appearance of impropriety" standard was vague and unfair. But judges interpret rules like that all the time, and the Conference of Chief Justices, made up of top state judges, unanimously endorsed the appearance of impropriety as a basis for disciplinary enforcement.

Despite yesterday's news, the proposed code revisions have serious deficiencies. They fall well short of ending the festering scandal of expense-paid judicial seminars that are held at desirable resorts and underwritten by private interests . If the House of Delegates lacks the resolve to ban these junkets, it should at least limit reimbursements for accompanying spouses. There should be no free rides or free lunches (or breakfasts or dinners).

The rules on when a judge must bow out of hearing cases also need work. At the federal level, judges must recuse themselves when they have any financial interest raising a potential conflict. That is far preferable to the model code's approach of letting state judges decide for themselves whether their financial conflict is minimal enough to stay on a case.

There is a real danger in relying on this commission's judgment. Members of the A.B.A.'s House of Delegates are supposed to vote on the new code next week in Miami. Their wisest course would be to defer the issue, at least until the group's next meeting in August. In the meantime, the president of the bar should appoint an independent committee of experts to review all of the provisions and make their own assessment of what is really needed.

Iran To Hit U.S. Interests If Attacked (WP)

By William Branigin

Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Iran's supreme leader warned today that any U.S. attack on his country would trigger Iranian retaliation against U.S. interests "around the world."

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei issued the threat as Iran's Revolutionary Guards carried out military exercises in the Persian Gulf that included the test-firing of anti-ship missiles with a range of more than 200 miles.

The missiles "can hit different kinds of big warships in all of the Persian Gulf, all of the Sea of Oman and the north of the Indian Ocean," senior Revolutionary Guards naval commander Ali Fadavi told Iran's state-run television. The missile tests were staged on the second day of exercises by Iranian naval and air force units in the Gulf as a second U.S. aircraft carrier headed toward the waterway.

Fadavi said the missiles can carry warheads of about 1,100 pounds and have a maximum range of 220 miles. He did not identify the missiles or elaborate on the results of the tests.

President Bush last month ordered an aircraft carrier strike group headed by the USS John C. Stennis to sail for the Gulf to join the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, a carrier that deployed in the Gulf in December. The dispatch of the second carrier group has been portrayed in part as a show of force to Iran, which the United States accuses of meddling in Iraq and of pursuing nuclear weapons.

Addressing a gathering of Iranian air force officers, Khamenei, who holds the title of "supreme leader" in Iran's Shiite Muslim theocracy, said, "The enemies know well that any aggression will lead to a reaction from all sides in the Iranian nation on the aggressors and their interests around the world." In remarks broadcast on Iranian state television, he said of the prospect of an attack, "We believe that no one will make such an unwise and wrong move that would endanger their country and interests."

Khamenei continued, "Some say that the U.S. president is not the type who acts based on calculations or thinks about the consequences of his action. But even these people can be brought to their senses." He said U.S. policymakers know that Iran "would not let an invasion go without a response."

Another top Iranian cleric, former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, made similar remarks today in the Shiite holy city of Qom, warning that any military attack on Iran "would be very costly for the United States," the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. He said it was unlikely that Washington would "take such a stupid action," IRNA reported. Rafsanjani, who currently chairs a powerful consultative group called the Expediency Council, charged that the United States "wishes to see a dependent Iran and avoids considering Iran as a regional or global power," IRNA reported.

In Washington, the White House dismissed the threats, saying that the United States has no intention of launching a war against Iran.

"Khamenei from time to time makes these unprovoked statements, and we would certainly hope they are not directed at the United States because President Bush has made it clear we have no intention of going to war with Iran," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, [a wire service] news agency reported.

He also played down the missile tests, saying that the Iranians "run various exercises from time to time in the Persian Gulf" and that "we monitor those exercises."

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters that the administration does not see the tests "as a direct assault on our ships."

In response to Khamenei's warning, Snow said, "I've said it, the secretary of defense has said it, the president has said it: We're not invading Iran." He said Khamenei is "spinning a hypothetical about something that is not contemplated."

President Bush said last week that he has no intention of sending U.S. forces into Iran, but he vowed to "respond firmly" if Iran steps up a campaign that the United States charges is aimed at killing U.S. troops and derailing democracy in Iraq. Bush said he would do "whatever it takes" to protect U.S. troops in Iraq from what the White House says have been attacks with weapons supplied by Iran.

Washington is also locked in a dispute with Iran over the country's nuclear program, notably its efforts to enrich uranium in defiance of a U.N. Security Council resolution. The United States regards the program as a cover for developing nuclear weapons. Iran denies any such aim, insisting that it is building nuclear power plants only to generate electricity and that it wants to control its own nuclear fuel cycle.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said yesterday that he plans to discuss the nuclear issue with Western counterparts on the sidelines of a Feb. 9-11 security conference being held in Munich. The talks would be the first since the U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran in December, prohibiting the transfer of nuclear material and know-how to Iran. The council also gave Iran until Feb. 21 to suspend its enrichment program, but Tehran has shown no sign of acceding to that demand.

The State Department said U.S. officials have no plans to meet with Larijani in Munich and that Iran must stop its uranium enrichment program as a prerequisite for any direct talks.

Larijani and other Iranian officials have accused the United States of involvement in the kidnapping Sunday of an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad. The diplomat, identified as Jalal Sharafi, a second secretary at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad, was seized by a group of about 30 armed men, IRNA reported.

U.S. officials deny any role in the abduction, which may have been part of Iraq's growing sectarian violence pitting minority Sunni Muslim Arabs against Iraq's majority Shiites. Sunnis have charged that Iraqi Shiite leaders are beholden to Iran. In the 1980s, Iraq, then ruled by Saddam Hussein, fought a brutal eight-year war with Iran. The war ended in stalemate after Iranian forces managed to repel an Iraqi invasion aimed at gaining control of Iran's southwestern oil fields.

Iran's Leader Warns The U.S. About Carrying Out Any Attack (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

TEHRAN, Feb. 8 — Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned the United States on Thursday that Iran would retaliate against American interests worldwide if it was attacked. It was the latest volley in an escalating war of rhetoric between the countries.

Speaking to a group of air force commanders about rumors of an imminent American military strike, Ayatollah Khamenei said, "Iranian people should not get scared of such issues," the Iranian Student News Agency reported. "Our enemies know very well that any aggression will have a response from all sides by Iranian people on their interests all over the world."

He added, "No one would commit such a blunder and jeopardize the interests of his country and people."

Iran's Revolutionary Guards also said Thursday that as part of a war games exercise, they had successfully test-fired a land-to-sea missile capable of sinking large warships.

"These missiles, with a maximum range of 220 miles, can hit different kinds of big warships throughout the Persian Gulf, the Sea of Oman and the northern Indian Ocean," Ali Fadavi, a senior Revolutionary Guards naval commander, said on state television.

The speech by Ayatollah Khamenei was his first major public appearance since the United Nations Security Council approved limited sanctions on Dec. 23 because of Iran's refusal to halt efforts to enrich uranium. The United States and some European countries accuse Iran of having a secret weapons program, but Iran contends that its nuclear development is for peaceful purposes only.

Ayatollah Khamenei did not mention Iran's nuclear program, but he brushed off the sanctions as insignificant. "The United States and some other countries have imposed sanctions on Iran for many years now," he said. "But we achieved great scientific and technological progress under such circumstances. So they cannot scare this great nation with sanctions."

Ayatollah Khamenei also dismissed rumors that he was suffering from a serious illness, saying they were aimed at weakening the resolve of the Iranian people.

The war games by Iran, the second it has staged this year, seemed to be a response to the naval buildup by the United States in the Persian Gulf. President Bush has dispatched two aircraft carriers to the region and provided antimissile batteries to some Persian Gulf states.

In Seville, Spain, where Robert M. Gates, the American defense secretary, met Thursday with NATO defense ministers, he seemed to play down the significance of the strong language from Iran.

"My impression is that they make threats like this from time to time," Mr. Gates said. "We have no intention of attacking Iran."

He noted that, "obviously, when it comes to things like these tests, we watch them closely." But he concluded, "Other than that, I think, it's just another day in the Persian Gulf."

A special envoy for the ayatollah met in Moscow on Thursday with President Valdimir V. Putin and his national security adviser, Igor S. Ivanov. The envoy, Ali Akbar Velayati, a former foreign minister, was expected to deliver a formal response to a message from Mr. Putin that Mr. Ivanov brought to Tehran in January. The substance of the letters was not divulged.

Wide Response If U.S. Attacks, Iran Says (WT/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Iran's supreme leader said today that if the United States were to attack Iran, the country would respond by striking U.S. interests all over the world -- the latest sharp exchange in an escalating standoff between the two countries.

The comments by Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei came on the same day that another top official, Tehran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, warned in a column in the New York Times that efforts to isolate Iran would backfire on the United States, increasing sectarian tensions in the volatile Middle East, including Iraq.

The United States is reaping "the expected bitter fruits of its ill-conceived adventurism," he said.

"But rather than face these unpleasant facts, the United States administration is trying to sell an escalated version of the same failed policy. It does this by trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq," he said.

The United States and Iran have been in an increasingly tense standoff over Tehran's nuclear program. The tensions have worsened recently because of U.S. accusations of Iranian influence in Iraq.

The United States has denied it has any plans to strike Iran militarily but has sent an additional aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf in what U.S. officials call an effort to show strength in face of rising Iranian regional influence.

Speaking to a gathering of air force commanders, Ayatollah Khamenei said: "The enemy knows well that any invasion would be followed by a comprehensive reaction to the invaders and their interests all over the world."

In another sign of the tensions, Iran's intelligence minister also said the government had detected a network of U.S. and Israeli spies and had detained a second group of people who planned to go abroad for espionage training, state television reported. It gave few details.

The claim comes just a few days after an Iranian diplomat was detained in Baghdad in an incident that Iran blamed on U.S. forces. The Americans have denied involvement in the diplomat's detention.

Iranian leaders often speak of a crushing response to any U.S. attack. While the remarks are seen as an attempt to drum up national support, Iran's position on Iraq and its nuclear program has provoked harsher international and especially U.S. pressure in recent months.

President Bush has ordered American troops to act against Iranians suspected of being involved in the Iraqi insurgency in addition to deploying the second carrier. The U.N. Security Council has imposed sanctions because of Iran's refusal to cease uranium enrichment and is due to consider strengthening the sanctions later this month.

"Some people say that the U.S. president is not prone to calculating the consequences of his actions," Ayatollah Khamenei said in remarks broadcast on state television, "but it is possible to bring this kind of person to wisdom.

"U.S. policy-makers and analysts know that the Iranian nation would not let an invasion go without a response," he added.

Last week, a publication called Sobh-e Sadegh, the official publication of Iran's elite and hard-line Revolutionary Guards, also warned against American attacks, pointing out that because the United States has large numbers of troops in Iraq, Afghanistan, central Asia and Europe, it would be easy to kidnap Americans in retaliation.

Dems United On Iraq Bill, But Divided On Iran (HILL)

By David Mikhail

The Hill, February 9, 2007

As the House is set to proceed on a resolution addressing the war in Iraq, a potential divide is surfacing over Democratic bills regarding Iran.

Democrats may not stand united behind a series of bills that speak out against a military attack on Iran, concerned that such bills would make the party prone to attacks regarding foreign policy, according to a senior House staffer. In spite of the party's overwhelming unity behind similar resolutions regarding Iraq, it seems clear that the party's next challenge will be to craft a position on Iran that is distinct from the White House's and also insulates it from criticism of being weak in the global arena.

The potential divide also indicates that not all Democrats are convinced that the party has seized control of the national security issue, in spite of their electoral triumphs in November, which were largely due to the unpopularity of the Iraq war.

Within the first month of the new legislative session, Reps. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.), Walter Jones (R-N.C.), and Barbara Lee (D-Calif.) have introduced bills in the House condemning the prospect of a preemptive strike against Iran and calling for congressional authorization before military action can be taken. The measures also affirmatively reject the notion that the authorization to use force against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, would also authorize an attack on Iran.

The senior House staffer, who is involved in foreign policy matters, stated that Republicans may try to use any legislation by Democrats concerning the potential use of force against Iran to portray the party as weak on terrorism and foreign policy, and that this could have a profound effect on denying Democrats the White House in 2008. The source went on to say that Democrats still cannot afford to take steps that open the party to criticisms of being weak on these matters.

DeFazio contended that a future attack on Iran would only solidify political support for the Iranian government and intensify its desire for nuclear-weapons capability, stating, "If Republicans want to defend going into Iran … have at it." He added that the prospect of a military attack on Iran is also a fear for the military community, citing a recent presentation by a retired major general that was delivered during the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting last week. According to DeFazio, the former officer said that there is "a substantial fear within the military community that the Bush administration" was seriously considering an attack on Iran. DeFazio noted that many lawmakers signed on to his resolution after the presentation.

Another House source added that congressional backing for the use of force against Afghanistan after Sept. 11 resulted in an overly broad instrument that has since been used by the White House for a variety of actions, including the detention of suspects without any formal process and incidences of extraordinary rendition.

The DeFazio resolution states, "That Congress … strongly and unequivocally believes that seeking congressional authority prior to taking military action against Iran is not discretionary, but is a legal requirement." The Lee legislation, while intended to prohibit the use of funds for covert military action against Iran, offers a statement of policy that, "It is the policy of the United States not to enter into a preemptive war against Iran in the absence of an imminent threat, and then only in accordance with international law and constitutional and statutory requirements for congressional authorization."

The resolution offered by Jones states that the president shall consult and receive authorization from Congress in the absence of an attack or demonstrable imminent strike by Iran. Even though it's a Republican bill, the vast majority of cosponsors are Democrats, including DeFazio, Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio) and Rep. John Murtha (Pa.).

Stacey Bernard, a spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), said that his office has not addressed the Iran resolutions yet and has focused entirely on Iraq as the House is set to address a non-binding resolution next week.

The Washington Post reported earlier this week that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has told her Democratic colleagues that if it appears likely that Bush wants to take the country to war against Iran, the House would take up a bill to deny him the authority to do so.

In spite of the potential divide regarding the Iran bills, Democrats seemingly share common ground on their view of the administration and the call for diplomacy. Lynne Weil, spokeswoman for House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), noted that during two committee hearings held within the past week, including a budgetary hearing with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Democrats had repeatedly expressed criticism about the administration's policy toward Iran while emphasizing that every diplomatic option needed to be explored.

Democrats have diverged on Iran in the past, though to a lesser extent, when Congress was looking to pass sanctions legislation last session. Several Democrats voted against an earlier version of the Iran Freedom and Support Act, a bill that was introduced by now-ranking member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), though it had acquired a large amount of Democratic support, stating that the sanctions legislation would lead to an escalation with the country.

Recent events have served to increase the tension between the two nations. The International Atomic Energy Agency stated that Iran has set up two cascades, consisting of over 300 nuclear centrifuges, in order to enrich uranium for a program the Iranian government has consistently stated is for peaceful, civilian purposes, while the U.S. has contended that Iran intends on creating a nuclear-weapons program. Additionally, the White House recently authorized American troops to take all necessary steps, including fatal force, to stop Iranian agents aiding Shiite militants in Iraq.

Asked about why he introduced his Iran resolution, Jones said that the matter presented a constitutional issue: "I want the Congress to meet its responsibility," he said, adding that the neoconservatives who pushed for the Iraq war still wield influence. In discussing potential future criticism from his fellow GOP colleagues, Jones stated, "If they don't believe in the Constitution … then I feel sorry for them."

Dissent In Tehran Buoys West (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

Iran is likely to showcase the expansion of its main nuclear plant as another advance toward large-scale production of enriched uranium, just in time for Sunday's 28th anniversary of its Islamic Revolution. But don't expect the Bush administration or its European allies to get agitated about the news.

Officials in Washington, London and Paris say that for the first time in several years, Tehran is showing signs of both political and economic unease in the wake of international moves to sanction Iran's nuclear program. Added pressure, these officials say, could nudge opinion in Iran closer toward favoring a deal to suspend its uranium work.

No one is predicting victory anytime soon in the high-stakes feud with Iran over its alleged ambitions to develop nuclear weapons. Still, Western officials have been cheered by reports of rising political dissent in Tehran, as well as debate within government circles there over the wisdom of stirring more international opposition to the nuclear program.

Even Sunday's festivities, which are expected to focus on Iran's nuclear developments, are being seen in Washington as a sign of weakness. Iran has been scrambling for months to assemble thousands of centrifuges at its main nuclear facility in Natanz, so it can claim to have made a technological leap toward enriching large amounts of the uranium needed to fuel nuclear power plants -- or, in the eyes of the West, to produce nuclear weapons. U.S. and European officials say the Natanz work remains shoddy and is largely being done for domestic effect.

"There is a large element of theater in all this," said one senior Bush administration official. For now, "there is little reason to believe that Iran is actually leaping to a new technological level."

Iranian officials have denied they are pursuing nuclear weapons and argue they have the right to enrich uranium under international rules. Amid rising tensions with the U.S., Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said on state television yesterday that Iran would go after American "interests around the world" if attacked by the U.S.

After months of haggling, the United Nations Security Council agreed just before Christmas to impose limited economic restrictions on Iran. It gave the country until Feb. 21 to suspend its uranium-enrichment program or face another round of sanctions. The U.S. has used the resolution to push Europe -- Iran's largest trading partner by far -- to take independent actions, such as cutting off bank lending and curtailing hefty government-backed export guarantees to Iran.

Some European countries have been quietly warning their banks about the risk of doing business in Iran. Last week, France said it was imposing some limited restrictions on its export guarantees to Iran, with possibly more to come.

"For the first time, really, Iran is paying a price for its nuclear work, and also showing some strain," said one senior European diplomat. "And also for the first time, there is a sense of real unity among the key players who are working this issue."

U.S. and European officials say there is ample evidence the U.N. resolution and other moves have hit home in Iran.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has been Iran's loudest voice of defiance against the international community since his election 18 months ago, has become a target of criticism over his handling of domestic and foreign policy. Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani in the past two weeks has criticized Mr. Ahmadinejad's confrontational approach toward the West. More than half of the country's Parliament members slammed the president last month for his domestic stewardship.

And Jomhuri Islami, a conservative newspaper loyal to Mr. Khamenei, warned last month that Iran should stop provoking the U.S. and take the U.N. resolution seriously. Mr. Ahmadinejad just days before had dismissed the resolution as "a piece of torn paper."

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who previously denied the Holocaust took place and threatened to wipe Israel off the map, is also coming under increasing fire on the economic front. Inflation and unemployment are picking up, European officials said, while investment in Iran's critical oil and gas fields is plunging.

European and U.S. officials note Iran has begun to reach out to Saudi Arabia and other countries, in what they describe as a bid by Tehran to deflect mounting pressures on the country. Recent U.S. actions against Iranian officials in Iraq, including the arrest by U.S. forces of five suspected security officials there last month, has heightened friction between the U.S. and Iran.

Leading the recent talks with the country's neighbors has been Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, who Mr. Ahmadinejad sidelined in September at a critical moment in negotiations with Europe over avoiding U.N. sanctions. Mr. Larijani is now planning to meet with European officials on the periphery of a security conference in Germany this weekend, potentially the first such talks since the summer. European officials said that while they don't expect meetings with Mr. Larijani to amount to much, his overture is significant, as it may portend a softening in Iran's stance.

In the meantime, the Bush administration said it is prepared to push ahead on a second sanctions resolution against Iran within the U.N.

Accord Is Signed By Palestinians To Stop Feuding (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

MECCA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 8 — The main rival Palestinian factions agreed late Thursday to form a government of national unity aimed at ending a wave of violence between them and an international boycott.

The agreement, signed here in Islam's holiest city under Saudi auspices, appeared likely to end, at least for now, weeks of fighting that had ravaged the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Still, it seemed to stop short of meeting the demands of the international community for resuming relations and support for the Palestinian Authority.

The accord, signed by Khaled Meshal of Hamas and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and leader of Fatah, its main rival, is the first time that the two parties have agreed to share authority. It sets out principles for a coalition government, like the distribution of ministerial portfolios, but leaves many of the details for later.

Israel and international powers have said that they would lift their boycott of the Palestinian government imposed after the victory by the militant group Hamas a year ago only if it agreed to three conditions: recognize Israel, renounce violence against Israel and abide by previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Mecca accord addresses only the last of those and does so rather imprecisely, promising "respect" for previous agreements between the Palestinians and Israel.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman, Tom Casey, said, "The international community has made it clear that in order to be able to have a broader relationship with the Palestinian Authority government, that those principles are going to have to be met." He added that officials were still studying the accord.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet with Mr. Abbas and Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, on Feb. 19 in Jerusalem to work on a broader peace initiative.

In Mecca, Mr. Abbas read out a statement during the signing ceremony where he re-appointed Ismail Haniya as prime minister and called on the new government to abide by "international law" and agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization. This appeared aimed at appeasing concerns of the international community.

The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, called the agreement "interesting" but said it would require further study.

In the streets of Gaza, Palestinians broke out in celebration as the agreement was being announced, with members of Hamas and Fatah firing into the air.

Hamas officials in Mecca bristled at the insistence of accepting Israel, insisting that any concessions they offered would not be enough.

"I wonder why the issue of recognizing Israel is the key to everything?" Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas government, said earlier Thursday. "We are interested to end the siege but not at any cost."

He added: "We try to balance between our Palestinian national constraints and our opening up to the international community. Israel is not ready to deal with any Palestinian side unless the Palestinians deal with the Israeli conditions."

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, said, "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles," but she declined to say whether the new Palestinian government had met any or all of those benchmarks. Israeli officials say that would require further evaluation.

Mostly, the Mecca accord promises to end the fighting that has claimed the lives of more than 90 Palestinians, with each side pledging to ease the tensions and turn a new page in their history. The two sides have signed several truces, but each one has broken down.

"These dark days will be completely gone," Mr. Meshal announced in signing the agreement. "Our Arabic, Islamic unity has brought us together, shining again." He added that having signed the accord in the holy city lent it greater significance.

Under the terms of the deal Mr. Haniya, the current prime minister, will form a new government with Hamas controlling a majority of the seats while Fatah will control several and have a number of "independent" Palestinians sitting in the remainder. The new government is supposed to be formed within five weeks.

The exact breakdown was not immediately clear late Thursday night. The critical role of interior minister is expected to go to an independent official, a Hamas spokesman said, while Mr. Abbas will keep control of some security agencies, including the Presidential Guard.

That division of authority has been an important factor in the recent Palestinian infighting, which has often pitted Fatah security force members against Hamas security force members in gun battles on the streets of Gaza.

Hamas rejects Israel's very existence and calls for its destruction. Fatah, which began with that same philosophy in the late 1950s, favors a two-state solution with Israel returning to its borders from before the 1967 war and a Palestinian state built in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem.

But there has been talk by some Hamas officials of the possibility of agreeing to the two-state solution implicitly without specifically recognizing Israel. Whether that would end the international boycott is unclear.

Thursday's agreement concluded an emergency two-day summit meeting steeped in religious significance and invested with the prestige of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. The Palestinians sat in a room high above Mecca's Grand Mosque, while Saudi officials remained outside, providing assistance when requested. Many worshipers below were aware of the ongoing deliberations, and could look up and see the figures of the Palestinians moving around.

Perhaps the biggest winner from the deal is Saudi Arabia, which has sought to build on its earlier success in 1989, when, in a similar summit meeting in the mountain town of Taif, it brokered an end to the 15-year Lebanese civil war. In scenes broadcast on Saudi Television, King Abdullah sat flanked by Mr. Abbas and Mr. Meshal, each of whom signed the document, then read a brief speech.

"They have proved they are worthy of trust and have proven they can stop the fighting," the king said.

Saudi Arabia's effort to mediate between the Palestinian factions reflects a general agreement among leaders in the Arab world that the first step to stabilizing the burgeoning conflicts in the region and parrying the growing influence of Iran is resolving the Palestinian conflict.

The Saudis, who have traditionally preferred to work quietly behind the scenes, have grown increasingly alarmed at the chaos engulfing the region and have stepped forward to try to use their religious credibility, and vast oil wealth, to try to preserve the status quo and serve as a counterpoint to Iran.

The Saudis may hold a similar meeting for Lebanon's warring factions, Hezbollah and the so-called March 14 movement, which have come to blows in recent weeks.

For the Palestinian leaders, too, the talks offered an opportunity to improve a public image increasingly marred by contempt and criticism in the Arab world for allowing the bloodshed to reach such levels.

Many saw the meeting as a last chance to prevent an all-out civil war between the feuding Palestinian factions, which have broken numerous cease-fire agreements since clashes began last summer.

"Hamas and Fatah have not let their people down," Mr. Meshal declared. "To the heroes in Palestine, I say these are the leaders of the Palestinian people."

Hamas, Fatah Reach Tentative Accord (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

JERUSALEM -- The rival Palestinian groups Hamas and Fatah announced Thursday that they have agreed in principle to share power in hopes of easing months of deadly factional fighting and breaking a damaging international aid embargo.

The tentative accord was announced in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, where leaders of the two groups met for two days under the auspices of King Abdullah.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said he was hopeful the agreement would quell the factional clashes that have left scores of Palestinians dead in the Gaza Strip. Previous agreements between the two factions have collapsed.

"I hope that all the shameful acts that make us feel ashamed will stop, and that we move seriously toward liberating our country," Abbas said during a signing ceremony in a palace near the Kabaa, Islam's holiest site. He was joined by the exiled political leader of Hamas, Khaled Meshaal, as Saudi King Abdullah looked on from between the two men.

Celebratory gunfire erupted in the Gaza Strip as news of the agreement reached the impoverished coastal enclave.

But the pact was vague on several issues that could determine whether it can rein in Gaza's gunmen or lift the Western aid boycott, imposed after Hamas won parliamentary elections in January 2006.

Israel and much of the West considers the radical Islamist group a terrorist organization, and it refuses to recognize the state of Israel or honor past agreements between the Jewish state and Palestinians.

Israel offered a terse immediate response. "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles: recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former treaties and renunciation of terror," said Miri Eisin, an Israeli government spokeswoman.

Officials from the two Palestinian factions said they have worked out a formula for distributing Cabinet positions, including leaving Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas as prime minister, but they did not name an interior minister, a crucial post with formal authority over security forces. The minister would be nominated by Hamas, but approved by Abbas, of Fatah.

The parties also have not worked out who will control the various agencies of the security services, a potentially explosive issue. The two factions planned further talks on those details and several other unresolved matters.

The agreement also does not include language that explicitly recognizes Israel, nor does it include a renunciation of violence, two of the three conditions set by the West for resuming direct aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Instead, the language was more oblique: the new government would "respect" international resolutions and past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. That wording can be interpreted as providing tacit recognition of Israel, but falls well short of international demands.

The Middle East mediators known as the Quartet -- the United States, European Union, Russia and United Nations -- had demanded as their third condition that the new government abide by past Palestinian-Israeli agreements.

It remains unclear whether the language agreed upon by Fatah and Hamas will satisfy the Quartet's conditions enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars annually in foreign aid.

If the accord quiets the internal strife, Abbas could have freer rein to pursue a peace agreement with Israel at a time when the Bush administration is pushing new talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to join Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Feb. 19 for a three-way meeting in Jerusalem aimed at exploring the possible outlines of a final peace agreement.

In September, the two groups announced a similar agreement on a unity government but the deal fizzled almost as soon as it was declared. Subsequent talks went nowhere.

"For those who are afraid that this agreement will be similar to the previous one, I say, 'No,' " Meshaal said. "We swear to God in this blessed place that this agreement has our complete commitment."

Tit-for-tat clashes had worsened in recent months, claiming more than 90 lives since mid-December. The talks in Mecca were seen as perhaps the last chance to reach a power-sharing deal in order to stave off wider civil strife.

Palestinians Reach Deal On A Government (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 8 -- Rival Palestinian factions Fatah and Hamas agreed Thursday to form a power-sharing government and end the armed feuding that has killed scores of Palestinians over the past year.

It remained unclear whether the new government will meet conditions laid down by Israel and international donors to fully restore funding to the Palestinian Authority that they cut off after Hamas's victory in January 2006 parliamentary elections.

The agreement does not explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist, a key international demand. Hamas officials said their movement would not do so.

The new cabinet will set aside seats for Fatah -- it currently has none -- and some smaller parties, but it will continue to be led by Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

In assigning Haniyeh the task of forming a new government, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, stated that its platform must conform with "international resolutions" and "respect" previous agreements signed with Israel.

The wording amounted to a compromise acceptable to Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, which refuses to openly endorse the 1993 Oslo accords and other agreements that the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization negotiated with the Jewish state.

The deal "brings us to the shores of peace," Abbas said in the holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, where the factions have been meeting. "This initiative has been crowned with success."

Dubbed the Mecca Accord, the agreement emerged after two days of negotiations under the auspices of King Abdullah, a Sunni Muslim who is concerned by Shiite-dominated Iran's growing influence within the Palestinian territories through the money it has provided Hamas during the aid embargo. Leaders of the Saudi royal family lined the ornate palace meeting room with a view of the Grand Mosque for the announcement.

Palestinian officials used the deal to appeal for an end to the partisan violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip that has killed about 70 Palestinians since December, when Abbas threatened to call early general elections unless Hamas agreed to share power.

The disunity has undermined the Palestinian national movement as Abbas is preparing to meet Feb. 19 with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to discuss ways of reviving the Palestinian-Israeli peace process. Palestinian leaders said the agreement, which gives Haniyeh five weeks to form a government, would begin closing those rifts.

"We will rebuild our Palestinian house on strong foundations," said Khaled Meshal, exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, who took part in the talks. "This agreement will be fully committed to before God."

After Hamas ended Fatah's long monopoly on political power last year, it invited Fatah to join its cabinet, but the secular nationalist party declined. Since then, party leaders have twice announced the formation of a national unity government, only to see the agreements collapse soon after.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- the group of Middle East peace mediators known as the Quartet -- have demanded that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements in return for resumption of aid that accounts for nearly half the Palestinian Authority's operating budget.

Miri Eisin, an Israeli government spokeswoman, said after the agreement was announced that "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles." She declined to say whether Israeli officials view the agreement as meeting those conditions.

After the deal was announced, celebratory gunfire erupted in the Gaza Strip, the scene of much of the factional violence.

The agreement calls for Hamas to control nine government ministries, the most of any party, followed by Fatah with six.

Hamas agreed to cede control of such important portfolios as the foreign affairs and interior ministries. The latter controls some of the security services involved in the recent fighting. Hamas is to name an independent politician to be interior minister, and Fatah will choose an independent as foreign minister.

Palestinians To Form Unity Government (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Fatah and Hamas leaders meeting in Mecca signed a pact last night to form a power-sharing government, bowing to pressure from the Arab world to bury their differences for the sake of Palestinian unity and head off a looming civil war.

It was uncertain, however, whether Hamas had moved far enough towards meeting international demands that it recognise Israel to lift a boycott of the Palestinian Authority in force since the Islamists came to power in an election one year ago.

A statement read out in the Saudi holy city at the end of two days of talks between the rival factions said a new national unity government would respect past agreements made by the Palestinians.

Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president, was earlier reported to have sought a stronger statement of Hamas's "commitment" to such agreements, signed when Fatah was in power and which recognise Israel.

Members of the international Middle East Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – had hoped for a more unequivocal indication that Hamas was abandoning its refusal to recognise Israel's right to exist.

Mr Abbas said the new government should "respect the resolutions of international law and the agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organisation" that he heads.

The PLO, dominated by Fatah but to which Hamas does not belong, recognised Israel as part of the Oslo peace accords that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority in 1994.

Miri Eisen, Israeli government spokeswoman, said shortly after the factions signed their accord in the presence of Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah: "Israel expects a new Palestinian government to respect and accept all three of the international community principles: recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former agreements and renunciation of all terror and violence."

In a statement to Associated Press, she did not say whether Israel believed the guidelines of the new government issued in Mecca fulfilled those demands.

Quartet reaction to the Mecca accord will set the tone for trilateral talks in Jerusalem next week at which Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, hopes to coax Mr Abbas and Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, towards a revival of the defunct peace process.

Ismail Haniyeh, the PA's Gaza-based Hamas prime minister, predicted the international boycott would end. "This is the first step on the way to breaking the embargo on the Palestinian people under occupation," he said in Mecca.

Even if last night's deal did not lead to an early lifting of the boycott, there were hopes in Gaza and the West Bank that it would at least defuse a factional conflict that has claimed dozens of lives in recent weeks.

Mr Abbas, who headed Fatah's delegation to the Mecca talks, threatened in December to decree fresh elections if no agreement on a national unity agreement were forthcoming. His ultimatum to Hamas sparked an increasingly violent series of confrontations between the two factions that raised fears of an all-out civil war.

The two delegations – Hamas was represented by Mr Haniyeh and Khaled Mashaal, its exiled leader – agreed to a distribution of cabinet posts. Salam Fayad, an independent former finance minister, is expected to return to a post in which he gained widespread respect among international aid donors.

Mr Haniyeh will remain as prime minister under the terms of the agreement. Hamas will receive nine portfolios and Fatah six. Mr Haniyeh will propose an independent as interior minister to replace the Hamas incumbent who has been in charge of a 5,000-strong militia involved in recent clashes with Fatah.

Ziad Abu Amr, an independent elected with Hamas support but subsequently estranged from the Islamists, was expected to serve as foreign minister.

Palestinian Factions Reach Deal (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

MECCA, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Rival Palestinian factions signed a power-sharing accord aimed at ending months of bloodshed Thursday, agreeing that the Islamic militant group Hamas would head a new coalition government that would "respect" past peace agreements with Israel.

However, the United States and Israel have demanded the new government explicitly renounce violence, recognize Israel and agree to uphold past peace accords. The vague promise to respect past deals — a compromise reached after Hamas rejected pressure for more binding language — was not seen as going far enough.

U.S. and Israeli acceptance is crucial to the deal's success. Unless they are convinced Hamas has sufficiently moderated, the West is unlikely to lift a crippling financial blockade of the Palestinian government, and it will be difficult to advance the peace process.

"Israel expects a new Palestinian government to respect and accept all three of the international community principles — recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former agreements and renunciation of all terror and violence," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin told the Associated Press after the accord was announced.

She would not say whether Israel believes the guidelines of the new government fulfill those demands.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said "we'll see what any final agreement actually looks like and we'll have to make an evaluation from there" whether it meets international demands.

Also riding on the agreement's success are Palestinian hopes to avert an outright civil war. Hamas and Fatah gunmen have clashed repeatedly in recent months, killing dozens — including 30 who died in four days of fighting that ended with a fragile truce Sunday. The deal could also fall apart as the two sides work out who will fill sensitive posts in the new government — particularly the interior ministry, which controls security forces.

Saudi Arabia — which put its credibility on the line by hosting the high-profile summit in the holy city of Mecca — will likely now face the task of selling the agreement to its ally, the United States.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal headed two days of intense negotiations in a Mecca palace overlooking the Kaaba, Islam's holiest shrine — a venue Saudi Arabia chose to step up the pressure on the two sides to compromise.

Much of the negotiations centered on a single word. Abbas pressed Hamas to accept the stronger stance of "committing to" past peace accords. But in the end, he was forced to settle with the promise to "respect" them.

The final agreement was announced at a ceremony aired live on Arab television Thursday night, in which Saudi King Abdullah sat with Abbas on his right and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal on his left.

Abbas aide Nabil Amr read a letter from Abbas proclaiming the accord and asking Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to form the new coalition government within five weeks, divvying up Cabinet posts between the factions according to a formula agreed on in the Mecca talks.

The letter said the new government would "respect" past peace deals signed with Israel by the Palestine Liberation Organization, dominated by Fatah.

Still, Abbas and Mashaal insisted the agreement would bring peace between their factions and lavished praised on the Saudi monarch for his help — even comparing him to the Prophet Muhammad in his ability to bring reconciliation.

Abbas said the deal would "satisfy our people ... and bring us to the shores of peace ... This initiative has been crowned with success."

Mashaal vowed the accord would put an end to violence after a series of truces between Fatah and Hamas gunmen that collapsed. "I tell those who fear that the fate of this agreement will be the same fate of the old ones, ...we have pledged our allegiance to God from this sacred place .. and we will go back to our country fully committed to it."

"I say to our young people that this is an agreement of the leadership of the biggest groups and none of you should accept any order from others to fire," he said.

In Gaza City, celebratory gunfire was heard for more than an hour after the accord was announced. Residents expressed hope it would mean an end to the violence and the financial boycott, imposed by the West after Hamas came to power following January 2006 elections.

"We've been holding our breath. God willing, this is a permanent agreement, not a temporary truce. We hope this will lead to lifting the siege," said Mahmoud Qassam, a fish seller watching the ceremony at his home in Gaza City's Shaati refugee camp, meters (yards) from Haniyeh's home.

A first test of international acceptance of the deal could come on Feb. 19, when Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are due to meet in Jerusalem for talks intended to revive peace negotiations.

If the West does not back the new government and refuses to lift the boycott, it could put a strain on the fragile peace between Hamas and Fatah.

The deal could also fall apart over the formation of the government — particularly over the issue of who will fill the vital post of interior minister, which would control the security forces. Under the agreement, the post will go to an independent, since Hamas and Fatah were each reluctant to see the other faction hold the ministry.

Hamas must propose the candidate for approval by Abbas, and it did not appear that the two sides have settled on a name.

Under the agreement, Hamas will get nine Cabinet posts, including the prime minister position. Fatah gets six, and other factions get four. Besides the interior ministry, independents will get the foreign ministry and planning ministry.

"There are many details that still need to be worked out after this agreement, including the interior minister and marketing the agreement to the international community," said Abdel-Rahman Zaydan, a member of the Hamas delegation. "The Saudis will be part of this effort."

Abbas had asked Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal to sound out the Americans on whether "respect the accords" is acceptable, a Fatah delegate said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomacy.

To boost the new government, the kingdom promised $1 billion in aid to the Palestinians, Ahmed Youssef, a political adviser to Hanyieh, said in Gaza.

Hamas, Fatah Make Peace (WT/AP)

Saudi Arabia -- which put its credibility on the line by hosting the high-profile summit in the holy city of Mecca -- will likely now face the task of selling the agreement to its ally, the United States.

To boost the new government, the kingdom promised $1 billion in aid to the Palestinians, Ahmed Youssef, a political adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, said in Gaza.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal headed two days of intense negotiations in a Mecca palace overlooking the Kaaba, Islam's holiest shrine.

Much of the negotiations centered on a single word. Mr. Abbas pressed Hamas to accept the stronger stance of "committing to" past peace accords with Israel signed by the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization. But in the end, he was forced to settle for the promise to "respect" them.

A Hamas official appeared to suggest the movement was betting on a U.S. rejection but European and Arab support.

"I believe this agreement could be accepted by the European Union. We have had talks with European parties who say such an agreement could be accepted," Nasser Shaer, deputy prime minister in the outgoing government, said in Ramallah.

Asked if the deal met U.S. and Israeli demands, Mr. Shaer said: "With Israel? No. America has its own scenario ... we are betting on assistance from Arab countries. Saudi Arabia as well as other Arab states could help sell this agreement."

The final agreement was announced at a ceremony aired live on Arab television last night, in which Saudi King Abdullah sat with Mr. Abbas on his right and Mr. Mashaal on his left.

Israeli Hospital Treats Palestinian Fighters (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

ASHKELON, Israel -- The wounded in the bitter Palestinian struggle between Hamas and Fatah fall in the dusty streets of Gaza, but it is to an Israeli hospital in this nearby coastal city that many are brought for treatment.

Officials at Ashkelon's Barzilai Medical Center say there is no political calculation behind the decision to take in the Palestinian wounded, who were arriving at a rate of several a day before the factions struck a deal in Saudi Arabia yesterday.

But when the father of a wounded security officer from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction tells a reporter that he wants "to say thank you to all of the people of Israel," it seems that the center's work is changing at least some hearts and minds.

The expression of warmth toward Israel came from Abdel Hamin Odeh, father of Adel Odeh, a Fatah fighter who was brought to Barzilai suffering a critical leg wound. By this week, he was shuffling gingerly though the halls with the help of a walker.

Mr. Odeh had first been taken to the Palestinian Al Quds Hospital in Gaza City, said the gunman's father, Abdel Hamin Odeh. "They took care of him, but not very well."

Barzilai's chief medical director, Ron Lobel, says the Israeli hospital has treated 124 patients from the Gaza Strip in the past year.

"We don't know if it's Hamas or Fatah, we don't know if they are civilian or armed forces, we just know they are injured," said Dr. Lobel. "It's something normal, between hospitals."

DOJ_NMG_0129913

Sitting alongside the neighboring bed, Rafat Shelieh gestured toward his younger brother, Abdallah, who was waiting to schedule his third operation since arriving at Barzilai on Feb. 1.

"He would have lost a leg," Rafat Shelieh said. "The treatment is a thousand times better here than in Gaza."

Abdallah Shelieh, a 25-year-old policeman from a Fatah family, lifted his hospital gown and pointed to the bullet wounds caused by Hamas gunmen who assaulted his home in the Jabaliya refugee camp two weeks ago.

There was one wound on the right side of his rib cage, another in the right shoulder, and two in the right leg, one high and one low.

"I was defending my house," said Abdallah Shelieh, describing a daylong battle that left him wounded and bleeding inside the house for nearly seven hours. "I fired on them for about 15 minutes."

Although the hospital insists it does not discriminate between factions, most of the wounded Palestinians it receives have come from Fatah, in part because border background checks by the Israeli secret service seem to have shut out Hamas members.

Fatah officers such as Abdallah Shelieh, meanwhile, have been avoiding Gaza City's main facility, Shifah Hospital, for fear of Hamas security forces who have set up military positions on the roof and in their own wing of the hospital.

Medical services in Gaza are further hobbled by a lack of supplies -- including blood -- and surgical knowledge to handle the wounded, said a Shifah hospital official.

Despite hopes that yesterday's agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, will put an end to the flow of wounded Palestinians, Adel Odeh held out little hope that the deal would last.

"There won't be peace between Hamas and Fatah," he said. "I know both of them, and neither of them likes the other."

The recent bloodshed will only intensify those grudges, said Rafat Shelieh, who denigrated Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal and disparaged the Islamic militants as not sophisticated enough to run the government.

With his home destroyed and a brother laid up in the hospital, he said he also was not optimistic about the chances for reconciliation.

"My heart is gone. They should be afraid of me. Not the other way around," he said. "Everything in the house is gone. I only have the jacket and clothes on my back. Will I forget that?"

Will Palestinians Take The Second Step? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

THE AGREEMENT between Palestinian factions reached in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Thursday is welcome even if it accomplishes nothing more than an end, for now, to fratricidal violence in the Gaza Strip. It remains to be seen whether the agreement between Fatah and Hamas will bring something more — an improvement in their material condition.

That additional blessing depends on whether Hamas is willing to join Fatah and its leader, President Mahmoud Abbas, in recognizing the state of Israel. While the rivalry between Hamas and Fatah manifests itself in multiple ways, the difference between the two movements that matters to the outside world — including European and American donors — involves the Jewish state.

Simply put, Abbas is willing to accept the reality of Israel even as he complains about the hardships Israelis have visited on his people. Hamas, the terrorist group/political party of Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, so far has been willing only to dangle the possibility of a hudna, or 10-year truce. That's not good enough.

When the United States suspended aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas prevailed in parliamentary elections, Washington conditioned a resumption of aid on three commitments: accept Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and agree to abide by past agreements with Tel Aviv.

Thursday's agreement, brokered by a newly assertive Saudi Arabia, does direct the Hamas-led government to "respect international resolutions and the agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization" — with Israel, that is. That's a good sign. But before Europe and the U.S. provide further assistance, the government must acknowledge Israel's right to exist.

That right is enshrined in U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, passed after the 1967 Arab-Israeli war and repeatedly reaffirmed, calling for a "just and lasting peace in which every state in the area can live in security." Palestinians and other Arabs like to cite other language in 242 calling for the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict," but the two concepts — Israeli withdrawal and Israeli security — are intertwined.

After years of equivocation, the late Yasser Arafat finally acknowledged that reality, setting in motion a process that produced the Palestinian Authority and the endorsement by the U.S., Russia, the U.N. and the European Union of a "two-state solution" in which Israel and a Palestinian state would exist side by side. Abbas recognizes Israel's right to exist (and with more credibility than Arafat enjoyed), but Hamas has held out.

That must change. It isn't enough for Hamas to "respect" past agreements or to hint that it now embraces a document drawn up by Palestinian prisoners last summer that seemed to endorse a two-state solution. A Palestinian "unity" government that can't unite on this question will remain suspect in the eyes of some of the countries that can most help the Palestinian people.

Israeli Official Faults Egypt Over Arms Flow Into Gaza (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

A senior Israeli official yesterday accused Egypt of failing to halt arms smuggling into Gaza, thus bolstering the militant group Hamas at the expense of the Palestinian leadership supported by the United States.

The comments, by Israeli Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, reflect the increasing frustration of Israeli officials that Hamas has been able to increase its grip on the Gaza Strip since Israel withdrew its troops in 2005. Egypt at the time agreed to monitor the six-mile border between Gaza and the Sinai Peninsula, but hundreds of rockets have fallen on Israeli population centers from Gaza.

"There is no doubt that Egypt is not doing enough," Dichter told a group of reporters, asserting that "tens of tons" of explosives are being smuggled. "I am sure that if Egypt decides to block this flow of smuggling, they can do it, 100 percent."

Some Israeli officials said they suspect that Egypt is playing a double game -- officially supporting Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in his struggle with Hamas while hedging its bets because Hamas is an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamic group with growing political strength in Egypt.

Egypt has publicly supported U.S. efforts to strengthen the security forces loyal to Abbas. It has also discreetly shipped arms to Abbas's forces.

Dichter, noting that he does not believe the Egyptian government itself is engaging in smuggling, declined to speculate on the reasons why Egypt has not halted the flow of arms into Gaza. "It is very easy to be done. It is a matter of determination," he said. "There is no doubt it strengthens the terrorist organization."

Dichter said that he had raised the problem in talks with Bush administration officials this week.

Egyptian Ambassador Nabil Fahmy rejected Dichter's comments as inaccurate and untrue. He said most of the weapons that enter Gaza are either smuggled through Israel's black market or over the sea along Gaza's coast.

"They should control their own market, frankly," Fahmy said. He added that when Israel occupied the Gaza Strip, "they were not able to prevent smuggling 100 percent."

Fahmy said that Egyptian forces in the Sinai are limited in size under the Camp David accords, though the level was increased to 750 troops in an agreement with Israel after the Gaza withdrawal. The problem has been exacerbated, he said, by a lack of policing on the Gaza side of the border. "There is a good-faith effort to try to control the smuggling," Fahmy said.

Bush To Meet With Former Lebanese President Gemayel (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

US President George W. Bush is to meet with former Lebanese president Amin Gemayel and affirm US support for a "sovereign and democratic" Lebanon as the country is locked in political crisis, the White House said.

"We'll be demonstrating US commitment to a sovereign and democratic Lebanon, and express sympathy, again, on behalf of the president and the American people, for the assassination of Mr. Gemayel's son, Pierre Gemayel," said Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow.

Pierre Gemayel, the industry minister in Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's pro-Western government, was killed on November 21 in Beirut by unknown assailants.

His father, who served as president of Lebanon from 1982 to 1988, after the assassination of his newly elected brother Bashir, views neighboring Syria as the prime suspect in his son's death.

Bush has voiced unwavering support for Siniora's beleaguered government, which since mid-November has faced stiff opposition led by the radical Islamic militia Hezbollah.

The US president accuses Syria and Iran, branded foes by his administration, of backing Hezbollah in an attempt to topple the elected government.

Bush's meeting with Gemayel comes two days after the Lebanese government and the United Nations signed an agreement to set up an international court to try the suspected killers of another Lebanese leader, former premier Rafiq Hariri.

The creation of the tribunal requires approval by Lebanon's divided parliament, amid a political crisis teetering toward what many see as civil war.

Lebanese PM Protests Over Israeli 'incursion' (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister, on Thursday protested that Israel had violated his country's sovereignty in an incident that led to the first cross-border exchange of fire since last year's war.

The Israeli military said it returned fire after the Lebanese army fired warning shots towards an Israeli army bulldozer searching for explosive devices on the border. There were no casualties in the brief exchange.

Israel acknowledged that its bulldozer had crossed the border fence but insisted it was operating inside Israeli territory. The search had been mounted after four devices were discovered this week. The Israeli military said it believed they were planted by Hizbollah, the Lebanese Islamist movement that fought a month-long war with Israel last summer. Hizbollah says the explosives were placed there before last year's war and are not new.

The exchange of fire was the most serious incident since then and the first involving the Lebanese army since it took over Hizbollah positions in the wake of Israel's withdrawal.

Mr Siniora, whose pro-western government is being challenged by Hizbollah, ordered the army to continue confronting Israeli incursions into Lebanese territory, according to a statement by the country's news agency. The Lebanese army's apparent willingness to challenge Israel may boost its credibility domestically, one pro-government MP said.

A 12,000-strong force of the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (Unifil) is based in southern Lebanon alongside some 15,000 Lebanese soldiers as part of last year's ceasefire.

Despite the large neutral presence on the Lebanese side of the border, Israel is concerned at any indication that Hizbollah may be trying to re-establish itself militarily in the south.

Amir Peretz, the Israeli defence minister, said after a meeting with his security chiefs that Israel did not seek an escalation along the border with Lebanon but its forces would return fire when fired on.

"Unifil forces and the Lebanese army are fulfilling their roles, and we intend to continue to operate within the political and regulatory framework established in recent months," Mr Peretz said. He added, however: "There is no intention of returning to the policy of looking the other way on Lebanon."

The Israeli daily Yedioth Ahronoth said Unifil handed the Israeli army parts of explosive charges found near the border so that experts could determine whether they were placed at the time of the war or more recently.

¦ The Lebanese army on Thursday night seized a major arms shipment for Hizbollah in a truck near Beirut, writes Ferry Biedermann in Beirut. Hizbollah in a statement acknowledged that the weapons and munitions were meant for its fighters in the south of Lebanon and demanded the return of the intercepted shipment.

According to the army, the weapons included Grad rockets of the type that Hizbollah fired at Israel during the war last summer.

Hizbollah said that the truck was on its way from Lebanon's eastern Bekaa Valley, which borders Syria, and that it was seized by Lebanese customs officials. But Defence Minister Elias Murr said on Lebanon's LBC television station that the shipment originated from within Lebanon.

Israel and the US have accused Syria repeatedly of being a conduit for rearming Hizbollah, in breach of UN Security Council resolution 1701 that ended last summer's war.

Lebanese Premier Pins Stability On Secure Border, Regional Talks (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The day after a military skirmish between Lebanese and Israeli troops, embattled Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora vowed in an interview to buttress defense of his nation's 49-mile border with Israel as part of a broader initiative to restore stability to Lebanon.

Mr. Siniora said Beirut welcomes recent efforts by Saudi Arabia and Iran to facilitate a regional dialogue toward resolving Lebanon's political crisis, which pits his government against the Shiite Muslim militia and political party Hezbollah. The Lebanese leader also said a consensus must be built in the Middle East to press ahead with an international tribunal to identify and try the assassins of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed by a bomb in downtown Beirut nearly two years ago.

"What we are after...is to know" who committed the crime "to prevent attacks in the future," Mr. Siniora said in his office, which Hezbollah supporters have placed under a virtual siege for nearly three months. "We are very much committed to protecting the democracy and the liberties and freedom of the Lebanese."

Mr. Siniora spoke less than a day after Lebanese soldiers exchanged fire with Israeli troops stationed across from the Lebanese town of Maroun el-Rass. In the interview, the prime minister accused the Israeli military of violating Lebanon's border by dispatching a bulldozer on an explosives-clearing mission across the United Nations-designated "blue line" that divides the countries. The Lebanese Army fired at the bulldozer after it ignored warnings to pull back, Mr. Siniora said. He said the Israelis should have worked through the U.N. peacekeeping force that has been granted an expanded mandate to police the border since a cease-fire ended last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"We gave clear instructions to the army to stop [the Israelis] passing the blue line," Mr. Siniora said, adding, "It's a matter of principal" that Israel defer to the U.N.

The Israeli Defense Forces denied yesterday that its troops crossed the blue line. The IDF said it engaged in a justified operation to clear mines laid by Hezbollah on Israel's side of the line. The IDF also said it had asked the U.N. to alert the Lebanese military that the operation posed no threat to its troops. "The IDF will continue to act whenever necessary in order to protect the full sovereignty of the State of Israel while strengthening its security arrangements in the north," it said in a statement.

Officials from the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon have said in recent months that Israel regularly violates terms of the summer cease-fire by flying jets and drones in Lebanese airspace. Liam McDowell, a Unifil spokesman, told the Associated Press yesterday that his organization is investigating whether Israeli troops had crossed the blue line.

The incident came as Mr. Siniora's government seeks an agreement with Hezbollah and its political allies. Hezbollah pulled its ministers from Mr. Siniora's government in November to protest what it claims was his effort to push on with establishing an international court to try the Hariri case without Hezbollah's consent. Since then, Hezbollah has threatened to topple the government.

The crisis has sparked sectarian tensions, including riots last month that pitted Hezbollah's Shiite supporters against Mr. Siniora's largely Sunni Muslim base. Many in Lebanon fear the situation could spark a return to civil war.

Mr. Siniora's government is supported by the U.S., France and Saudi Arabia, while Hezbollah gets arms and funding from Iran and Syria. In recent weeks, Saudi Arabia and Iran have engaged in a regional dialogue to try to broker a political settlement in Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories, an effort Mr. Siniora said could help stabilize the region.

Saudi Arabia's national-security adviser, Prince Bandar, traveled to Tehran to meet with Iranian officials last month. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah is hosting leaders of Hamas and Fatah -- the Palestinian parties wrestling for control -- in the holy city of Mecca this week to try to forge a settlement.

"There are real contacts being made," Mr. Siniora said. Still, he said he doesn't see Lebanon's political standoff being resolved until there is an agreement on the Hariri court. Hezbollah and its allies say they support the government's efforts to capture and prosecute the killers. They also say they object to some of the legal statutes created by the U.N. and Beirut to govern the court.

This week, the U.N. Security Council formally endorsed language governing the establishment of the tribunal and is waiting for Beirut to do the same. Mr. Siniora said the failure of Hezbollah and its allies to provide clear recommendations for changing the language has made his government lack the confidence "that they really want it."

N. Korea Talks Resume With 'Fresh' Hope (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Feb. 8 -- Six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program resumed Thursday, buoyed by signs that North Korea is ready to return to serious negotiations.

The Chinese chief negotiator and host, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, suggested there were hopes of breaking a long stalemate that has led to questions about the future of the talks, which have been grinding away, off and on, since August 2003. At a formal opening session, he qualified the new round as a "fresh start" made possible by agreements reached last month in separate discussions in Berlin between U.S. and North Korean diplomats.

"These results provide a more solid basis for this session," Wu said.

The last round of the Chinese-sponsored talks broke up in failure Dec. 22 after North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, refused to engage in formal discussions about his country's nuclear weapons. He said nothing could be done on the nuclear front until resolution of a U.S.-North Korean financial dispute centering on a Macau bank accused of laundering illicit money from North Korea.

U.S. and North Korean banking officials have held two sessions of separate negotiations on the banking standoff. Although there has been no announcement indicating that the issue has been resolved, North Korean leaders apparently have decided that the exchanges show enough promise that they can resume discussing the nuclear problem.

The chief U.S. delegate, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, said Thursday evening that the North Korean attitude appeared different from the balk in December. During Thursday's talks, Hill said, Kim displayed a willingness to negotiate that augured well for chances of making progress at least on some preliminary steps.

Kim said on his arrival that he came prepared to discuss the first steps in what the Bush administration hopes will be a gradual but irreversible program to eliminate North Korea's nuclear weapons and dismantle the facilities that produce fuel for the bombs. But he also made clear that agreement remains a distant goal.

In remarks to reporters, Kim said his willingness to negotiate depends on what the United States is willing to concede in return. Without citing specifics, he said the Bush administration must abandon its "hostile policy" and embrace "peaceful coexistence." The United States knows North Korea's requirements for reaching a first-step agreement, he added.

According to two U.S. nuclear experts who spoke with Kim last week in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital, the requirements include supplies of heavy fuel oil, resolution of the banking dispute, help in building civilian nuclear reactors and normalization of relations with the United States. In exchange, the experts said they were told, North Korea would be ready to freeze its Yongbyon reactor and allow the return of international nuclear inspectors to some North Korean facilities.

In an agreement in principle reached in September 2005, North Korea pledged to dismantle its entire nuclear program in return for economic aid and normalization of relations with the United States. That accord was hailed as a major step forward. The negotiations have stalled since then, however, on what steps should be carried out, and in what sequence, to put that pledge into practice.

In a measure of the difficulty, when the talks began more than three years ago they were designed to prevent North Korea from developing nuclear weapons, and that was the context in which the September 2005 accord was reached. Since North Korea set off a nuclear test explosion last October and declared itself a nuclear power, the emphasis has shifted to persuading the Pyongyang government to get rid of nuclear weapons it says it already has and to stop producing material to make more.

U.S. officials have said their intelligence indicates that North Korea has accumulated enough plutonium to fuel as many as 10 nuclear weapons and that its main facility, at Yongbyon, is producing more. In addition, U.S. officials have said North Korea has a separate uranium enrichment program to produce more weapons material, which Pyongyang denies.

In addition to North Korea, China and the United States, the talks involve South Korea, Russia and Japan.

N. Korea Talks Resume On Positive Note (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, February 9, 2007

South Korea's nuclear envoy said Friday that a Chinese draft agreement — with North Korea accepting in principle the initial steps for its disarmament — offered a good start for discussion. But the main U.S. envoy said there was still much work to do.

Envoys from six nations are trying to agree on steps to implement a September 2005 deal in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The 2005 deal — the only one to emerge since negotiations began in 2003 — was a broad statement of principles that did not outline any concrete steps for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program.

"It's good as a basis for negotiations, but I don't want to predict whether there will be smooth negotiations," South Korea's Chun Yung-woo told reporters Friday ahead of the second day of talks in Beijing. He declined to give any details of what the draft contained.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill gave no details on the draft, but said Friday he was anxious for progress in the slow-moving negotiations.

"We haven't discussed it yet but that is what we will be doing first thing this morning ... In these processes you often start discussing things and you move to the written form and that is always a challenge," he told reporters.

The Chinese presented the draft after the first day of meetings Thursday, during which the North agreed in principle to take initial steps toward its eventual nuclear disarmament.

A South Korean official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing diplomacy, said China circulated a draft proposal. The official gave no details, but other delegates said earlier that the agreement would outline initial steps for implementing the 2005 accord.

Such an agreement would set the stage for the first tangible steps in more than three years of negotiations.

In his comments Thursday, Hill said that the new proposal would be "a set of actions that would have to be taken in a finite amount of time." He declined to give specifics, but said moves would occur in a matter of weeks.

"The delegations are coalescing around some of the themes that we believe should be the basis for a first step in implementing" the 2005 agreement, he added.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington she was "cautiously optimistic" that the implementation of the agreement could begin.

At the last round of talks in December, in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 underground nuclear test, the communist nation refused even to talk about its nuclear programs. Instead, Pyongyang demanded the U.S. lift financial restrictions targeting alleged North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

Since then, the U.S. and North Korean nuclear envoys held an unusual one-on-one meeting in Germany last month where differences between the sides were apparently discussed, although no details of any concessions have been made public. Pyongyang and Washington held separate talks in Beijing late January on the financial issue, although it has yet to be resolved.

Unlike in the December talks, negotiators Thursday "were able to make progress in discussing denuclearization," Hill said.

The North's chief negotiator had said before the talks began that his country was "prepared to discuss first-stage measures" toward nuclear disarmament.

"We are going to make a judgment based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence," Kim Kye Gwan said on arriving in Beijing for the meeting at a Chinese state guesthouse.

American experts who visited Kim in Pyongyang last week said North Korea would propose a freeze of its main nuclear reactor and a resumption of international inspections in exchange for energy aid and a normalization of relations with Washington.

The North, which suffers from chronic power shortages, is also seeking electricity supply or an annual import of at least half a million tons of heavy fuel oil — the amount it had been promised under a Clinton-era denuclearization deal with the U.S.

North Korea and the U.S. agreed in 1994 for Pyongyang to freeze its plutonium-based nuclear reactor in exchange for energy aid. The North promised to eventually dismantle the facility following construction there of two light-water nuclear reactors for electricity — a type more difficult to divert for weapons use.

However, that deal fell apart in late 2002 after Washington accused North Korea of a secret uranium enrichment program. The North expelled international inspectors and restarted its reactor, and is believed to have amassed enough radioactive material for at least a half-dozen bombs.

The six-nation talks — involving China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas — began in August 2003, but the North has twice boycotted them for more than a year. The latest was over a U.S. decision to blacklist a Macau bank where the North held accounts, saying it was complicit in the regime's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

Rice 'Optimistic' Over Nuke Talks (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that she is "cautiously optimistic" that initial progress can be made at six-nation negotiations aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear-weapons programs, as talks resumed hours earlier in Beijing.

The Chinese hosts circulated a joint statement draft outlining the first steps Pyongyang must take, as well as reciprocal gestures by the United States and the other participants, diplomats said.

"The six-party talks have reconvened in Beijing just as we speak, and I think we are cautiously optimistic that there may be some movement forward," Miss Rice said during testimony on the 2008 budget request before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At the same time, she said she does not count her "chickens until they are hatched."

Kim Kye-gwan, the chief North Korean negotiator, said in the Chinese capital that his delegation was "prepared to discuss first-stage measures" toward disarmament. But he also repeated a refrain the North has been using since President Bush took office in 2001.

"We are going to make a judgment based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence," he said, adding that Washington was "well aware" what it had to do.

Still, U.S. and other officials said the first day of the talks went well, unlike the last round in December, when U.S. financial sanctions on the North reportedly were cited by Mr. Kim as an obstacle to progress on the nuclear issue.

"We had a good first day today," Christopher Hill, the top American negotiator, told reporters in Beijing. "We hope we can achieve some kind of joint statement here."

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, met with Mr. Kim over three days in Berlin last month, after which the North said they had agreed on some of the outstanding issues.

Last week, Treasury officials held talks with a North Korean delegation in Beijing on the financial penalties, which involved freezing the North's assets in a Macau bank, apparently to the partial satisfaction of Pyongyang.

Washington imposed the restrictions in fall 2005, saying the funds were associated with illicit activities, such as money laundering and counterfeiting U.S. dollars.

The draft proposed by China yesterday builds on a joint statement all six countries -- the United States, China, Japan, Russia, South and North Korea -- signed in September 2005, which described the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula as their goal, diplomats said.

In exchange for scrapping its nuclear-weapons programs, the North is expected to receive economic and political incentives, such as energy and possibly diplomatic relations with the United States.

Last week, U.S. specialists met in Pyongyang with Mr. Kim, who said North Korea wanted heavy fuel oil and light-water reactors, which it had received for freezing its program in 1994. Both projects were abandoned in 2002 after Washington said Pyongyang was secretly enriching uranium in violation of the deal, known as the Agreed Framework.

Draft Agreement Offered In North Korea Talks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

BEIJING — Talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program resumed here Thursday, with China distributing a draft agreement that U.S. and South Korean envoys described today as offering a good start for discussions.

South Korean negotiator Chun Yung-woo and U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill declined to give any details of the draft.

Japan's Kyodo News agency reported today that the draft called for communist North Korea to suspend operations at its nuclear facilities at Yongbyon within two months in exchange for energy aid.

The agreement was drawn up after the first day of six-nation talks among the two Koreas, Japan, the United States, Russia and China.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency said China had proposed five working groups on North Korea's denuclearization, including one on normalizing ties between Pyongyang and Washington.

Yonhap said the one-page draft included timelines for the North's freezing of its key nuclear facilities, including its only operational 5-megawatt reactor, and for the other parties to supply aid and security guarantees.

Any agreement on an initial set of reciprocal moves to implement a September 2005 accord — in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees — would set the stage for the first tangible steps in the often-delayed process.

The 2005 deal, a broad statement of principles that did not outline any concrete steps for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program, was the only agreement since the negotiations began in 2003.

Hill cautioned that much work remained.

"We have to sit down and make sure we agree on every word, every comma. It will be a long day," he said.

At the last session, in the wake of its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test, North Korea refused to even talk about its nuclear programs. Instead, it demanded that the U.S. lift financial restrictions targeting alleged North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

But the U.S. and North Korean nuclear envoys held an unusual one-on-one meeting in Germany last month where differences between the sides were apparently discussed. Pyongyang and Washington held separate talks in Beijing in late January on the financial issue, although it has yet to be resolved.

N. Korea Agrees To Initial Steps To Disarm (USAT)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Talks on North Korea's nuclear programs resumed Thursday in Beijing, where China distributed a draft agreement and the North agreed in principle to initial steps to disarm. Envoys from six nations are working out details of a September 2005 deal in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees. That deal was a broad statement of principles. The main U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, said the new proposal would be "a set of actions that would have to be taken in a finite amount of time." He declined to give specifics.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington that she was "cautiously optimistic" that implementation of the agreement could begin.

Iran warns U.S. of retaliation if attacked

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned that his nation will strike U.S. interests around the world if Iran is attacked. The Bush administration has said it has no plans to strike Iran but has sent a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf.

Speaking to a gathering of Iranian air force commanders, Khamenei said: "The enemy knows well that any invasion would be followed by a comprehensive reaction to the invaders and their interests all over the world."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said dealings with Iran, and concerns about its nuclear program, are "focused on diplomacy."

British airports reopen after snowfall

Five British airports reopened after workers cleared runways of snow that had fallen up to 6 inches deep in some places. Stansted, Bristol, Birmingham, Luton and Cardiff airports all had reopened by midday. Heathrow, one of Europe's largest airports, remained open but reported 90 cancellations. Hundreds of other flights were canceled throughout the country.

National Rail experienced disruptions across its network, and the Highways Agency warned against all but essential travel. Subway service in London was canceled or delayed after the capital got an inch of snow. The cold interrupted a warm winter. January was Britain's mildest month in more than 90 years, said Wayne Elliott of the Met Office, the U.K.'s weather service.

Congress Urged To Increase Focus On Asia (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

The Congressional Research Service has waved a red flag in front of the new Congress, warning that America risks costly conflicts if it does not pay closer attention to the rise of China and other troubles in Asia.

A preoccupation with Iraq and the Middle East means the United States "is not sufficiently focused on the Asia-Pacific at a critical point in the evolution of what may prove to be a new era," says the report from the CRS, an arm of the Library of Congress.

The report says a failure to attend to a less than peaceful rise of China, tensions over Taiwan, and conflict on the Korean Peninsula "has the potential to embroil the United States in a large-scale war that could be very costly in terms of lives, wealth, power, and prestige."

Moreover, terrorist groups in Southeast and South Asia are "a key source of instability, a threat to U.S. forces and interests, and could serve as a catalyst for inter-state conflict," the document says.

The CRS, which describes itself as "the public policy research arm of the United States Congress," provides nonpartisan research and analysis on critical issues and works primarily for members of Congress and their staffs.

Its report echoes comments made last summer in a seminar at the East-West Center, a research and educational institute in Honolulu, where Asians and Americans alike criticized the Bush administration for neglecting Asia.

James Kelly, the assistant secretary who headed the East Asia division of the State Department during President Bush's first term, said: "There is an insufficient realization that Asia has become the center of gravity," meaning the focal point of political, economic and military power. "Policy and strategy toward East Asia," he said, "are not easy to discern."

Similarly, Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to the Philippines and South Korea, said that by 2009 when the next president takes office, power in Asia "will have shifted while we were not paying attention."

Other voices have cautioned that potentially damaging trends in Asia, especially in China, are being overlooked in the United States. Fred Bergsten, an economist and former senior Treasury official, said China's undervalued currency "could have a devastating impact on the global trading system."

"It is obvious that China is extremely reluctant to make the needed changes in its currency policy," he told a House committee two weeks ago. "It is equally obviously that U.S. efforts on the issue over the past three years ... have borne little fruit to date. A new U.S. policy is clearly needed."

The CRS study, written by analyst Bruce Vaughn, says: "The relative lack of attention to Asia comes at a time when the correlates of power are shifting not only with regard to China but elsewhere in Asia."

Therefore, it says, some Asian nations "are beginning to hedge against what they perceive as an increasingly distracted and insufficiently engaged American power."

"This perceived American vulnerability and uncertainty about America's future role in Asia is leading some Asian analysts to predict that the United States will enter into a 'new phase of inner absorption, if not increasing isolationism,' " the report says, quoting Singaporean scholar Eric Teo Chow Cheow.

The congressional researcher said Japan and Australia are seen as solid U.S. allies while the United States has "key strategic relationships" with Singapore, India, Taiwan and Indonesia.

Elsewhere, however, the United States and South Korea "are drifting apart" and Thailand prefers "equidistance" between the United States and China, it says. New Zealand has dropped out of its alliance with the United States and relations are tenuous with the Philippines, which is struggling with an Islamist insurgency in its south.

US Congress Takes Aim At Tokyo Over Yen (FT)

By Eoin Callan, David Pilling, And Peter Garnham

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Powerful House Democrats are pressing the Bush administration to persuade Tokyo to strengthen the yen, claiming the currency's weakness is bolstering Japanese imports at the expense of US manufacturers.

In a letter to Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, the House members alleged that Tokyo was pursuing a cheap currency to subsidise exporters and urged Mr Paulson "to press the Japanese government to reverse their weak yen policy".

The pressure from Democrats sets up a confrontation with the US Treasury secretary, who argues the yen's weakness reflects Japan's economic fundamentals rather than a deliberate policy of manipulation.

The former head of Goldman Sachs has moved to stiffen the Treasury's resistance to Congress over currency policy and is set to replace the key official responsible for working with Congress on international imbalances.

The Democrats want Mr Paulson to distance himself from Tokyo at the Group of Seven finance ministers meeting starting in Germany today. But he is likely to resist pressure from Congress and European leaders to single out Japan.

The accusation of currency manipulation confirms the fears of executives of Toyota that the company is facing a political backlash on Capitol Hill as it overtakes General Motors as the world's biggest carmaker.

Michigan Representative Sander Levin, chairman of the House trade subcommittee, told the Financial Times: "Japan is clearly following policies to maintain a weak yen."

The yen's fall continued on Thursday, down 0.4 per cent to Y121.20 against the dollar and 0.6 per cent to Y157.90 against the euro.

Japanese exports as a percentage of gross domestic product have – at 16 per cent – surpassed the levels of 1985 when Japan was forced to revalue under pressure from the US.

Takatoshi Ito, a member of the Japanese cabinet's council on fiscal and economic policy, said: "Japan has not intervened since March 2004 – not even oral intervention – so the ministry of finance is clean as market fundamentals push the yen weaker."

Tensions over the yen are set to be reflected in legislation drafted in the Senate on currency manipulation, analysts said.

Representative Barney Frank, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said: "This is directly tied to the administration's efforts to get trade promotion authority renewed. It cannot be the case that we will let the status quo go on."

Bush Plans Latin America Tour (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

President Bush will leave next month on a five-nation tour of Latin America, the White House said Thursday.

Bush and first lady Laura Bush will visit Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico from March 8 to 14.

"The trip will underscore the commitment of the United States to the Western Hemisphere and will highlight our common agenda to advance freedom, prosperity and social justice and deliver the benefits of democracy in the areas of health, education and economic opportunity," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Snow said immigration would be only one topic of the trip. In Brazil, for instance, Bush will be talking about energy independence and trade. In Bogota, Bush will be discussing Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's work to battle narcoterrorism .

"In Mexico, we're going to be supporting the president's efforts to address poverty, income equality, restoring law and order, fighting the common threats of drug trafficking and strengthening the economic relationship," Snow said.

Republican Candidates Weigh Agendas In Post-Bush Era (WSJ)

By John Harwood

FISCAL REALITY PINCHES 2008 candidate platforms.

In Detroit economic speech this week, Romney proposes only to extend Bush tax cuts rather than offer new ones. The ex-Massachusetts governor had contemplated lower top individual and corporate tax rates, but was deterred by lost revenue as more upper-middle-class taxpayers seek relief from alternative minimum tax.

On California fund-raising swing, Giuliani will huddle with Schwarzenegger, whose success as a Republican maverick offers a model for the former New York City mayor. Schwarzenegger has highlighted health and environmental issues.

At pep rally for potential donors, Clinton campaign presses backers to sign up as $25,000 "Hill-raisers" by end of next week.

SENATE REPUBLICANS AIM to split Democrats from liberal bloggers on Iraq.

McConnell's insistence on Gregg's war-funding resolution aims to divide antiwar blogosphere from Democrats wary of cutting money for troops. Though squeeze is toughest on 2008 contenders, other Democrats may be forced to wrestle with it for months in votes on war appropriations.

Strain of the fight shows on Republicans' 2008 front-runner McCain, who has become testy amid quickening presidential maneuvers. House Democrats, moving to jump-start debate next week with simpler resolution opposing Iraq troop surge, expect 30 Republicans to defect from Bush.

BUSH HEADS to Chávez's backyard.

In March trip, the president will hopscotch Latin America promoting trade expansion and countering the populist Venezuelan leader's criticism of his intentions. He's expected to praise leaders in Brazil and Uruguay, leftists who are friendly to free-market policies.

In Brazil, Bush faces pressure to lift U.S. import tariffs on ethanol, now receiving emphasis in administration energy policies. Those tariffs hurt Brazilian manufacturers while protecting politically influential American farm states. Treasury chief Paulson also plans Latin American trip next month.

Panamanian President Torrijos meets Bush in Washington next Friday as U.S.-Panama trade talks near completion.

PORT-SECURITY FEARS could shape congressional debate on U.S.-Peru trade pact. House Democrats Murtha of Pennsylvania and Taylor of Mississippi warn Dubai Ports World has operations in Peru and could gain "new rights" to operate in U.S. under the deal. A spokesman for U.S. Trade Representative Schwab calls that concern "a red herring," noting exceptions in the agreement for national security.

PRIORITIES: Bush's 2008 budget proposal aims to spend $25 million for assessing vulnerabilities of thousands of hazardous facilities to terrorist attack. It calls for $53.6 million to protect 2008 presidential candidates.

HOME COOKING? Treasury Secretary Paulson, a Goldman Sachs veteran, may look to corporate banking circles to fill department's top international post. Departing incumbent Tim Adams has worked mostly in government, serving both Bush presidencies.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS? Though Bush team has strained relations with press, Health and Human Services department has begun meeting with reporters in major U.S. cities to discuss getting word out if flu pandemic hits. Goal is to " learn from the media the kind of things they want to know," says spokeswoman Suzy DeFrancis.

INTELLECTUALS HUSTLE to keep pace with accelerating political debate.

Democratic national-security strategists Kurt Campbell and Michelle Flournoy leave the Center for Strategic and International Studies to create a "centrist" brain trust: the Center for a New American Security. One board member is former White House chief of staff John Podesta, who runs Hillary-friendly Center for American Progress.

But "we will be strictly nonpartisan," says Flournoy, noting the center is courting moderate Republicans as well.

Venezuela To Nationalize Power Company (AP)

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — President Hugo Chavez's government moved to nationalize Venezuela's largest private electric company on Thursday, signing an agreement to buy a controlling stake in Electricidad de Caracas from its U.S.-based owner, AES Corp.

The sale agreement was signed by Paul Hanrahan, president and chief executive of Arlington, Va.-based AES, during a ceremony at the presidential palace in Caracas, agreeing to pass the company's 82-percent stake in the utility to the Venezuelan government within 30 days.

Venezuela will pay some $739.3 million for AES' share in Electricidad de Caracas, said Rafael Ramirez, president of state oil company Petroleos de Venezuela SA. He said the company is valued at $900 million as a whole.

Ramirez said minority shareholders, including employees and retirees of the company, would have "the option to stay with us in the new state company or of course to sell us their shares."

"We are preserving the interest of the minority shareholders," said Ramirez, who signed along with Vice President Jorge Rodriguez on behalf of the government.

Ramirez and Rodriguez shook hands with Hanrahan after the ceremony.

The deal marks the first of multiple nationalization moves planned by Chavez since he was re-elected in December. The Venezuelan president also plans to nationalize other smaller companies in the electrical sector, as well as the country's largest telephone company, CA Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, CANTV.

Electricidad de Caracas has been privately owned since its founding in 1885. U.S.-based AES, a global power company that today has businesses in 26 countries, bought a majority stake of Electricidad de Caracas in a hostile takeover in 2000.

Two More In Britain Exposed To Isotope (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

Two more people have shown signs of low-level exposure to polonium-210, the radioactive isotope that killed former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, British health authorities said Thursday.

The Health Protection Agency said one was a staff member at the Sheraton Hotel in London's Park Lane and the second visited a bar at London's Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1, the same day as Litvinenko.

Russian businessman Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB agent, and business associate Dimitri Kovtun met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel bar on the morning he fell ill. The hotel is among a number of sites investigators found traces of the radioactive isotope responsible for killing Litvinenko.

Health officials said the two who tested as having been exposed to the radioactive isotope were likely to face only a small risk of long-term health effects.

Of the 13 people who previously tested positive for contamination since Litvinenko was poisoned, eight worked at the Millennium Hotel.

Litvinenko was a vocal Kremlin critic who accused Russian authorities of being behind deadly 1999 apartment building bombings that stoked support for a renewed offensive against separatists in Chechnya.

He died from polonium-210 poisoning in a London hospital Nov. 23, and in a deathbed statement accused President Vladimir Putin of being behind his killing.

British Deny 'Witch Hunt' In Arrest Of Muslim (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 8 — The British police on Thursday arrested an outspoken advocate of fiery Islamic views, a week after seizing nine people accused of a separate conspiracy to kidnap and kill a Muslim British soldier.

The arrests brought accusations on Thursday of a witch hunt against Muslims, but high government officials rejected the idea.

The man arrested on Thursday is Abu Izzadeen, a 31-year-old former spokesman for the militant and now outlawed the group Al Ghurabaa.

Mr. Izzadeen initially achieved prominence after the subway and bus bombings in London in July 2005, when four Muslim suicide bombers killed 52 people on London's transit system. At that time, he called the attacks "praiseworthy." Earlier this week, a British television report said Internet images showed Mr. Izzadeen saying in 2004 that Muslims who joined the British Army should be beheaded under Islamic law.

His arrest on Thursday, however, was related to a speech in Birmingham last summer, the police said, and was carried out under counterterrorism laws forbidding the encouragement of terrorism.

Mr. Izzadeen, who was born in a Christian family from Jamaica and named Trevor Brooks, seized headlines in September when he confronted the home secretary, John Reid, at a meeting in east London, after Mr. Reid had suggested that British Muslim parents should watch their children for signs of radicalism. Mr. Izzadeen accused him loudly of being "an enemy of Islam and Muslims."

Referring to Thursday's arrest, one of his allies, Anjem Choudhury, said, "The Muslim community are subject to a witch hunt, and I see this as a continuation of that witch hunt by the Blair regime."

A similar charge was leveled on Thursday by Abu Bakr, a graduate student of political Islam from Birmingham. Mr. Bakr was one of nine people seized last week when the police rounded up suspects in what the authorities called a conspiracy to capture an off-duty British Muslim soldier and broadcast images of his beheading on the Internet. Mr. Bakr and another suspect were released without charges on Wednesday and a judge gave the government 72 hours to present evidence against the others.

[Early Friday, the police issued a statement saying that five of the men had been charged, one more had been released and one was still being held, (a news agency) reported.]

"It's not a police state for everybody else because these terror laws are designed specifically for Muslims, and that's quite an open fact," Mr. Bakr told the BBC in an interview on Thursday.

Mr. Bakr's accusations stirred a familiar unease among those who maintained that Britain's Islamic minority of fewer than two million had been unfairly singled out and stigmatized since before the bombings of July 2005.

Muslims who project themselves as moderate distanced themselves on Thursday from Mr. Izzadeen. Inayat Bunglawala, a spokesman for the Muslim Council of Britain, an umbrella organization for Muslim groups, called him "a character who has made some incendiary remarks in the past."

But Mr. Bunglawala went on to say that there would be "some cynicism" among Muslims about the fact that the arrest came so soon after the release without charge of the two men in Birmingham.

Government officials seemed to line up to protest any suggestion that Britain's counterterrorism laws might constitute an infringement of democratic principles.

"It is a gross caricature of the political process in this country," said Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman, who customarily speaks without being identified by name.

Jack Straw, the leader of the House of Commons, declared, "We should not give excuse or quarter to those who claim this country is a police state — that is absolute, utter nonsense."

Gordon Brown, chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Blair's expected successor, told Sky News television, "I think people know Britain around the world as a country that stands up for liberty, where we do not act arbitrarily, where the police act within the law."

Chirac Discusses Life After Politics In TV Interview (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

PARIS, Feb. 8 — President Jacques Chirac, in remarks that his office confirmed Thursday, has given his first hint that he may not run for a third term in the French elections in April.

"I have always tried to act for the French and for the idea that I had of France," he said, according to a transcript of remarks released by his office that are a portion of a television interview to be broadcast Sunday. "And the day I will no longer have responsibilities of this nature, well, I will try to serve France, the French, in another way."

The interviewer responded, "So there is a life after politics?" to which Mr. Chirac replied, "There is without a doubt a life after politics."

Mr. Chirac's office played down the significance of his comments, saying they were of a general nature. "To a completely timeless question, the president responded in a completely timeless way, and the president's answer therefore brings no information about the decision that he has said he will announce in due time," a spokeswoman said.

The 20-minute interview was taped three weeks ago and is to be broadcast Sunday, as part of a show about his wife, Bernadette Chirac. The rest of that show was taped in front of an audience on Wednesday, and some French news media picked up the remarks and reported them.

Mr. Chirac has promised to make his decision known during the first quarter of the year. According to election rules in France, candidacies must be declared by March 15. Upon watching the taped interview on Wednesday, Ms. Chirac said of Élysée Palace, where she and her husband live, "I will miss this house very much, but I'll adapt," according to the French daily Le Monde.

Of late, commentators have noted the reassignments of some of Mr. Chirac's closest aides to coveted posts away from the president's chambers. But a number of legislative issues coming up in late February mean that Mr. Chirac may not be in a rush to make his decision known.

The issue is of importance to Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and Mr. Chirac's former protégé, who is running on the ticket of Mr. Chirac's UMP party. His primary opponent is Ségolène Royal of the Socialists.

Civic Groups Seek To Amend Law On Insults To Turkish State (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

ISTANBUL, Feb. 8 — A group of civic organizations on Thursday submitted suggestions for rewording a section of the Turkish penal code under which noted intellectuals and writers had been charged with the crime of insulting the Turkish identity and the state.

But some critics of the law say it should be revoked, not amended.

After the killing last month of an Armenian-Turkish journalist, Hrant Dink, some critics said the law, known as Article 301, was partly responsible. According to this argument, Mr. Dink's conviction under the article for comments he made about the genocide in which more than a million Armenians were killed by the Ottoman Turk government from 1915 to 1918 made him a traitor in the eyes of many Turks and put his life in jeopardy.

For Turkey, the Armenian issue is among the thorniest issues of free speech. The courts have interpreted the use of the word genocide in reference to the killings as an "insult against the Turkish state" under Article 301.

Last year, after harsh criticism by the European Union, the government said it was receptive to changing the law but not abolishing it.

The proposal submitted on Thursday, signed by 10 civic organizations, tried to make a distinction between illegal language and legal criticism. Instead of outlawing "insulting Turkishness" it proposed new wording that would outlaw "openly abasing and deriding" the Turkish identity.

That was not enough for one civic group, the Turkish Chamber of Doctors, which broke with the umbrella group and accused the government of trying to evade responsibility for the law for fear of losing voters in November's general elections. "Changes are only a facade and can never prevent bitter consequences, as we've witnessed with Mr. Dink's murder," said Gencay Gurun, the group's general secretary.

Perihan Magden, a journalist who is one of a number of people given security protection by the government after Mr. Dink's death, said the suggested changes were too mild to make a difference.

"The fact that I have to live in my own country under police protection is a government acknowledgment that something is wrong," she said.

Another Bad Idea From The Kremlin (NYT)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

The Russian energy minister, Viktor Khristenko, piously declared on Tuesday that Russia's meetings with other gas producers were intended only to improve energy security, and that any talk of a cartel was the product of a "sick imagination." A curious insistence since the idea of a cartel has been raised by President Vladimir Putin, who recently called OPEC-like cooperation with Iran for gas "an interesting idea" — though, of course, its goal would be to better serve customers, not fix prices.

The Kremlin is full of disturbing and counterproductive ideas these days on how it can wield its energy resources, not to mention shield its economic client Iran from international pressure. And if it looks as if a cartel might serve Mr. Putin's ambitions, the world should pay close attention.

There are reasons why a gas cartel could not work like an oil cartel. Gas is generally delivered over pipelines and is expensive to store, leaving sellers as well as buyers dependant on long-term contracts. Moscow has also stayed out of OPEC.

What arouses anxiety over the new cartel talk — especially in Europe, which relies on Russia for more than a quarter of its natural gas — is the fact that Mr. Putin has already managed to get most of Russia's energy production and distribution under the Kremlin's control.

Even as Mr. Putin and the state gas monopoly, Gazprom, insist that they are reliable suppliers, their record is far different. They destroyed a defiant domestic oil company, Yukos, tried to muscle Ukraine and Belarus into turning over their portions of the old Soviet pipeline network, and leaned on Shell to gain control over the Sakhalin gas project.

Mr. Putin needs to understand that Russia's long-term economic and strategic interests depend on its playing by the international rules, rather than breaking them. Russia is still not capable of developing its oil and gas by itself, and the expertise it needs lies almost entirely in the West. So yes, Mr. Khristenko, number us among those who mistrust the Kremlin — and prove us wrong.

Not Their Parents' Russia (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

MOSCOW

Russia today is a country that takes three hands to describe.

On the one hand, it is impossible any more to call Vladimir Putin's government "democratic," given the way it has neutered the Russian Parliament, intimidated or taken over much of the Russian press, subordinated the judiciary and coercively extended its control over the country's key energy companies.

On the other hand, it is obvious talking to Russians how much the humiliating and dispiriting turmoil that accompanied Boris Yeltsin's first stab at democracy — after the collapse of Communism — left many people here starved for a strong leader, a stable economy and stores with Western consumer goods. Mr. Putin is popular for a reason.

And on the third hand, while today's Russia may be a crazy quilt of capitalist czars, mobsters, nationalists and aspiring democrats, it is not the totalitarian Soviet Union. It has more than a touch of the authoritarianism of postwar Gaullist France and a large spoonful of the corruption and messiness of postwar Italy — when those countries emerged from World War II as less than perfect democracies.

But 60 years later, after huge growth in their per capita incomes, France and Italy now help to anchor Western Europe. For all of their shortcomings, their postwar governments provided the context for the true democratic agent of change to come of age — something that takes 9 months and 21 years to produce — a generation raised on basically free markets and free politics. I still think Russia will follow a similar path — in time.

"In historical terms, the transition will be very fast," Boris Makarenko, deputy chief of Russia's Center for Political Technologies, said to me. "But I am 47. I am in a hurry. I am very optimistic [though] for my daughter, who is 15. ... I can see the normal middle class rising here. It's all about shape and pace. When will we get there, I don't know — we will get there, but probably not fast enough for me to see."

The Yeltsin democratic experiment is over, to be sure, added Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Carnegie Endowment's Moscow office, "because it was delegitimized by the 1998 ruble crash and because it was a time of supreme corruption and dominance by oligarchs — but the Russian democratic experiment is not over because Russia is such a changed place."

Ms. Gottemoeller, an American, told me she recently visited Ulyanovsk, Lenin's birthplace, in the heart of Russia's aging industrial rust belt, and went out to dinner with three Russian couples, all new entrepreneurs.

"After they plied me with drinks," she recalled, "they said: 'O.K., we have a question. We want to know how you define middle class' — and did I think they were middle class? And that just flummoxed me. ... They wanted to know what middle class was in America. It meant a lot to them to think they were linked up to a broader community of middle class. ... [They] are not out in the streets with a banner, but their aspirations are huge and in the right direction."

People who identify themselves as middle class often end up fighting for legal and civil rights to protect their gains, without even knowing they are fighting for them. That said, the pace of democratization here will most likely depend on three things.

One is whether this emerging middle class gets so preoccupied with material gains — thanks to the trickle-down of high oil and gas prices — that "it just disconnects from politics," Ms. Gottemoeller noted. (Russia today has more cellphones than people!) Another is the genie of Russian nationalism, which can always pop up and derail democratization. Just down the street from my hotel, the Movement Against Illegal Immigration held a march denouncing Jews and immigrants.

Third is the price of oil and gas. Anyone who observes Russia can see that the price of oil and the pace of freedom here operate with an inverse correlation. As oil prices go down the pace of freedom goes up, because Russia has to open itself more to the world and empower its people to get ahead. As oil prices go up the pace of freedom goes down, because the government can get by drilling oil wells, rather than unleashing its people.

"When oil prices became higher, the reforms became slower," said Vladimir Ryzhkov, a liberal Russian Duma member from Altay. "Russia became a more closed country with a more state-oriented economy. Last year we saw record oil prices and not one reform. [That is the] reason Freedom House last year proclaimed Russia a 'non-free country. ' ... The question for you Americans is: When will prices go down? It is the only hope for us Russian democrats."

Mikhail Khodorkovsky (WSJ)

By Robert R. Amsterdam

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

The Kremlin this week showed that democracy, human rights and the rule of law are dead in Vladimir Putin's Russia. With extraordinarily cynical timing, new charges -- this time, money-laundering -- were brought against Mikhail Khodorkovsky, who once ran Russia's largest oil company, Yukos. These charges have nothing to do with upholding Russia's laws. They have everything to do with the fact that Mr. Khodorkovsky would have been eligible for parole later this year, having served half his eight-year sentence on a politically motivated tax evasion conviction handed down in 2005. Another show trial will surely propel the machinery of so-called justice toward another preordained guilty verdict.

The fresh case means that Mr. Khodorkovsky will be unable to support democratic opposition parties in December's Duma elections or the 2008 "presidential coronation." And it means that the Kremlin will continue to wield pervasive control over the energy sector in which he had done so much to promote market-based competition and growth.

Before his arrest in 2003, Mr. Khodorkovsky set out his vision for Russia. He encouraged the development of civil society and the growth of alternative political parties. He worked to provide schools across with access to the Internet and supported charitable and cultural programs. He publicly confronted the president about the need to stamp out corruption in Russia.

When it became clear that the state did not share his vision and was not going to tolerate dissent, Mr. Khodorkovsky did not flee. He cooperated with the justice system -- convinced of his innocence, and convinced, also, that he could challenge what seemed to be an attempt by corrupt officials to intimidate him. He did not foresee how ruthlessly the law would be disregarded in the Kremlin's drive to crush him. Nor did anyone quite foresee the blatant theft of Yukos assets.

By jailing Mr. Khodorkovsky and stealing Yukos, the Putin regime cleared the energy sector of any competitors. It enabled the Kremlin to use energy as a political weapon against Russia's immediate neighbors and the whole of Europe. Mr. Khodorkovsky and his company, in other words, had to be destroyed for Mr. Putin's non-market, state corporatism and energy imperialism to thrive. So now, no one will build competing pipelines; no one will advocate the breakup of state monopolies; no one will promote the corporate governance and transparency that are anathemas to the state-owned enterprises. The new charges against Mr. Khodorkovsky are, in fact, intended to provide a smokescreen for the Russian government's illegal sale, later this year, of the remaining assets of Yukos, valued at $33 billion, to those very companies.

The Russian regime has lost the moral authority to dispense justice. Its exploitation of prosecutorial and regulatory powers, though shielded by state immunity, has become criminal. Selective enforcement of tax and environmental laws is the favored means of stealing assets from both domestic and foreign owners. Extortion is entrenched as a method of acquisition by the state.

The Yukos saga was followed late last year by the shakedown of Royal Dutch Shell at its Sakhalin-2 project. With each such case, the Kremlin is less concerned about even keeping up pretenses. Moscow calculates it has space to maneuver around legal and moral obligations, whether with respect to existing treaties, or negotiations over developing the giant Shtokman gas field, or its commitments to supply gas and oil dependably without political interference.

When Mr. Khodorkovsky was interrogated about the new charges, he declared that he had no faith in Russian justice, and that he will refuse to cooperate with the prosecutors in another politically driven farce of a trial. This week he appealed to the world not for himself but for all Russians: "Their only chance is the timely voluntary transfer of power in Russia by the means of honest, fair and transparent elections. . . . [The new president] should have nothing in common with the giant corruption machine that has paralyzed Russia."

Even in a Siberian gulag, Mr. Khodorkovsky has the courage to say: Enough! His fate is far more important than most people in the West realize. Some Western leaders such as Angela Merkel of Germany and José Manuel Barroso of the European Commission have raised his case with the Russian president. The dictatorial feathers were not ruffled and both were summarily brushed off. And so, another Khodorkovsky trial will soon be upon us. Let's be sure that this time we all recognize that Mikhail Khodorkovsky's fight is for the future of Russia and its relationship with the rest of the world.

Mr. Amsterdam is international defense counsel for Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and is based in London after being deported from Russia.

Turkmenistan Awaits First 'Free' Elections (CSM)

By Fred Weir

MOSCOW

The political ice may finally be cracking in the gas-rich, desert nation of Turkmenistan. Its 6 million people will get their first ever chance to vote in multicandidate elections this Sunday in polls to replace longtime strongman Saparmurat Niyazov, who died in December without naming an heir.

But the appearance of choice may be illusory, analysts say, making the Central Asian nation's first election more the stuff of hype than history.

Six contenders are vying openly for the post left vacant by the self-titled "Azim Turkmenbashi" (Great Father of the Turkmen), who ruled with an iron fist – and increasingly erratic style – for 21 years. Experts say that five of the candidates, mostly second-tier regional officials, are merely window dressing and victory has been pre-ordained for acting president Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, a former deputy premier who won the brief power struggle following Niyazov's death.

However, Mr. Berdymukhammedov has pledged to institute cautious liberal reforms, and there are signs that Turkmenistan's hitherto ironclad dependence on Russia's Gazprom to handle its gas exports might also change.

"The Turkmenbashi's death has shaken the regime, and at least opened up the possibility of positive changes," says Irina Zvigelskaya, an analyst with the official Institute of Oriental Studies in Moscow. "But, at this point, no one really knows what we're dealing with. The new leader could hardly be just like Niyazov, but there are no guarantees that he won't choose the same despotic model of rule."

But the potential for a departure from the old politics of Turkmenistan, which holds the world's fifth-largest gas reserves, has excited great interest in the global energy community.

In 2003 Niyazov signed a 25-year contract with Gazprom, affording the Russian gas giant near total control over Turkmenistan's gas exports. But last year, Niyazov signed a tentative deal with Beijing, under which large quantities of Turkmen gas would be sold to China beginning in 2009.

The US would like to see Turkmenistan ship its gas and oil across the Caspian Sea, where it could be loaded into the new Baku- Ceyhan pipeline and transported to Western markets. In the 1990s there was talk – which has never completely died down – of building a pipeline south, through Afghanistan, to deliver Turkmen gas to the hungry markets of the Indian subcontinent.

"Niyazov used to say that Turkmenistan has enough gas to feed Russia, China, and India, too, but geologists are not so sure," says Mikhail Krutikhin, editor of Russian Energy Weekly, a Moscow-based trade journal. "The new leaders of Turkmenistan will basically have to decide whether the gas should flow north to Russia, or east to China. I fear that Gazprom has not been paying enough attention to Turkmenistan lately, so the Chinese might win this race."

Some experts speculate that real power is in the hands of the chief of Niyazov's palace guard, Akmurad Rejepov, a shadowy former Soviet KGB official. Under the Constitution, the speaker of parliament, Ovezgeldy Atayev, should have become acting leader after Niyazov's demise. Instead, Mr. Atayev found himself in prison facing an unspecified "criminal investigation."

The Halk Maslahaty (Peoples' Council), a megaparliament of 3,000 members that met once a year under Niyazev, was hastily summoned to appoint Berdymukhammedov as acting president. It also approved the six candidates for the presidency – all of whom were required to swear allegiance to Niyazov's political policies.

Exiled opposition politicians who have tried to enter Turkmenistan have been turned away at the border. Few foreign journalists have been granted visas to cover the polls, and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which normally fields election observers, has decided to sit this one out due to "time constraints" on forming a delegation.

In an interview with Radio Free Europe, the chair of the European Union's interparliamentary mission to Turkmenistan, Albert Jan Maat, said that "these elections [are] only with candidates from the former government – you can't call them real elections – and that is not a start for a more open society."

Nevertheless, experts say it's reasonable to hope that the harsh repression and wild extravagance that marked the Turkmenbashi's rule may ease. Niyazov jailed thousands of opponents, expelled ethnic Russians, and jammed news broadcasts from Moscow. He slashed social services, abolished old age pensions, and ordered the number of school years for children reduced. He banned ballet and opera as "alien," and forbade men to wear beards or teenagers to play video games.

At the same time, he squandered the country's export earnings from gas and cotton on lavish monuments to himself and his deceased mother, and renamed the months of the year after himself, his mother, and various relatives. A year ago, fearful of palace plots, Niyazov ordered all doctors to swear a personal oath to himself instead of the Hippocratic Oath.

"Everything is known in advance. Berdymukhammedov will win," exiled Turkmen journalist Bytyr Mukhammedov told the Russian daily Moskovsky Komsomolets. The front-runner has been quoted by the official Turkmen press as pledging to boost social services, restore pensions, privatize some industries, permit people to build their own homes, restore transport links with Russia, and even allow citizens to access the Internet. "Changes are already being implemented, and I think the new regime will evolve slowly toward civilization," said Mr. Mukhammedov.

New Advocacy Group Aims To Point Up Atrocities In Africa (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Veteran Africa activists, frustrated by the slow response from Sudan's government to international demands to ease the plight of refugees in Darfur, are regrouping to take their fight to the next level.

A new group, calling itself Enough, has joined the growing list of nongovernmental peacemaking organizations. Its aim, the founders said, is to tap into the grass-roots awareness and sense of rage generated by the Darfur crisis and create a social and political network that can identify potential wide-scale atrocities, particularly in Africa, and stop them before they occur.

The three co-founders are Gayle E. Smith, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, who was previously an officer with the State Department and the National Security Council; Africa expert John Prendergast, a senior adviser at the International Crisis Group who also served at State and the NSC in the Clinton administration; and Colin Thomas-Jensen, Africa research and advocacy manager for the International Crisis Group and a former official with the U.S. Agency for International Development.

"We've got people's attention on Darfur. While we have it, there are other raging fires such as Uganda and the Congo, and it is more cost-effective to act in concert," Smith said. "I am both excited and moved by the activism on Africa and what has happened in the last 30 years. . . . It is breathtaking."

In a survey by the Pew Research Center conducted in December, 51 percent of American respondents said they thought the United States had a responsibility to do something about ethnic violence in Darfur, and 53 percent were in favor of U.S. troops in Darfur as part of a multinational force to help end ethnic genocide there.

"It's a neat idea. When you build up such a large grass-roots base, it would be a shame to let it die away once a crisis is finished. It would be great to have a system to take care of future conflicts," said Amjad Atallah, president of Strategic Assessments Initiative and an adviser to the Save Darfur Coalition, an alliance of organizations committed to protecting civilians in Darfur.

"So much of the campaigning has been effective in raising awareness, which is crucial, but ineffective in affecting policy. We won't just focus on one crisis. We want to show the linkages and common roots between the crises in Congo, Northern Uganda and Sudan," Prendergast said Monday by e-mail from Uganda, where he is touring with actor Ryan Gosling.

Prendergast said the object was to feed the growing movement against genocide and make it more comprehensive. "Ultimately, our goal is to help reorganize our government's ability to prevent and respond to the commission of crimes against humanity as a fundamental objective of U.S. foreign policy, just as promoting trade and countering terrorism is today," he said.

The founders' experience in government and in relief work in Africa will add another dimension to the grass-roots activism that began on campuses nationwide. Stark images from Darfur of emaciated, gangly refugees on the edge between life and death have entered the American consciousness through a variety of documentaries and other television shows.

"We are going to develop a committed core of people, which is not so much a lobbying group as one that can drive up the political temperature," Prendergast said, spelling out the new group's agenda. "How do we restructure diplomatically? What we want to do is make existing movements smarter and build a better infrastructure within the government. How to restructure intelligence networks to set alarm bells in motion? How do we provide assistance to existing peacekeeping operations and, more importantly, protect civilians?"

Some ideas the group discussed include monthly analysis briefings, workshops on shaping the congressional budget process, and regional training for advocacy.

At the request of the Save Darfur Coalition, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) led a delegation last month to Sudan's capital, Khartoum, to meet with President Omar Hassan al-Bashir. The group hoped to tease out written commitments on the deployment of peacekeeping troops, the establishment of humanitarian delivery corridors, and the clear marking of government planes to avoid confusion between attack aircraft and relief drops.

S. Daniel Abrahams, a Slimfast magnate and philanthropist, offered his private jet, and the State Department gave its consent for the trip. A couple of days after the trip, a 60-day cease-fire collapsed.

Richardson said in an interview this week that some advances were made "in the right direction," such as a pledge to reduce the red tape delaying permits for Sudanese relief workers hoping to work in Darfur. Most previous diplomatic efforts with Bashir have failed.

"I'm going to make Darfur an issue," said Richardson, who announced his bid for the presidency one week after returning from Sudan in January. "We need to start thinking about Africa and about repairing our relations with the Muslim world. Our obsession with Iraq has caused us to neglect poverty issues. "

"I think candidates of both parties at some point are going to be asked about Darfur," Smith said. "In 2004 there were questions about Darfur in the debate. We expect everyone running for president will get a question on Darfur."

More than 185 organizations are members of the Save Darfur Coalition, which has a highly efficient system for collecting online donations, obtaining grants and foundation money, and gathering sizable contributions from individuals and celebrities. Enough is likely to tap into the same pool of funding.

Richardson met with U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon to push the Sudan agenda, and he welcomed the intensified efforts of the civic groups. "It is very healthy to have such groups," he said. "There are a number of ethnic wars in Africa . . . unfolding tragedies. We cannot as a nation have any more Rwandas."

Frist Joins Evangelist Graham On Trip To South Sudan (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

JUBA, Sudan -- The jet took off Wednesday morning headed for Juba, the fledgling regional capital of southern Sudan and a place at the moment resembling a hot and sandy construction site.

DOJ_NMG_0129930

In the pilot seat was Franklin Graham, son of evangelist Billy Graham. And in the entourage were several members of his Christian charity group, Samaritan's Purse, along with former Senate majority leader, onetime rumored presidential contender and, for now, surgeon and civilian Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

He had traveled to the group's far-flung health clinics before to operate on patients who, he granted, often had no idea who he was. The mission this time was a meeting with leaders of the semiautonomous region that only recently emerged from one of the bloodiest and longest-running civil wars on the continent.

But a U.S.-backed peace agreement between the southern Sudanese and the government in Khartoum is faltering badly as world attention has shifted to Darfur, the western region of the country where the government is accused of waging a campaign of violence that the United States and others have labeled genocide.

In the south, the conflict revolved mainly around oil-rich areas along a disputed border with the north. Like Darfur, it is layered with an ethnic dimension. But unlike Darfur, the conflict had a religious dimension and was cast at times as a war of persecution by the mostly Arab and Muslim government against the darker-skinned southerners, who mainly practice Christianity and indigenous religions.

It is that religious facet that has continued to draw in U.S. evangelical groups such as Samaritan's Purse, which has provided humanitarian relief in the region for a decade. Graham, who recounted with some relish diving into foxholes during wartime trips to the region, said his group has counted at least 500 destroyed churches amid a wider landscape of ruin. He was heading to Juba to tell leaders of his intention to rebuild all of them, he said.

The jet landed before noon in a cloud of sandy dust.

By then, about 90 flights had already buzzed into the small but busy airport, most carrying contractors who are building roads and government ministries from scratch, and living in encampments of tents that are so in demand that they rent at times for more than $150 a night.

A group of two dozen southern Sudanese leaders greeted Graham, Frist and the rest on the runway, and soon a convoy of trucks, SUVs and sirens was rumbling down the reddish dirt roads.

The first stop was the headquarters of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), the former rebel group that runs the region.

"We call it the wild west," Barnaba Marial Benjamin, the minister of regional cooperation, said to the visiting Americans. "You put down your tent under the tree, and you begin something."

Benjamin told Frist and Graham about all the roads that have been built -- "A miracle," he said -- but as the meeting continued, the news about the peace process was decidedly mixed.

Pagan Amum, secretary general of the SPLM, accused the ruling party in Khartoum of orchestrating an attempt to undermine the hard-won Comprehensive Peace Agreement in advance of a vote on secession scheduled for 2011.

Specifically, he said, the government is cheating the south out of oil revenue, building up its forces in the crucial, oil-rich Abyei province and dragging its feet on resolving the border demarcation, all in violation of the agreement reached two years ago. Amum also accused the government of funding militias to harass and drive away contractors.

"These are calculations for something bigger," he said. "It is part of a major plan."

Among other things, Frist asked about the availability of clean water. Benjamin explained that water was a problem: bullet holes in water tanks, toxic asbestos pipes. But soon it was time to go, and after firm handshakes and thank-yous, the convoy took off again.

The line of white trucks and vans rolled through town, kicking up dust as people stopped a moment to stare, then went back to hauling wood planks, selling cinder blocks and digging trenches.

More than 100,000 refugees have returned to the south in the past year or so, including Miyong Kuon, who lived in Omaha during the war and was among the crowd following Graham's group. Though there is little in Juba to love besides sand and sky and heat, Kuon said it still felt like home. "Even if it's a tent, home is home," he said.

Kuon waited while Frist and Graham met with the southern Sudanese president, Salva Kiir Mayardit, a tall, bearded man who wore a black bowler-style hat.

After the meeting, Kiir told reporters that in his view, the central government "lacks the political will" to implement the peace agreement, but he also blamed "extremists in both camps" -- including his own -- for blocking progress.

"We are all convinced that going back to war will not be the solution," Kiir said.

Frist told the crowd that he would report back to whoever would listen that southern Sudanese were committed to peace but that more outside oversight was necessary to make it work. Then, the convoy took off again.

DOJ_NMG_0129931

In the late afternoon, the group met with an SPLM general and finally with the energetic speaker of parliament, who urged the U.S. government to consider Darfur and southern Sudan as different manifestations of the same, problematic Khartoum government.

Graham told the speaker that God had not abandoned the people of southern Sudan.

Afterward, the group posed for photos amid half-constructed buildings and low, twisted trees. And about 5 p.m., the convoy headed back to the airport.

Chinese Leader's Almost Triumphal Trip To Africa (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA AND LUSAKA, ZAMBIA

Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Africa started out last week with the usual manly handshakes, red-carpet strolls, factory visits, and displays of African dance and music.

This tour – which includes Cameroon, Liberia, Sudan, Zambia, Namibia, South Africa, Mozambique, and the Seychelles, – serves to fulfill promises China made at a glitzy Beijing summit in November, where 48 African heads of state heard Mr. Hu pledge to double aid to Africa by 2009 and create an investment fund of $5 billion in the next three years.

By the end of 2006, China had already invested nearly $8 billion in Africa, mainly for extracting minerals and oil to fuel its booming economy, and during this trip, Hu has brought with him more loans and a veritable army of Chinese investors.

But the farther south Hu traveled this week, the more skepticism he met. Hu canceled a visit to Zambia's copper belt, fearing protests over low pay and poor working conditions at Chinese- run mines. In the lead-up to Zambia's Sept. 28 elections, runner-up presidential candidate Michael Sata promised to kick out the Chinese if he had won. In South Africa, President Thabo Mbeki recently warned his fellow African leaders not to allow Chinese investment to become a "colonial relationship."

At least one message of this trip: President Hu, the African honeymoon is over.

"Mbeki's speech reflects a deeper concern that is more addressed to Africans than to the Chinese," says Francis Kornegay, a senior researcher at the Center for Policy Studies in Johannesburg. "The Africans have to set the parameters of the relationship and know what they are getting out of the relationship."

Such caution on the part of a few African countries – concentrated in the south of the continent – doesn't mean that African leaders are ready to give China the boot. To the contrary, Hu's visit has been a rather triumphant follow-through on promises made during the Beijing summit.

At his first stop in Cameroon, Hu pledged $100 million in grants and soft loans. Last week, Hu and Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa launched a new copper-mining partnership, which, they say, will produce thousands of jobs, $800 million in investment – and plenty of copper for China's growing economy.

"It is in China's national interest and in Africa's interest to have a trading partnership," says Pieter Snyman, director of The Beijing Axis, a consultancy that helps South African companies do business with China. "African leaders find China to be more sympathetic to African needs than the West. Africa does not need just money or somebody to get infrastructure projects. It has to be a sustained relationship, and that's up to the Africans to get what they want out of it."

What Africans want, of course, differs from country to country. In Sudan, where Hu visited last week, leaders sought more investment in the oil industry and in refining. In South Africa, business and political leaders seemed eager to push China to accept more African imports into their markets. And in resource-rich but impoverished countries like Zambia, political leaders and workers alike were pushing for better wages, and a bigger cut in the profits from mining.

Anger in Zambia

"They are just using us – we are like tools. They come here to invest, but at the end of the month they just pay us peanuts," says Likezo Mukumbi, a security guard at a shopping complex in Zambia's capital, Lusaka. Mr. Mukumbi says the Zambian government should do more to ensure that the Chinese are treating Zambians fairly.

Sentiments like that fueled the presidential bid of Mr. Sata, a shrewd and charismatic former government minister, during September's national elections. Sata threatened to run "exploiter" Chinese investors out of town, drawing cheers from many of Zambia's urban poor. Sata said he would recognize Taiwan as an independent nation if elected, and drew a rebuke from China's ambassador in Zambia, who suggested that China would cut ties with Zambia if Sata was elected – calling into question China's avowed policy of noninterference in local politics.

Low wages and safety concerns at Chinese-run mines have drawn the ire of Zambian labor unions and mining communities. Concern built to outrage when an explosion at a Chinese-run Chambishi mine killed 51 Zambian miners in 2005. Hu's delegation canceled plans to visit Chambishi during his visit amid rumors of potential protests.

Mining accidents are not the only aspect of the Chinese presence that irks many Zambians. In recent years, an influx of Chinese traders and other small-businesspeople have begun operating in local markets, selling inexpensive Chinese clothes and other imports, and putting pressure on local entrepreneurs.

It is this same issue of competition that has begun to irk South African manufacturers and retailers, says Raymond Louw, editor of the Southern African Report, in Johannesburg. But unlike Zambia, the pressure has not built to the point where it spills out into street protests.

China's ability to launch business partnerships, and also to offer massive loans for infrastructure clearly gives it the advantage over multinational corporations, who come just to do business. It also comes without all the colonial baggage that British, French, and even US companies carry.

Avoiding colonialism

"Africa has a long history with colonial powers, and the colonial powers ripped off Africa, period," says a former South African diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Then along comes China, this emerging giant, and they play a very clever game. They want certain things from certain parts of the world, and they say, 'We will not interfere in local issues.' That is attractive to Africa; when you look at Zimbabwe and at Darfur, those are controversial places to do business, but the Chinese are there, and they don't interfere."

Like other African leaders, Zambian officials maintain that the Chinese government treats them with respect – and understands the social and political environment they deal with, as opposed to many Western donors.

"They know what it means to go to bed without a meal.... There is more understanding between the Chinese and ourselves," says Vernon Mwaanga, Zambia's minister of information and broadcasting.

Yet increased trade is bringing increased public discontent in places, and that's something African and Chinese leaders will have to address. Responding to South African fears about imports undercutting the local market, Hu last year cut textile imports to South Africa by one-third. Trade between the two countries still roared ahead another 36 percent this year.

Hu Jintao's trade safari

China's President Hu Jintao and a 130-strong delegation is concluding an eight-nation tour of the African continent with trips to Mozambique and the Seychelles on Friday and Saturday. As part of China's bid for Africa's mineral resources, Mr. Hu inked trade and economic assistance deals in each nation.

Here's what Hu did during his 12-day swing:

Cameroon: Canceled Cameroon's debt (amount unspecified), pledged $100 million in grants and soft loans, and signed agreements to build two schools and a hospital in the capital of Douala.

Liberia: Signed a memo canceling all of the $15 million of debt Liberia owed to China and announced a tax exemption on all Liberian exports to China.

Sudan: Signed seven documents on economic and technological cooperation and canceled debts amounting to $19 million.

Zambia: Inaugurated the Zambia-China Economic and Trade Cooperation Zone, including a massive mining partnership in the country's copper belt, to spur development in the smelting, construction, home-appliance, and food-processing industries.

Namibia: Signed a $139 million soft loan (of which $59 million was interest free), a grant, and dozens of scholarships. Made a four-point proposal to boost political and cultural ties between the two nations.

South Africa: In his first state visit and his ninth meeting with President Thabo Mbeki, Hu pledged a "new strategic partnership" including opening the Chinese market to local fruit exports and assistance to South African development programs.

Mozambique: Expected to announce the cancellation of $15 million in debt Mozambique owes China.

Seychelles: This 110-island archipelago is of strategic importance to oil routes and military bases in the Indian Ocean – two areas China has a significant interest in developing.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Blocks Contempt Hearing For Verizon In Phone Records Case (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

BANGOR, Maine — A federal judge Thursday blocked state regulators from going ahead with a contempt hearing for Verizon, ruling that national security considerations outweighed the state´s interest in speedy resolution of a complaint by customers.

The preliminary injunction forced cancellation of the Public Utilities Commission hearing that had been set for Friday in Augusta to force the telecommunications giant to say whether it provided customer call records to the government without a warrant.

In his 24-page order, U.S. District Judge John Woodcock said the hearing was not the appropriate place to air the dispute.

"The federal court, not the PUC hearing room, is the proper forum to resolve the opposing positions of the federal and state governments," he wrote. "Moreover, in this controversy, Verizon is a surrogate for the position of the federal government and it would be profoundly unfair to punish Verizon for asserting a legal position mandated by the federal government."

Woodcock said the only hardship that the PUC would suffer from the injunction would be to face some delay in resolving the multi-citizen complaint that triggered the federal lawsuit.

By contrast, he wrote, "the revelation of sensitive information pertaining to national security is a manifest hardship to the United States if the injunction were denied."

The dispute before the judge was an outgrowth of a complaint filed by Verizon customers last May. Last week, the PUC said it would begin contempt proceedings against Verizon for failure to comply with an order last August that requires an official of the company to swear under oath that its previous statements regarding the National Security Agency´s alleged surveillance were true.

PUC spokeswoman Nicole Clegg said the commission was "obviously disappointed" at the ruling. "We´re still reviewing it, and tomorrow we´re going to discuss our options with the Attorney General´s Office."

Shenna Bellows of the Maine Civil Liberties Union, which had backed the agency´s stance, described the judge´s ruling as a "temporary setback."

"The Maine Civil Liberties Union is committed to carrying this as far as we need to go to defend Mainers´ privacy," she said.

A spokesman for Verizon, which had backed the U.S. Justice Department suit to stop the contempt hearing, could not be reached immediately for comment. The company had argued that it had been unfairly placed in the middle of a dispute between the state and federal governments.

House Dems Push New Security Regulations On Foreign Investment (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 9, 2007

House Democrats are moving quickly to approve legislation in response to last year's controversy surrounding a United Arab Emirates-based company's attempted takeover of several U.S. shipping ports, but may be headed for a clash with a Republican presidential candidate and Senate Democrats.

Leaders of key House and Senate committees are expected to forge ahead with rival bills similar to those approved last year when both chambers were under Republican control.

Congress was unable then to reconcile differences over how to update rules governing the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. (CFIUS), an interagency panel led by the Treasury Department that reviews foreign investment deals for national-security threats. CFIUS approved Dubai Ports World's acquisition of a British company that operated several U.S. ports, sparking vibrant debate one year ago this month.

Privately, House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) has told supporters of the House bill that his goal would be to move legislation to the House floor immediately following the President's Day recess, according to business sources. This would allow House Democrats to say they had moved legislation responding to the Dubai Ports deal early in their majority tenure.

Frank currently is working on a manager's amendment to bipartisan legislation approved unanimously by the House in 2006 and reintroduced in January by Reps. Carolyn Maloney (D-N.Y.), Joseph Crowley (D-N.Y.), Republican Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), two business sources said.

On the floor, the bill is expected to be considered under an open rule that would allow amendments, and Frank has indicated some misgivings regarding amendments from the Republican side. For example, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), a presidential candidate and vocal critic of the Dubai deal, voted for last year's House bill under some pressure from leadership. He might be more inclined to offer amendments while pursuing a presidential bid, particularly with Democrats running the House, one lobbyist said.

A spokesman for Hunter on the Armed Services Committee, Josh Holly, said Hunter would not make a decision on whether to seek amendments until he saw a committee-approved bill. Holly indicated Hunter would be watching to see if the House bill is updated to reflect Hunter's concerns about the recent merger between France's Alcatel and U.S.-based Lucent Technologies, which includes a subsidiary that has done defense work.

CFIUS approved the Alcatel-Lucent merger last year, but imposed certain conditions on it that business groups said set a bad precedent, since they would allow the government to unravel the deal in the future.

Business groups want Congress to approve CFIUS legislation because they hope it will counter actions taken by the administration in the wake of the Dubai Ports controversy. CFIUS investigations have increased in the last year, and the administration is imposing more conditions on deals it approves, according to the president of the Organization for International Investment, Todd Malan. In testimony at a Financial Services hearing this week, he said the CFIUS bureaucracy went into a "hyper-cautious" mode in the wake of the ports scandal that could decrease foreign investment in the U.S.

In the Senate, Democratic presidential candidate and Banking Committee Chairman Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) told The Hill he intends to move a bill quickly. He also suggested it would look similar to the legislation approved by the Senate in 2006 that was opposed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Business Roundtable, Organization for International Investment and other groups representing U.S. multinationals.

Dodd, whose presidential campaign is seen by business as a potentially complicating factor in the debate, said his committee would consider modifying last year's bill, but said it may make more sense to consider changes during a conference with the House.

"I don't know if any changes have occurred since last fall that would warrant any changes to the bill," he said. "My intent would be to get it up and out of the committee pretty quickly."

In a statement, Dodd spokesman Marvin Fast described Dubai-based management of ports as "another case of the outsourcing of our critical infrastructure and security." He said Dodd had worked closely with Banking leaders on last year's bill, which he described as greatly improving the government's process for reviewing and authorizing foreign investment in the U.S.

Similarly, Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who helped lead Democratic criticism of the CFIUS approval of the Dubai Ports World deal, expressed support for the Senate bill opposed by business.

"I thought the bill last year was pretty good," Schumer told The Hill. He said there might be some small changes, but predicted the business community would "calm down" once it realized the legislation is not leading to a slowdown of foreign investment. Schumer added that he has heard few complaints about the Senate bill.

In an interview, Crowley said his sense from business is that it would be better to do nothing than to pass the Senate bill. Maloney agreed that business groups prefer the House bill, which she described as carefully balancing national security with economic security. She said Dodd and other senators might change their views if they hold hearings on CFIUS, and indicated differences could also be addressed in conference.

If Dodd wants to move the 2006 Senate bill to expedite the process and address differences in a conference, Crowley suggested it would be possible to get a final bill. If it indicates the Senate view on policy, however, he said it would be difficult to get a final bill approved.

Dodd acknowledged some business criticism of the 2006 Senate bill, which, unlike the House bill, allowed initial reviews to be stretched to 60 days and required that certain congressional committees be notified of a CFIUS review once one is launched.

Business groups argue this could politicize reviews, and the executive director of the Emergency Committee on American Trade, Cal Cohen, said it could also serve as a roadmap showing other countries how to block U.S. investments in their countries. The House bill only allows 30-day reviews, and does not notify congressional committees until after the conclusion of a second-stage investigation, held only for deals that trigger serious national-security concerns.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Government Sued Over Citizenship Delays (NSDY/AP)

By Juliana Barbassa, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 9, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- Eight immigrants who have waited years for their citizenship applications to clear tougher post-9/11 background checks claim in a lawsuit filed Thursday that the delays violate their constitutional rights of due process.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco and names the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security among the defendants. It seeks to enforce regulations in which the federal government must act on a citizenship application within 120 days of the applicant's interview.

The eight immigrants cleared traditional criminal background checks and other requirements only to see their applications bogged down by federal immigration officials' process of checking names against an FBI database, the plaintiffs' attorneys said.

"The system is broken, and it's time to fix it," said Maya Harris, executive director of American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, which filed the lawsuit on behalf of the eight immigrants. Also named as plaintiffs are the Asian Law Caucus and the Council on American-Islamic Relations, San Francisco Bay Area Chapter.

The name checks were adopted before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but only after the attacks did every application go through the process, said Christopher Bentley, spokesman for the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services.

The majority of the 35 million background checks the agency runs every year are cleared within nine months, Bentley said. The others require more research and can take years, he said.

Calls to the FBI were not immediately returned.

Bentley defended the rigorous background checks as vital to national security.

"The American public expects that as an agency we won't grant a benefit such as citizenship to someone who is not qualified," he said. "We will not and do not grant any benefits until all background security clearances have been resolved."

One plaintiff, Sana Jalili of Pakistan, applied for citizenship in December 2003. She gave her fingerprints, passed a criminal background check and completed the final interview in September 2004.

Jalili, 26, said she was told she would be naturalized in three months, at most. She's waited almost three years with no conclusion.

"We are continuously told the same message, that my name has gone for a background check," she said. "But how long does it take to complete a simple background check?"

Cecillia D. Wang, senior attorney with the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project, said a faster approval process would improve national security.

"If there are lawful permanent residents who pose a security risk, the government should discover that quickly and get to the bottom of any possible problems," Wang said.

Three other lawsuits are pending around the country asking the government to act on citizenship applications within 120 days of the last interview.

Immigration officials now conduct name checks before interviews, following the letter of the law but violating applicants' due process rights, said Sin Yen Ling, staff attorney with the Asian Law Caucus.

The suit asks for a time limit for name checks and a speedy review of the plaintiffs' own applications.

Green-card Holders File Suit Over "name Check" Delay (SFC)

By Matthai Chakko Kuruvila

San Francisco Chronicle, February 9, 2007

(02-08) 13:43 PST SAN FRANCISCO -- Green-card holders who've waited years for a mysterious "F.B.I. name check" to clear them for citizenship filed a lawsuit today in San Francisco, hoping to speed the process for themselves and others.

The eight plaintiffs, including residents of San Francisco and Fremont, had successfully completed the interview process and cleared criminal background checks before being told their names would have to clear a post-Sept. 11 procedure referred to as the "name check."

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services regulations entitle citizenship applicants to hear back about their applications within 120 days of their interviews, but all of the plaintiffs had waited more than two years.

"Our clients deserve to get out of the limbo that the government agencies have created," said Cecillia Wang, senior staff attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union's Immigrant's Rights Project, which is handling the case with the Asian Law Caucus and the Council on American-Islamic Relations. '

The lawsuit, which the ACLU hopes will be certified as a class action, is the fourth of its kind around the country to address similar issues.

A case filed in Los Angeles last year was voluntarily dismissed after eleven of the 12 plaintiffs were given citizenship.

Another filed last summer in Brooklyn on behalf of mostly elderly and disabled green card holders, who were denied social security benefits because of their lack of U.S. citizenship, and a fourth case in Chicago are still pending, according to Wang.

"I know that many other people, like me, have this problem," said San Francisco resident Yinan Zhang, 32, who has waited five years for his name to clear the name check. "I hope this lawsuit can help them to become United States citizens."

Suit Seeks To End Citizenship Delays (ALTS)

By Michele R. Marcucci, STAFF WRITER

Alameda Times-Star, February 9, 2007

When Sana Jalili of Fremont first applied for United States citizenship in December 2003, everything seemed to be going well.

Jalili, who came to the U.S. from Pakistan on her parents' work visas at age 15 and became a legal permanent resident in 2001, aced her citizenship test and interview, and made it through criminal background checks without a problem. In September 2004, an officer with U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services told her she would receive notice of her oath ceremony within three months.

But more than two years later, the 26-year-old mother of two and information technology specialist is still waiting, held up by a "name check" requirement that has left perhaps thousands of would-be citizens in limbo.

So Jalili and seven other Bay Area residents are suing the government in federal court, seeking answers and their citizenship.

"America is the only home I know. There's no other place I would want to live other than here. It is extremely important to me that I become a full participating citizen of this country," she told a room full of reporters on Thursday.

Jalili and the other plaintiffs, who live in Fremont, Richmond and San Francisco, have each waited more than two years for that right, because name checks conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on them are not yet complete. The suit argues that Citizenship and Immigration Services has just 120 days to do the work, and that they should adhere to that timeline.

The delay has left Jalili waiting for the right to vote and has made it difficult for her family to travel together, she said. Her husband and children are U.S. citizens, she said. She would also like to be able to apply for government interpreter positions, the suit says.

Other plaintiffs said in the suit that they have missed out on time with family living overseas due to travel restrictions they face as non-citizens, as well as work opportunities and government aid for the aged and disabled because of the waits. Several contacted their local members of Congress, to no avail.

One of those contacted, Rep. Pete Stark, D-Fremont, said he wants the problem fixed.

"People should not have to wait for years to learn the outcome of their citizenship or security clearance applications," Stark said. "Congress should allocate additional resources to enable the FBI to eliminate its backlog and expeditiously conduct all background checks."

The suit, filed by local chapters of the American Civil Liberties Union and Council on American-Islamic Relations and also the Asian Law Caucus, is one of several such suits filed across the country. Attorneys said Thursday that they know of more than 100 people in the Bay Area facing similar problems. They are seeking class action status.

Spokespersons for Citizenship and Immigration Services said they couldn't comment directly on the suit. But they said only a small fraction of applicants for permanent residence and citizenship -- less than 1 percent -- are delayed more than six months.

And they said Americans expect them to take security seriously.

"We feel the American public expects that we will not approve applications for important benefits like citizenship and permanent residence until the background checks are complete," San Francisco-based spokeswoman Sharon Rummery said.

But such thoroughness wasn't always the case, another spokesman admitted.

In the past, the agency's predecessor, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, would wait 60 days for the name checks to come back from the FBI, and would proceed with naturalization and permanent resident, or "green card," applications even if they didn't come back, CIS spokesman Chris Bentley said. Now, the agency waits until the checks are completed, no matter how long they take, he said.

Bentley said several other things have changed since the Sept. 11 attacks, including a new focus on national security and also additional databases for federal agents to consider before completing a check.

And he said the checks have been extended to even visitors to the U.S., greatly expanding the number of people being checked. Last year, some 35 million people were checked; fewer than 1.3 million of them had applied for a green card or naturalization.

Although most searches yield no hits, a fraction of those that do must be meticulously analyzed, FBI special agent Joseph Schadler said. A team of about 100 people comb through files scattered in offices and warehouses throughout the country, trying to determine if, say, a John Smith mentioned in one case is the same John Smith submitting an application today.

Depending on the complexity, each case can take years to resolve.

"It's better to take a little longer and be as accurate as possible," he said, noting a mistake could get someone wrongly deported or forever barred from citizenship.

In April 2006, the citizenship agency set a new policy requiring the checks to take place before someone is interviewed for citizenship. Attorneys said the agency did this to dodge the 120-day requirement; the agency denied that charge.

Some attorneys representing those caught in this system said they're concerned it could be targeting Muslims and people from the Middle East and Southeast Asian.

Heena Musabji, a staff attorney with the Council on American-Islamic Relations in Chicago, which has also sued the government over the delays, said her agency has heard about 203 delay cases in the Chicago area so far; the majority of those waiting are Muslim, and the majority are male. Her group asked the government for more information on those facing delays.

But Bentley said the agency doesn't discriminate.

"There's no credence to that allegation," he said.

The suit names Bentley's agency and its parent, the Department of Homeland Security, as well as San Francisco CIS District Director David Still, agency head Emilio Gonzalez, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, FBI Director Robert Mueller III and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Chertoff Defends Bush's 2008 Budget Proposal (WP)

By Daniela Deane

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

President Bush's proposed $35 billion budget for the Department of Homeland Security next year is "simply inadequate," a top House Democrat told Secretary Michael Chertoff today, even though he acknowledged that solving the agency's many problems wasn't just about throwing more money at it.

Chertoff, in his first appearance before the Democratic-controlled Congress, responded that the administration's proposed Homeland Security budget for 2008 is "sound, sensible and ample" and reflects the president's "strong commitment" to protecting the United States.

Rep. David Price (D-N.C.), chairman of the House homeland security appropriations subcommittee , began his comments by reciting a laundry list of what was wrong with the department, including what he said were some of the most demoralized employees in the federal government and "devastation that still looks fresh" in areas ravaged by Hurricane Katrina a year and a half ago.

"I'm not saying the department's troubles can be solved simply by throwing more money at them," Price said, but he added that "some areas of your proposed budget are simply inadequate."

Price said that the additional $447 million asked for next year represented an increase of only one percent over this year.

Chertoff responded that the budget represented an eight percent increase over this year and that this was a time for "prudence from a fiscal standpoint."

In his opening statement to the committee, Chertoff defended the recently-created department, saying the Department of Defense took 40 years to "get configured properly and the first secretary of defense committed suicide."

Answering questions about whether federal aid for the department should be spread evenly throughout the country, Chertoff responded that the department should be "risk-based in funding."

Democratic and Republican congressmen pointed out to Chertoff that in recent days their committee had heard "troublesome" testimony from the Government Accountability Office and the Homeland Security department's own inspector general criticizing the department's responsiveness and openness.

Chertoff responded that committee members could count on him to communicate their expectations to his senior managers.

New York City To Test Ways To Prevent Nuclear Terror (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0129941

By Eric Lipton

New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — New York City is about to become a laboratory to test ways of strengthening the nation's defenses against a terror attack by a nuclear device or a radioactive "dirty bomb."

Starting this spring, the Bush administration will assess new detection machines at a Staten Island port terminal that are designed to screen cargo and automatically distinguish between naturally occurring radiation and critical bomb-building ingredients.

And later this year, the federal government plans to begin setting up an elaborate network of radiation alarms at some bridges, tunnels, roadways and waterways into New York, creating a 50-mile circle around the city.

The effort, which could be expanded to other cities if proven successful, is a major shift of focus for the Department of Homeland Security. As it finishes installing the first generation of radiation scanners at the nation's ports and land border crossings, the department is trying to find ways to stop a plot that would use a weapon built within the United States.

"How do you create deterrence against terrorism?" said Vayl S. Oxford, director of the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, the Homeland Security agency coordinating the work. "You complicate the ability for the terrorist to do what they want."

But even as the new campaign begins, some members of Congress and antiterrorism experts are raising concerns that the initiative, like previous Homeland Security programs, could prove extraordinarily costly and provide few security gains.

"This is just total baloney," said Tara O'Toole, a former assistant secretary at the Department of Energy during the Clinton administration, where she oversaw nuclear weapons safety efforts. "They are forgetting that no matter what type of engineering solution they try in good faith to come up with, this is a thinking enemy and they will look for a way around it."

While Homeland Security officials repeatedly declined to estimate the costs of a nationwide detection system, agency documents show they might spend more than a billion dollars on the cargo-screening equipment alone.

Local officials in New York are sparring with Homeland Security over a plan to immediately transfer to local and state authorities the burden of maintaining and operating the network of detection machines when it is completed within several years.

"We are concerned they will put money forward for a piece of hardware and then move to another project," said Raymond W. Kelly, New York City's police commissioner. He added that while the city supports the plan, he is not convinced that the proposed detection network makes sense. "Whether or not it works, whether or not it causes too many false alarms, which causes a whole other set of problems, all of these things are still to be determined," he said.

Mr. Oxford said he is aware of the concerns about costs, which is still the subject of negotiations, and the performance of the new detection machines. But with a threat like a nuclear attack, the country cannot afford to wait until all the details are worked out, he said.

"Our philosophy is not to wait for perfection, because perfection never comes," he said.

The Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, among the newest agencies at Homeland Security, was established in April 2005, in response to criticism that efforts to combat nuclear terrorism were too disorganized.

The office focuses on blocking two types of plots: a nuclear weapon or a dirty bomb. A nuclear attack by terrorists is considered unlikely, because of the difficulty of obtaining the required radioactive materials, such as highly enriched uranium.

The detonation of a dirty bomb is considered much more feasible. It only requires dynamite or another conventional explosive to detonate a widely available radioactive source — like the cesium or cobalt in certain medical devices. The blast might cause injuries or deaths, but the radioactive residue would cover a two- to three-block area and not pose an immediate health threat. Possible panic and economic disruption could be among the most serious consequences, experts say.

The Securing the Cities detection network, as the New York experiment is called, is intended to stop a nuclear or radiological threat as far away from a city as possible. "Detecting it in the core of Manhattan is too late," Mr. Oxford said.

The network would most likely include truck inspection stations along highways approaching New York, which would be equipped with radiation detection devices, agency budget documents say. Devices might also be installed at highway tollbooths and at spots where rail, boat and subway traffic could be monitored.

The detection equipment, some of which would be mobile, would be electronically connected and monitored so if a suspicious vehicle passed one spot without being stopped, it might be intercepted after passing another detector.

Some New York agencies already have a limited supply of radiation detection equipment, but the new system would be much more extensive and go much further outside the city.

Mr. Kelly said that the city would, at least initially, use any new detection equipment to screen vehicles heading into Lower Manhattan. The project would complement a city program to install cameras, license plate readers and devices that can block vehicle traffic, creating a "ring of steel" around the financial district.

The actual design of the Homeland Security system and the protocols for how responses to alarms will be handled, are still being negotiated by federal officials and authorities in New York City, New Jersey, Connecticut and New York state.

Benn H. Tannenbaum, a physicist and nuclear terrorism expert at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in Washington, said the system would never create anything close to an impenetrable barrier, particularly for a nuclear bomb, since the required ingredients have low levels of radioactivity and can easily be shielded. But the project still might be worthwhile, he said. “If nothing else, it makes the terrorist think twice before they do something like this,” he said.

Ms. O’Toole, the former Department of Energy official, pointed to Homeland Security’s BioWatch program, set up in about 30 cities in 2003 to monitor the air for a possible biological attack.

The equipment was installed quickly, but there was no detailed plan in place for how to respond to positive alarms, which meant three weeks of confusion among Houston authorities in October 2003, after tularemia, a naturally occurring pathogen, was discovered. “There is this disconnect between these grand schemes for technology and reality,” Ms. O’Toole said.

Laura S. H. Holgate, vice president at the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a Washington-based research group, said the government should put far more energy into a global effort to prevent nuclear materials from getting into the hands of terrorists.

The testing planned on Staten Island at the New York Container Terminal is intended to police concerns about false alarms.

Three sets of new types of detection machines have been installed there. For the first time, such machines sound an alarm when something radioactive passes through, and simultaneously identify the radioactive isotope. That allows officials to distinguish between innocuous items that can emit low levels of radiation, such as granite or kitty litter, and real threats.

Officials at the Government Accountability Office and some members of Congress are concerned that Homeland Security is moving too quickly to buy the new machines. Initial tests have shown them to be not much more effective than existing machines that are a fraction of the cost.

“We know this system is going to be expensive,” said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee. “We need to be sure it will perform as promised.”

Ramsey Hired To Provide Anti-Terrorism Advice (WP)

By Sari Horwitz

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Former D.C. police chief Charles H. Ramsey has been hired to study ways to make the U.S. Capitol more secure against a potential terrorist attack.

Ramsey, who stepped down in December after nearly nine years as chief, got the Capitol job through a longtime colleague, Terrance W. Gainer, the U.S. Senate's sergeant-at-arms. Gainer is a former Capitol Police chief and once was Ramsey's second-in-command at the police department. Their ties stretch back to their days with the Chicago police force.

Gainer said Ramsey will work part time with him to put an improved security plan in place. He is scheduled to begin work in a week to 10 days, Gainer said.

"The chief has agreed to come up and assist myself and the police board to further develop our anti-terrorism measures on the Hill," Gainer said in an interview. "We are crying out for a guy with Chuck Ramsey's skills and knowledge of the terrorism situation."

Ramsey already has a security clearance, "knows the city inside and out, knows the extent of the terrorism threat and understands how to counter it," Gainer said.

Gainer and other Senate officials are working through final details on the contract, including his pay, he said. The contract is one of several part-time projects Ramsey could soon be undertaking.

Ramsey said he also might be hired to provide security expertise to the D.C. Convention Center.

"I'm looking forward to it," Ramsey said of his work with the Capitol. "I want to continue to make a contribution. It's an opportunity to help Terry, and there are few things that are more visible in terms of a symbol of our country than the nation's Capitol."

Ramsey said he has received calls from several companies that want to hire him.

"I've certainly had a few offers," Ramsey said. "I want to listen and see what's out there. I'm taking it a step at a time. I want to stay local, stay involved and continue to make a contribution. The city has been good to me. And I enjoyed it here, that's for sure."

Ramsey, 56, the District's longest-serving chief in more than three decades of home rule, has said for months that he wanted to remain in law enforcement. In November, soon after being elected mayor, Adrian M. Fenty (D) announced plans to replace Ramsey with Cathy L. Lanier, 39, a 16-year veteran and Ramsey protege. Lanier took over in late December.

Last night, Ramsey was feted at a retirement party at the Mandarin Oriental Hotel attended by Fenty, Lanier, former Mayor Anthony A. Williams and other city leaders, as well as scores of local and federal law enforcement officials from throughout the Washington area.

"To me, chief Ramsey will always be the super chief," Williams said. "There are business leaders here, political leaders . . . people from all corners of the city. I rest my case."

More than 500 tickets were sold for the event at $75 each. Nine speakers toasted the former chief, including David Friedman, director of law enforcement initiatives for the Anti-Defamation League.

Friedman said Ramsey did much for the city during his tenure. Often on television and radio, Ramsey became a celebrity of sorts, recognized throughout the city. Only this week, Friedman said, he and Ramsey were finishing lunch when they were greeted by two city residents who wanted to express their gratitude to Ramsey.

"The chief was surprised by that," Friedman said in his speech. "But there are thousands and thousands of people in this community who would like the opportunity to thank you."

U.S. Air Marshal Service Navigates Turbulent Times (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler, Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

On Sept. 11, 2001, the Federal Air Marshal Service -- an undercover squad trained to stop or kill hijackers on U.S. carriers -- consisted of just 33 agents scattered on more than 26,000 daily flights around the globe.

None were aboard any of the hijacked planes on 9/11. Six days later, Congress passed legislation calling for a massive expansion of the law-enforcement service as part of the nation's mobilization against terrorism. More than 200,000 people applied to become agents. Soon, thousands of recruits were quietly training in hand-to-hand combat, advanced marksmanship and techniques for discreetly defusing onboard disturbances without ever identifying themselves as marshals.

The service swelled to a current force somewhere between an estimated 2,500 and 4,000. (The exact number of marshals is classified.) Their presence, combined with new provisions allowing U.S. pilots to carry guns in the cockpit, has changed the equation of onboard security. Would-be terrorists now must enter into their calculations a fair chance that a fellow passenger is a well-trained policeman concealing a semiautomatic weapon.

But building and maintaining the force in recent years has been an uneasy ride. Marshals have griped that it's unhealthy flying four or more flights a day and say the job is a monotonous rut that doesn't lead to advancement. Another big complaint: Their cover can be easily blown, particularly when they go through special boarding procedures.

Budget issues led to a hiring freeze, and in some cases resulted in heavier schedules and fewer flights covered. Government oversight bodies, including the House Judiciary Committee and Homeland Security's Inspector General, raised concerns as to whether the marshals were able to do their jobs effectively.

Some marshals say many of their colleagues have quit, although agency officials say defections have been minimal. But Dana Brown, the current director, concedes that the program's $700 million budget wasn't enough to sustain any new hires between July 2002 and fall 2006.

In an interview, Mr. Brown said the agency challenges are largely due to growing pains. "It's the equivalent of having a mom-and-pop or good small business that worked very well and overnight it turned into a large Fortune 500-type corporation with many more issues than it had previously," he said. Mr. Brown is now taking steps to address the marshals' complaints.

The job is a stressful mixture of tedium and high pressure. Marshals have made 59 arrests since 2001 and drawn their weapons only twice -- once shooting a man dead. In the end, none of the incidents were found to be related to terrorism.

Last summer, their secretive operations came into rare public view after Northwest Airlines Flight 42 lifted off from Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport on Aug. 23 for a nearly nine-hour flight to Mumbai, India. Less than two weeks earlier, British authorities had foiled an alleged trans-Atlantic airliner bombing plot, and officials were on high alert.

A group of 11 Indian passengers on Flight 42 attracted the attention of flight attendants and one undercover marshal when they allegedly didn't follow crew member instructions while boarding. Shortly after the DC-10 left the runway, one of the Indian men allegedly handed several cellphones to another, while a third member of the group appeared to be deliberately obstructing the view of what was happening.

Within minutes, as the plane continued to climb, three air marshals on board broke cover and took control of the cabin, moving into the aisles, revealing badges and assuming defensive positions -- according to an internal Federal Air Marshal Service report on the incident and accounts from passengers and crew. A pair of Dutch F-16 fighter jets scrambled to escort the plane back to Amsterdam. Half an hour after takeoff, Flight 42 touched back down, and the Indian men were detained by Netherlands law enforcement.

The incident was a classic demonstration of the marshals' daunting, and often imprecise, task. A potentially dangerous situation was defused with no injuries. But in the end, there had been no security risk at all. The cellphones were just cellphones. All of the suspects were quickly released. Some passengers, particularly Indian nationals, believed the marshals overreacted to plainly innocent conduct.

"We were not passing cellphones," said Shakil Chhotani, a 33-year-old Mumbai exporter of women's garments who was among the arrested men. "Just because one of us was wearing kurta pajamas and four or five of us had a beard, they thought we were terrorists."

Mr. Brown backed up his officers' actions. "I'm comfortable that the federal air marshals did exactly what they thought they should do under the circumstances," he said, noting that the decision was made in consultation with the crew.

President Kennedy launched the air-marshal program in 1961, in response to a wave of hijackings of U.S. flights to Cuba. In the years prior to 9/11, its ranks rose and fell, amid various threat levels and bureaucratic shuffling. Today, after obtaining top-secret security clearance, marshals undergo 15 weeks of preparation for the job, divided between facilities in Artesia, N.M., and Atlantic City, N.J. Each is issued a Sig Sauer sidearm, a small but powerful, Swiss-designed weapon popular in law enforcement.

They are trained to shoot in small areas that replicate airline cabins, practicing with low-powered paint balls. They drill repeatedly through scenarios they might encounter.

The flying force is more than 95% male, and includes recruits from the Secret Service, the Border Patrol, the Bureau of Prisons and the military. The full-time positions pay salaries starting at about $36,000 and average just under $62,000 a year, with a premium for working in certain cities. Marshals travel in teams of at least two, often sitting in first class to be near the cockpit door. Routes considered to be high-risk are given priority.

At the Mission Operations Center outside Washington, stars dot a digital map of the U.S. looming large over the control room, each one representing a plane with a marshal on board. Officials here relay intelligence to marshals in the field and are poised to redeploy marshals if need be.

While marshals train for the most dangerous criminal scenarios, the job is usually uneventful. Many spend their hours in the sky reading. At the same time, they must stay constantly alert.

Marshals say that after flying four or more flights in a single day, they experience fatigue, headaches, and other maladies. Compounding their frustrations, marshals -- mostly in their 20s and 30s -- have little opportunity to advance in or diversify their careers. "Federal air marshals cannot sustain a career in an airborne position, based on such factors as the frequency of flying, their irregular schedules, and the monotony of flying repetitive assignments," the Government Accountability Office concluded in November 2005 report.

Since the post-9/11 expansion, marshals have protested that their anonymity hasn't been adequately protected. Agents are required to check in at airport ticket counters, and in most cases display oversized credentials. Until recently, a jacket-and-tie dress code was mandated on all flights, even those filled with tourists headed for Disney World. They also were instructed to stay in designated hotels, where they had to display their marshal credentials to secure a discounted rate.

To bypass security checkpoints, where notice would obviously be taken of their guns, marshals typically enter concourses through the exit lanes. But they often wait for several minutes while a security guard checks their IDs -- a process that sometimes draws attention from passengers. In some cases, they must enter via alarmed exit doors. "The lights and sirens go off. Everyone turns and looks," one marshal said in an interview.

At the gate, at least one marshal must board the plane 10 or 15 minutes before passengers to check for hidden weapons and meet briefly with the crew. Marshals report being thanked and given the "thumbs up" from passengers who had obviously figured out who they were.

"Without anonymity, an air marshal is reduced to a target that need only be ambushed and eliminated or an obstacle that can be easily avoided," wrote former air marshal William Meares in a letter resigning from the service in 2004. "There is no question that terrorists, using known tactics and methods, can easily determine whether or not a particular flight is covered by air marshals."

Don Strange, the agent formerly in charge of the Atlanta field office, says he repeatedly complained about the stuffy dress code -- internally and to the House Judiciary Committee. "My views were not well received," he said in an interview. Mr. Strange was subsequently dismissed, in October 2005. The Federal Air Marshal Service wouldn't comment on Mr. Strange's termination.

Federal law prohibits marshals from unionizing. But in 2003, mounting discontent prompted them to organize and seek affiliation with the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association. That gave them a unified voice to deal with management. In October 2003, Frank Terreri, the group's newly elected president, wrote to the agency's then-director, Thomas Quinn, complaining about issues including boarding procedures, dress code, transfer policy and scheduling. In the spring of 2004, the House Judiciary Committee launched its investigation into the service.

Mr. Quinn, a retired Secret Service agent who took over the service a few months after 9/11, told the committee that the problems were exaggerated and that complainers were "disgruntled amateurs" who were bringing the whole organization down.

In February 2006, Mr. Quinn retired from the federal government. Three months later, the Judiciary Committee issued its findings, saying that Mr. Quinn included "factual inaccuracies" in his responses to the committee. The committee also concluded that the check-in and boarding procedures were "unacceptable to ensuring the anonymity of Federal Air Marshals" and criticized the formal dress code and hotel policy.

Now a private security consultant, Mr. Quinn dismissed the report. In an interview, he called those who voiced complaints "insurgents" and "organizational terrorists."

So far, few marshals or security experts believe that the tensions inside the agency have affected the performance of the agents' flights or their judgment in the most critical question they face: when to blow cover and intervene in a situation on board. The decision is more art than science. One air marshal says that officers get drawn into onboard conflicts so often they seem more like in-flight security guards. Says another: "You have to wait until it seems bad before you do anything. You're not a bouncer."

False alarms are sometimes inevitable. Marshals must quickly judge if suspicious behavior is criminal or just odd. They also have to weigh the need to remain undercover as long as possible against the needs of passengers who might be under distress.

"We don't want to ... be drawn out only to find out there was a situation designed specifically for that purpose and now our presence, our positions have been compromised," says Mr. Brown. But even if a situation is not necessarily life-threatening, "We're not going to let anyone get hurt on that aircraft."

In the first of the two incidents when marshals drew their weapons, in August 2002, an agent held the entire coach section of a Delta flight to Philadelphia at gunpoint while his partner restrained an unruly passenger. Once the plane landed, the disruptive passenger and a second flier were detained by authorities but later released and not charged.

The second came in December 2005, when Rigoberto Alpizar, a 44-year-old paint salesman from Maitland, Fla., frantically ran off an American Airlines flight about to leave Miami, with his backpack strapped to his chest. "I'm going to blow up this bomb," he said as he reached into the pack, according to two air marshals who were on board.

When the man, later determined to have been mentally ill, advanced toward the marshals, they shot him nine times, killing him. State prosecutors later concluded that the shooting was legally justified. Calls to Mr. Alpizar's widow, Anne Buechner, weren't returned.

After Flight 42 from Amsterdam, the air marshal service's investigative and training divisions reviewed the incident, according to standard policy, and determined that it had been properly handled, according to a federal official familiar with the process. "It was textbook, that was really the bottom line," the official said.

Mr. Brown, a 25-year veteran of the U.S. Secret Service, took over after Mr. Quinn's retirement. He initially saw the complaints from marshals much as his former boss had. But soon after taking office, he began inviting marshals to small dinners in Washington, and soon came to a different understanding. In July, he sent an email to all air marshals. "Candidly, the morale was much worse than I thought," he wrote.

Mr. Brown has begun taking steps to deal with some of the discord. In August, he loosened the dress code, instructing marshals to "dress at your discretion." A new pilot program allows them to check in for flights at airports using kiosks, rather than ticket counters. The marshals are also free to choose their own hotels. Mr. Brown has set up 29 working groups to address such matters as scheduling and promotions. He's also opened up a dialogue with the officers' association, meeting with its leaders to hear their complaints.

Still, he said he hasn't found a way to change the boarding procedures. In a December memo, he noted that the agency was able to reach its hiring goal for the year, but didn't specify how many new marshals were recruited.

Meanwhile, some marshals who had been highly critical of management "are more optimistic that things are going to get better," says Mr. Terreri.

Resistance Rises To US Law That Requires Stricter ID Standards (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

States from Maine to Montana are rebelling against a federal law meant to make driver's licenses a definitive form of identification, an issue that cuts across flash points of homeland security, civil liberties, and illegal immigration.

Legislators in 15 states are pushing bills and resolutions that urge noncompliance with the 2005 Real ID Act. The law, based on recommendations by the 9/11 commission, sets minimum standards for verifying the identity of license applicants, and stipulates what information must be stored on machine-readable cards.

The law is intended to make it harder for terrorists to operate on American soil and for illegal immigrants to get legitimate employment in the US.

But as the 2008 deadline for implementation nears, the Real ID law is raising a host of concerns: cost, hassle for millions of drivers, and fear that government or private industry will misuse the data network. Opponents as divergent as states' rights politicians, civil libertarians, and immigration advocates are rallying to undo it.

"When we call around the country, we get Democrats to join [against it], we get Republicans. In one state, they were fighting to see which party was going to file the [anti-Real ID] legislation," says James Guest (R), a state representative in Missouri. He is at the center of a loose coalition of lawmakers in 34 states who are filing measures opposing Real ID.

Maine's legislature fired the opening salvo last month in adopting a resolution of noncompliance – a position that, if carried out, could eventually impair Mainers' ability to easily board airplanes, open bank accounts, or enter federal buildings. The Montana House went further by actually prohibiting implementation.

Frustration over "a large unfunded mandate" is the first complaint of Massachusetts state Sen. Richard Moore (D), who has filed a noncompliance resolution similar to one in New Mexico.

Such lawmaker concerns stem from a September study by state government associations that put the price tag for implementing the Real ID law at $11 billion – much more than the $100 million Congress had estimated. So far, Congress has allocated $40 million to the project.

To arrive at that figure, the study assumed that everyone with a driver's license – all 245 million of them – must be recredentialed within five years of May 2008, the federal deadline for compliance. That would require each individual to visit a division of motor vehicles (DMV), paperwork in hand, and mandates the DMV to verify each identification document with the agency that issued it. There are about 16,000 issuers of birth certificates alone.

"States will feel the wrath of the driving public," says Senator Moore. "Our hope is [that], with the change in the majority in Congress, ... folks [will] take another look at it ... or come up with the money."

Opponents in the US Senate say they will press for changes to the law.

One congressional backer of Real ID, Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R) of Wisconsin, says delays at the Department of Homeland Security in drafting the regulations have led people to jump to wrong conclusions about cost and intent.

"They're seeing this as a national ID card. It's a case of the far left and the far right joining in the middle. It's not a national ID card," he says. "Those that are talking about $11 billion are Chicken Little types saying that the sky is falling.... Until the regulations are finalized, they don't know exactly what they need to do."

Homeland Security plans to release the regulations in coming weeks. All eyes are on a few specifics, such as how identification documents will be verified by DMVs and whether the cards will be required to include fingerprints or other biometrics.

Mr. Sensenbrenner and other Real ID supporters say the law tightens a system that allowed some of the 9/11 hijackers to get driver's licenses, and thereby board planes, despite being in the US illegally. It also is expected to curb the hiring of illegal immigrants who rely on fake driver's licenses to feign legal residency.

"Congress needs to stand its ground. Driver's licenses are our de facto national ID system, but ... it's decentralized," says Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington think tank that advocates low immigration levels. "States have to meet certain minimum standards."

The ID system will not create new federal or private databases, says a Homeland Security spokesman. It will require only that states' driver's license databases can talk to one another so that drivers can't obtain multiple IDs in many states.

But civil libertarians argue that 50 interconnected state databases are not tangibly different from one national database. Their concern is that the US government would use the standardized licenses to cross-reference against other databases – and that people would be tracked by Uncle Sam at every turn.

There are concerns, too, that private companies could use them to build databases.

The information to be contained on the cards is valuable, says Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Everybody and their uncle is going to want to 'swipe' that information off the card," he says. Existing shields on releasing motor vehicle information will be undermined, he says, if the machine- readable cards are not encrypted. Sensenbrenner says he supports encrypting the cards; Homeland Security won't comment.

Under Real ID, licenses must have valid names, home addresses, birth dates, signatures, and high-quality photographs.

Privacy experts worry that businesses other than bars and airports will ask people to electronically swipe their ID cards. Privacy laws must be expanded first, some say, because this ID system would increase the damage from identity theft.

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Congress Set To Clash Over Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

The White House is likely to face its most significant confrontation with Congress so far over its handling of the Iraq war after House Democrats agreed on Thursday on plans to debate a simple resolution next week that would oppose the escalation of the war but express support for funding the troops already on the ground.

Agreement on the non-binding resolution could attract the support of disaffected Republicans and enable a symbolic bipartisan expression of no confidence in the Iraq policy. The shift of focus to the House comes after the Senate Republican leadership this week stymied debate on a non-binding Iraq war resolution by exploiting procedural motions.

Steny Hoyer, House majority leader, said Democrats had stepped up oversight of Iraq policy holding 22 oversight hearings over Iraq and Afghanistan in the past four weeks, and would next week hold three days of debate on Iraq. “Frankly, for four years the Congress has been complacent and complicit, therefore, in the policies that have been pursued. We have not conducted vigorous oversight, and we have not taken Congress’s proper role in the articulation of and setting of policy.”

Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic caucus, said: “At one time they [the administration] said ‘No, this is merely a symbolic vote that has no meaning’, and yet they have fought it tooth-and-nail to ever come to the floor in the Senate. They can’t do that in the House. Clearly, it has an impact because it’s an expression of the House of Representatives, the elected members closest to the American people.”

However, John Boehner, House minority leader, attacked the coming debate as “nothing more than political theatre that means nothing. And I believe that it demoralises our troops in the field.” If Democrats were serious about ending the war they should vote to cut off funding.

Although the Senate Republicans scored a temporary legislative victory in preventing an embarrassing vote against the president, the tactics have split the party. On Wednesday night seven Republican senators wrote to Senate leaders threatening to attach a resolution opposing the surge in troops to any bill sent to the floor in the coming weeks. The group, which includes John Warner, Chuck Hagel, Norm Coleman and Susan Collins, vowed to “explore all of our options under the Senate procedures and practices to ensure a full and open debate”.

While the appearance of obstructionism has damaged the party, Vin Weber, a Republican strategist, said: “There has been no winner, but in the longer run the Democrats incurred a greater loss this week as they demonstrated to the anti-war movement that they were incapable of passing even a non-binding resolution against the war. That will stoke the anti-war movement who will demand they cut off war funding.”

Some Democrats have backed calls for that more aggressive action, but most are reluctant to withdraw funding.

All 435 House Members Can See Iraq Intelligence -- And Talk On Iraq Next Week (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 9, 2007

To the surprise of the Bush administration, the House Intelligence Committee voted unanimously Wednesday night to allow all 435 House members to see the classified version of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq sent to the White House last week. The report is classified in part because it contains information about sources and methods used in intelligence-gathering.

The document will provide fuel for a House debate, scheduled to begin Tuesday, on a resolution of disapproval of President Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq. Remarkably, each House member will be given five minutes to speak. The decision to provide such broad access to the microphones is based on the fact that each member got the chance to speak before the Iraq war began, according to House leadership aides.

In announcing the vote to allow all members access to the classified portion of the NIE, the committee said those examining it "will be required to review the document in the Committee's secure offices in the Capitol and sign a secrecy oath." The members will not be allowed to leave with notes, congressional sources said.

The White House was not informed or consulted about the decision. Such access for members is rare but not unprecedented. The document had been made available to members of several committees with jurisdiction over the intelligence community, but other lawmakers would have needed to request permission to read it. The committee had received written requests from one Republican and one Democrat, plus some other informal inquires, and decided it would be better to allow blanket access instead of voting on each request, congressional sources said.

The report runs about 90 pages, and the Office of the National Intelligence Director released 3 1/2 pages of "Key Judgments" last week. The report, called "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," was approved Jan. 29 by the heads of the government's 16 intelligence agencies. It paints a generally bleak picture of conditions in Iraq and warns that without successful efforts to rein in insurgent violence and political extremism, the overall security situation "will continue to deteriorate" at current rates for the next 12 to 18 months, the period covered by the report.

The decision raised fears among some Republicans that members not used to dealing with classified information might play fast and loose with what they saw. But Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, said in a statement: "It is critical that all Members of Congress understand the consensus view of the Intelligence Community on the gravity of the situation in Iraq and the consequences for U.S. troops and our long-term national security interests."

Democrats Set House Debate To Rebuke Bush Over Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — House Democratic leaders persuaded members of their party on Thursday to limit the scope of an Iraq war resolution next week to a simple repudiation of President Bush's troop buildup plan, hoping to temporarily set aside divisive decisions over war financing and troop redeployments.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, and other party leaders met privately for more than an hour with other Democratic lawmakers. They sought to reassure Democrats that the symbolic, nonbinding resolution devised to rebuke Mr. Bush was a first step — but not a final one — toward asserting Congressional powers on Iraq.

After winning control of Congress, in part because of discontent over the Iraq war, Democrats are eager to send a strong signal of disapproval to the White House. To make the proposal palatable to at least some Republicans, the Democrats said their resolution would express support for the troops, but reject the plan to send 21,500 more of them to Iraq.

The people "called for a new direction," Ms. Pelosi said, "and no place do they want that direction to be more clear than in the war in Iraq."

The three-day House debate, set to begin next Tuesday, comes after consideration of an Iraq war resolution faltered in the Senate. Republicans and Democrats quarreled over a series of competing resolutions but failed to reach a compromise, prompting House leaders to schedule their first major Iraq debate since assuming the majority last month.

A growing number of House Democrats, though, say they believe that time has expired for a symbolic resolution that will have little effect on the White House.

Representative Joe Sestak, Democrat of Pennsylvania, a former three-star admiral who was elected in November, introduced legislation on Thursday calling for American troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the year's end. Under his plan, financing for the American forces in Iraq would expire on Dec. 31.

"The nonbinding resolution is a necessary step, but it's insufficient," Mr. Sestak said in an interview on Thursday. "But even if it's a half-measure, I will take any measure that moves us further down that line."

The discussion in the House, scheduled to last 36 hours, will allow each member to speak for five minutes about Iraq. While Democrats said they would allow Republicans an opportunity to propose an alternative plan, it remained uncertain what kind of latitude Republicans would actually have during the debate.

But Republicans said that, through the course of the debate, they would seek to highlight deep differences among their rivals, whose views range from pulling out troops immediately to cutting financing for new deployments. At the same time, Republicans will ask Democrats why they are taking up a nonbinding resolution instead of actual legislation.

"They are now in the majority," said Representative Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the chairman of the Republican Conference. "They finally have the opportunity to change policy and they are putting up a sense of the Congress resolution, which is worth about as much as the parchment it's printed on."

Still, Mr. Putnam and other party leaders conceded that many Republicans were likely to support the bipartisan resolution, given the growing public dissatisfaction with the war and the administration's decision to expand the military operation in Iraq.

Yet even Republicans who are troubled by the troop buildup plan may not necessarily join the bipartisan resolution, a point underscored this week in the Senate as Republican leaders and the White House campaigned to encourage members of the president's party to keep their objections at bay. The White House is employing similar lobbying efforts in the House. At the closed-door Democratic caucus meeting on Thursday, Representative Jerrold Nadler of New York voiced his support for taking stronger steps to bring an end to American involvement in Iraq. The unanimity inside the caucus, he said, could expire after next week if the party does not exercise its authority to begin drawing down the war.

"The president is not going to listen to anything we have to say," Mr. Nadler said later in an interview. "There's nothing we can do to stop him unless it's the real consequence — the power of the purse."

Representative Carol Shea-Porter, Democrat of New Hampshire, said the stalemate in the Senate had only added to the public's frustration. But she said she was still likely to support the Democratic approach next week, while hoping for more significant legislation in coming weeks.

"It's training wheels for the real thing," Ms. Shea-Porter said of the symbolic resolution. "But it will show us which direction things are going."

Leaders Outline House Iraq Resolution (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

House Democratic leaders announced Thursday that the chamber will take up a comparatively austere resolution next week disapproving of President Bush's Iraq War strategy, and will not rely on legislation now stalled in the Senate.

The resolution, which House leaders said will be released Monday, is expected to consist of two provisions: one expressing general support for the military personnel and a second condemning Bush's proposed increase of 21,500 troops.

"This is an up-or-down vote on the policy enunciated by the president," House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said at a Thursday morning press briefing.

While the House initially had planned to take up the resolution after the Senate had completed work on its version of the bill, progress in that chamber stalled Monday when parliamentary tactics prevented an up-or-down vote on the resolution as Democrats failed to get the 60 votes necessary to end debate and move to the underlying bill.

"This is a case ... where less is more," Emanuel said.

Debate on the bill is scheduled to take begin Tuesday and go through Thursday, with each Member receiving five minutes on the House floor. Republicans will be allowed a vote on one substitute measure but otherwise the bill will be closed to amendments.

"They are going to offer their alternative and we'll have a vote on that," Emanuel said.

House Democrats characterized a Thursday morning Caucus meeting on the resolution as agreeable, with Members largely unified on the simplified resolution.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) reiterated Thursday that the House will consider other measures on the Iraq War in coming months, including funding issues.

"This is just the first step. a first step of many steps available to Congress," Hoyer said, citing the supplemental spending bill the House is set to take up following the Presidents Day recess in late-February, as well as fiscal 2008 spending bills.

In addition, House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) said he has scheduled a hearing, expected to take about 6 hours, in early March to review each of the measures addressing Iraq that has been introduced in the House in the first weeks of the 110th Congress.

House Measure On Iraq To Measure Its Language (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0129950

WASHINGTON -- The House of Representatives next week will confront President Bush with a short, straightforward resolution expressing opposition to his plan to boost troop levels in Iraq.

Forgoing the complex language that tied up the Senate's debate of the war this week, House Democrats said Thursday they will offer a concise measure that expresses support for the troops and opposition to the Bush strategy.

But Democratic leaders billed the nonbinding measure as the beginning of a more expansive campaign to begin forcing an end to the nearly 4-year-old war. "This is the first step, a first step, of many steps available to the Congress as we proceed," said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., echoing words used by the most staunchly anti-war members of the House.

Democratic lawmakers -- including Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., who heads the defense appropriations subcommittee -- have talked of restricting funding for the war.

Reps. Lynn C. Woolsey, D-Calif., Barbara Lee, D-Calif., and Maxine Waters, D-Calif., are pushing legislation to begin a phased withdrawal over the next six months.

And Thursday, Pennsylvania Rep. Joe Sestak, a former three-star admiral who knocked off a Republican incumbent in November, introduced legislation setting a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of the year.

There are now more than 30 pieces of legislation in the House dealing with the war, according to Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., who plans a hearing on them in his Foreign Affairs Committee next month.

Congressional Democrats have promised a vigorous challenge to Bush's leadership of the war since they captured majorities in the House and Senate in November.

But plans for a Senate resolution opposing the addition of 21,500 troops, in part to control sectarian violence in Iraq, foundered this week amid fierce partisan squabbling in the upper chamber.

And Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., ceded leadership of the campaign against the Bush plan to the House, where Democrats hold a more commanding majority.

House Democratic leaders had considered debating the same resolution that stalled in the Senate. That measure -- sponsored by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., and backed by other Republican and Democratic lawmakers -- expounded at length on presidential powers and critiques of the war before urging the president to explore alternative policies.

Rep. Rahm Emmanuel, D-Ill., the No. 4 leader in the House who also quarterbacked the party's 2006 election effort, said Thursday that House Democrats decided to explicitly reject such a nuanced approach.

"This is an up-or-down vote on the policy enunciated by the president," he said. "To make it anything else was to get off the debate that we are having in this country."

Emmanuel said Democrats also will offer Republicans the opportunity to offer one alternative measure.

The gesture appears unlikely to quell partisan tensions in the House. Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, quickly condemned any resolution as "nothing more than political theater that means nothing."

Republicans -- who have consistently cast the Democratic effort as defeatist -- are pushing measures that oppose any cut-off of funds for the troops and lay out a series of benchmarks for the Iraqi government to show that it is cooperating with the American effort.

Twelve years ago, 221 Republicans, including Boehner, backed a nonbinding resolution opposing President Clinton's plans to send 20,000 U.S. forces to Bosnia to enforce the peace there, according to the Congressional Record.

But Republican leaders -- whose caucus is outnumbered 233-202 -- acknowledge they stand little chance of stopping the Democratic resolution.

"We're going to have to face whatever they cram down our throats," Rep. Adam H. Putnam, R-Fla., said outside the House chamber.

Democrats plan a vote Thursday after three days of debate.

House Democrats Reach Accord On Debate Over War Resolution (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

House Democrats agreed yesterday to debate a straightforward, nonbinding resolution that rejects President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, but they will also allow Republicans to bring their own war-related measure to the floor.

The House debate is set to begin Tuesday and will continue for at least three days, with all lawmakers offered five-minute speaking slots. Unlike the more complicated Senate version, which has run into a Republican-erected procedural roadblock, the House Democratic resolution will make two basic points.

"It will express our strong support of our troops -- not only those who are at the point of the spear and at risk in Afghanistan and in Iraq, but our strong support of the troops who are here, ready to be deployed, to be trained, to be equipped properly," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

"It will also then express our disagreement with the president's proposal to increase the numbers of troops," Hoyer said.

Democrats will allow Republicans to offer alternative language, and House GOP leaders said they are considering two possible approaches. One is a resolution declaring that Congress will not cut off funding for U.S. troops. The other would establish a bipartisan panel to monitor Bush's new strategy in Iraq, including the troop increase. It would also offer benchmarks for Iraqis to meet, to show they are fulfilling their commitments to assuming greater responsibility for the war.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Republicans will make a final decision after the Democratic resolution is officially unveiled, which may not happen until Monday. "I want to see what the Democrats are going to put on the floor," he told Republicans yesterday.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a sharp critic of the war and chairman of a subcommittee that oversees defense funding, is separately preparing language to block money for the additional troops in Iraq unless the military meets certain readiness standards. He said he will introduce his proposal on March 15 as an attachment to Bush's request for Iraq war funding.

"The hope is we will affect the surge," Murtha said of Bush's plan to deploy more troops in Iraq. He stressed that increasing troops in Iraq means diverting resources from Afghanistan. "Afghanistan is a forgotten war," he said. "It started there, and it should have stayed there."

In the Senate, the resolution debate remained stalled, despite a bid by some Republican senators to revive it before a week-long recess that begins Feb. 17. Democrats and some Republicans had rallied behind a nonbinding resolution authored by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that would expresses disapproval of Bush's troop plan. But all but two Republicans voted to block the resolution from advancing, to protest what GOP leaders considered to be unfair procedural terms.

Seven Republicans, including Warner and other GOP co-sponsors, released a letter Wednesday night announcing they would "explore all of our options" under Senate rules to reignite the debate.

Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) wrote to Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) yesterday affirming their desire to begin debating the resolution, but they reiterated their demand for consideration of a GOP alternative that opposes withholding funds for the troop increase.

Although that resolution would also be nonbinding, many Democrats don't want to touch the funding issue, regardless of their position on the war.

Senate Democrats scoffed at Warner's letter vowing to force the Senate to consider his resolution. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) called it "a giant mea culpa." Reid said: "We know Republicans have their misgivings about what they did." Referring to the House, he added, "They're going to send us something late next week, and we'll be back on Iraq before you know it."

House Leaders Plan For Vote On Iraq Resolution Next Week (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — House Democratic leaders prepared for a war policy debate next week that is likely to end in a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop numbers in Iraq.

There will be three days of debate on the resolution, beginning Tuesday. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said the measure will be "simple and concise," expressing support for U.S. troops but opposition to the president's plan to send 21,500 more of them to Iraq.

Democrats are trying to generate the broadest possible support for the resolution. House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, acknowledged "there are Republicans in the House and Senate who are skeptical of the president's plan, that's no secret."

Bush hasn't made a public effort to fight next week's vote. White House spokesman Tony Snow said some members of Congress might find presidential intervention "unwelcome."

Supporters of Bush's war plan have urged the White House to respond more forcefully.

"I've encouraged them to put the full-court press on," Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., said. "This is a big issue, and they have a big stake in the outcome."

In the Senate, seven Republicans threatened to tack their own resolution opposing the planned troop increase to a must-pass bill.

Jen Burita, spokeswoman for Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, said the "overwhelming majority" of calls and e-mails from constituents oppose the troop increase.

House Democrats expressed support for the non-binding resolution being drafted by their leaders, even though some would like to go further. "It's brilliant," said Rep. Gary Ackerman, D-N.Y. "It's something we can all support."

DOJ_NMG_0129952

Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Calif., called the resolution "a good first step." She and Reps. Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y., and Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, said they plan to push for spending restrictions to effectively force a troop withdrawal when a funding bill comes before the House of Representatives this spring.

Boehner argued that the Iraq war is "part of a global fight against Islamic terrorism."

"Fleeing Iraq doesn't mean that war will end," he said.

Reid Puts Off Iraq Debate Until After Recess (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will put off another attempt to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq until after the Presidents Day recess, turning the issue over to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to address during next week's lead up to the break.

Reid's decision to let the House vote first on the measure came on the heels of an announcement by seven Republican critics of the war that they would look to break the Senate's impasse on the resolution by attaching it to other bills. Five of the seven — including Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), the sponsor of the resolution — had backed a GOP filibuster of the language Monday that brought the debate on Iraq to a standstill.

Democratic and Republican leaders were quick to claim the announcement was a vindication of their positions. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) sent Reid a letter Thursday claiming the announcement by Warner should be read as an endorsement of their demands that the Senate also vote on a resolution drafted by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) aimed at undermining support for the Warner resolution by shifting the focus to whether lawmakers support the soldiers in the field.

But Reid, Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) saw the announcement as vindication of their decision to limit debate on Iraq to the Warner resolution. "I think the letter they sent was a giant mea culpa ... I'm glad they came to their senses," Schumer, who also is the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman, told reporters.

As the political stakes continue to increase on Capitol Hill, the White House on Thursday waged a PR offensive of its own. Bush administration officials invited a bipartisan, bicameral group of House and Senate leadership communications officials to join in on "an unclassified briefing" from Baghdad on Monday morning.

The video teleconference is being billed as the first of what the administration says will be regular sessions with leadership aides, and comes at a time when the Democrats have voiced near uniform opposition to the president's proposed troop surge. Ambassador Daniel Speckhard, deputy chief of mission, and Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the spokesman for multinational forces in Iraq, will spearhead the briefing with the press aides.

The War And The Words (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

National Intelligence Estimates are not supposed to be amusing. And the latest NIE on the situation in Iraq was uniformly grim. But the document's determined effort to split the difference on the use of the phrase "civil war" did verge on the comical. One can only imagine the interagency wrangling that produced the classic bureaucratic compromise: "The Intelligence Community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict," but "nonetheless, the term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict."

In other words: yes, no, maybe. Multiple civil strife, but way too messy to rank with the classics such as America in the 1860s or Spain in the 1930s.

I don't deny that this is a fair application of "civil war" to the current situation. What I note with dismay, however, is how important -- and absurdly irrelevant -- the application of certain loaded words to the situation has become.

What is striking is how much of the debate in Washington about Iraq has to do not with the war but with the words. Who owns them, who deploys them, who uses them as a bludgeon. NBC's announcement in November that it would henceforth use the term civil war -- a statement far more political than analytical, invoking the same fake authority with which the networks regally "declare" election winners (e.g., Florida to Al Gore, Nov. 7, 2000) -- set the tone of definitional self-importance.

Words. We had weeks of debates in the Senate about Iraq. They eventually went nowhere, being shut down (temporarily) by partisan procedural disputes. But they were going nowhere anyway. The debates were not about real fighting in a real place. They were about how the various senators would position themselves in relation to that real fighting in that real place. At issue? With what tone and nuance and addenda to express disapproval of a troop surge that the president was going to order anyway.

When it came to doing something serious about the surge, the Senate ducked. It unanimously (81-0) approved sending Gen. David H. Petraeus to Baghdad to do the surge -- precisely what a majority of the senators said they did not want done.

If you really oppose the surge, how can you not oppose the appointment of the man whose very mission is to carry it out? Yet not one senator did so. Instead, they spent days fine-tuning the wording of a nonbinding -- i.e., entirely toothless -- expression of disapproval.

A serious legislative body would not be arguing over degrees of disapproval anyway, but about the elements of three or four alternative plans that might actually change our course in Iraq, something they all say they desire. But instead of making a contribution to thinking through how the war should be either prosecuted or liquidated, they negotiate language that provides precisely the amount of distancing a senator might need as political insulation should the surge either succeed or fail.

Words. The Democrats are all in favor of "redeployment" and pretend that this is an alternative plan. But the word redeployment is meaningless. It simply means changing the position of our soldiers and, implicitly, changing their mission. Unless you're saying where you're redeploying to, and with what mission, you've said nothing. It's a statement of opposition, yet another expression of disapproval of the current strategy -- much like an empty, nonbinding congressional resolution -- until you say whether you want to redeploy to Kansas or Kurdistan.

Words. Consider "surge." It carries an air of energy, aggression and even hope. That, in fact, is a fairly good reflection of Petraeus's view of it -- not just more troops but a change in the rules of engagement, with more latitude to fight, less political interference by the Iraqi government and a much tougher attitude toward foreign, especially Iranian, agents in Iraq.

The opposition prefers "escalation," as featured, for example, in the anti-surge commercial that aired in certain markets during the Super Bowl. The main reason for using escalation, of course, is that it is a Vietnam word. And the more Vietnam words you can use in discussing Iraq, the more you've won the debate without having to make an argument.

The problem with this battle over words is that it is entirely irrelevant to what is happening in Iraq. There will be real troops on real missions regardless of what label they are given. The country is engaged in a serious debate about exactly what strategy to pursue to either prosecute the war or withdraw in an orderly fashion. The Senate might consider putting such a debate on its agenda.

War Resolution Seen Hurting Morale (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Senate Republicans yesterday contradicted top Pentagon officials who say Congress would not injure troop morale by passing a nonbinding resolution critical of President Bush's Iraq war plan.

Sen. Lindsey Graham said he was outraged that Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates would say U.S. combat forces "understand" politics back home and won't be disheartened by a symbolic no-confidence vote against the commander in chief.

"It shows a lack of sophistication about how this would play in newspaper headlines throughout the world," said Mr. Graham, South Carolina Republican.

"The war on terror is about headlines," he told The Washington Times. "The last thing we need to do is give [terrorists] a headline by our political action that would embolden them, and by contrast would be hurtful to our men and women in the theater trying to execute the new strategy."

Mr. Graham continued, "The only way we will ever lose in Iraq is if our will to succeed is broken."

Mr. Gates and Gen. Pace did say that a resolution against the president's plan to reinforce forces in Iraq with 21,500 more troops would send the wrong signal to al Qaeda and other U.S. enemies. Still, their remarks about morale undercut one of the chief arguments against the resolutions that would criticize Mr. Bush's troop-surge plan.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said Gen. Pace and Mr. Gates were cornered into dismissing the impact on morale during their testimony Wednesday before the House Armed Services Committee.

"I would hardly have expected either of them to have answered the question any differently," he said, adding that he still thinks a resolution "will send the wrong message to our allies, to our enemies, and to our troops and their families."

Mr. Kyl noted his speech last week in which he quoted three U.S. troops in Iraq who told NBC's "Nightly News" that they take criticism of the war effort personally.

For instance, Mr. Kyl quoted Army Spc. Peter Manna, who said, "If they don't think what we're doing is a good job, everything that we've done here is all in vain -- is all in vain."

"They said what they said," Mr. Kyl said. "So you can judge for yourself whether their morale was being affected."

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, ducked questions about troop morale yesterday when calling for a vote on the resolution against reinforcements, along with a Republican resolution promising not to cut war funding.

"There will be one or more Republican alternatives that we will insist on being debated, and I'm going to engage in the substantive debate on that at that time," Mr. McConnell said.

Senate Republicans cut off the war debate Monday by blocking a vote on a resolution that said the chamber "disagrees" with the reinforcement plan but supports Mr. Bush's view that victory in Iraq is a critical objective.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner also said resolutions against the war plan threaten morale, even if they are "nothing more than political theater that means nothing."

"I believe that it demoralizes our troops in the field," the Ohio Republican said. If Democrats "are really serious about their intent to bring troops home, why not bring a real resolution to the floor and have a debate about whether, in fact, they should cut funding or not?"

The House will begin debating a resolution next week, with Democratic leaders hoping to succeed where the Senate failed.

Mr. Bush last month said he would send about 17,500 more soldiers to Baghdad to try to counter Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian violence that threatens Iraq's fledgling government, and deploy an additional 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to combat al Qaeda fighters making a stand there.

The president has claimed the authority as commander in chief to proceed.

Democrats who oppose the troop increase were left with few alternatives: rescind the authorization to go to war, cut off funding for troops, or pass a nonbinding resolution that has no effect but lets members vent their feelings on the way the war is going.

Whatever happens in Congress, the White House said yesterday it will not get involved in the debate over nonbinding resolutions.

"This is an expression of opinion on the part of members of Congress, and therefore, it is appropriate to let them go ahead and express it," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Mr. Snow said the debate is "healthy" but repeated his challenge that lawmakers must be careful of "what kind of message they're sending."

Official's Key Report On Iraq Is Faulted (WP)

By Walter Pincus And R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Intelligence provided by former undersecretary of defense Douglas J. Feith to buttress the White House case for invading Iraq included "reporting of dubious quality or reliability" that supported the political views of senior administration officials rather than the conclusions of the intelligence community, according to a report by the Pentagon's inspector general.

Feith's office "was predisposed to finding a significant relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda," according to portions of the report, released yesterday by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). The inspector general described Feith's activities as "an alternative intelligence assessment process."

An unclassified summary of the full document is scheduled for release today in a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, which Levin chairs. In that summary, a copy of which was obtained from another source by The Washington Post, the inspector general concluded that Feith's assessment in 2002 that Iraq and al-Qaeda had a "mature symbiotic relationship" was not fully supported by available intelligence but was nonetheless used by policymakers.

At the time of Feith's reporting, the CIA had concluded only that there was an "evolving" association, "based on sources of varying reliability."

In a telephone interview yesterday, Feith emphasized the inspector general's conclusion that his actions, described in the report as "inappropriate," were not unlawful. "This was not 'alternative intelligence assessment,' " he said. "It was from the start a criticism of the consensus of the intelligence community, and in presenting it I was not endorsing its substance."

Feith, who was defense policy chief before leaving the government in 2005, was one of the key contributors to the administration's rationale for war. His intelligence activities, authorized by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz, and coordinated with Vice President Cheney's office, stemmed from an administration belief that the CIA was underplaying evidence of then-Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's ties with al-Qaeda.

In interviews with Pentagon investigators, the summary document said, Feith insisted that his activities did not constitute intelligence and that "even if they were, [they] would be appropriate given that they were responding to direction from the Deputy Secretary of Defense."

The report was requested in fall 2005 by Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), then chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. Although the committee and a number of official inquiries had criticized the administration's prewar intelligence, Democratic senators, led by Levin, demanded further investigation of Feith's operation.

"The bottom line is that intelligence relating to the Iraq-al-Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," Levin said yesterday. "The inspector general's report is a devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities in the DOD policy office that helped take this nation to war."

The summary document confirmed a range of accusations that Levin had leveled against Feith's office, alleging inaccurate work.

Feith's office, it said, drew on "both reliable and unreliable" intelligence reports in 2002 to produce a link between al-Qaeda and Iraq "that was much stronger than that assessed by the IC [Intelligence Community] and more in accord with the policy views of senior officials in the Administration."

It stated that the office produced intelligence assessments "inconsistent" with the U.S. intelligence community consensus, calling those actions "inappropriate" because the assessments purported to be "intelligence products" but were far more conclusive than the consensus view.

In particular, the summary cited the defense policy office's preparation of slides describing as a "known contact" an alleged 2001 meeting in Prague between Mohamed Atta, the leader of the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, and an Iraqi intelligence officer.

That claim figured heavily in statements by Cheney and other senior administration officials alleging a link between al-Qaeda and the Iraqi regime, but it has since been discredited.

Three versions of the briefing prepared by Feith's office were presented in August and September 2002 -- months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq -- to I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, then Cheney's chief of staff; Rumsfeld; and then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, the summary states.

But only "some of the information" in those briefings was "supported by available intelligence," the summary said. The version of the briefing presented to senior Bush officials, it said, contained different information than a presentation to the CIA. Left out of the version for the CIA, the inspector general said, was "a slide that said there were 'fundamental problems' " with the way the intelligence community was presenting the evidence.

While Pentagon officials said in responses cited in the summary that no senior policymakers mistook these briefings as "intelligence assessments," the inspector general said that administration officials had indeed cited classified intelligence that allegedly documented a close al-Qaeda-Iraq relationship.

The policy office, the summary stated, "was inappropriately performing Intelligence Activities . . . that should be performed by the Intelligence Community."

The summary recommended no action within the Defense Department because, it said, the current collaboration under new leadership at the Pentagon and the intelligence community "will significantly reduce the opportunity for the inappropriate conduct of intelligence activities outside intelligence channels."

Pentagon Criticized For Prewar Data Analysis (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — A Pentagon investigation into the handling of prewar intelligence has criticized civilian Pentagon officials for conducting their own intelligence analysis to find links between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, but said the officials did not violate any laws or mislead Congress, according to Congressional officials who have read the report.

The long-awaited report by the Pentagon's acting inspector general, Thomas F. Gimble, was sent to Congress on Thursday. It is the first major review to rebuke senior officials working for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld for the way intelligence was used before the invasion of Iraq early in 2003.

Working under Douglas J. Feith, who at the time was under secretary of defense for policy, the group "developed, produced and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and Al Qaeda relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the Intelligence Community, to senior decision-makers," the report concluded. Excerpts were quoted by Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who has long been critical of Mr. Feith and other Pentagon officials.

The report, and the dueling over its conclusions, shows that bitter divisions over the handling of prewar intelligence remain even after many of the substantive questions have been laid to rest and the principal actors have left the government.

In a rebuttal to an earlier draft of Mr. Gimble's report, Eric S. Edelman, the under secretary of defense, said the group's activities were authorized by Mr. Rumsfeld and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz. They did not produce formal intelligence assessments, and they were properly shared, the rebuttal said.

In a statement issued Thursday, Mr. Feith, who left the Pentagon in 2005, made similar points. Mr. Rumsfeld did not respond to telephone messages seeking comment.

According to Congressional officials, Mr. Feith's statement and the policy office's rebuttal, the report concluded that none of the Pentagon's activities were illegal and that they did not violate Defense Department directives.

But the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, said in a statement that because the inspector general considered the work of Mr. Feith's group to be "intelligence activities," the committee would investigate whether the Pentagon violated the National Security Act of 1947 by failing to notify Congress about the group's work.

Senator Levin, who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, called the report a "very strong condemnation" of the Pentagon's activities.

"I think they sought this kind of intelligence. They made it clear they wanted any kind of possible connections, no matter how skimpy, and they got it," he said.

Mr. Feith and other officials in his Pentagon office have been accused by critics of the administration of distorting intelligence data to justify the invasion of Iraq. When Democrats were in the minority in Congress, Mr. Levin conducted an inquiry and issued a report excoriating Mr. Feith and others at the Pentagon for their conduct.

The conclusions the Pentagon team reached in the year or so before the invasion of Iraq have been generally known for some time and were largely discredited by the Sept. 11 commission, which found "no evidence" that contacts between the Iraqi government and Al Qaeda "ever developed into a collaborative operational relationship."

According to Mr. Levin, the inspector general's report did not make any specific recommendations, and he said that interagency coordination "will significantly reduce the opportunity for the inappropriate conduct of intelligence activities outside of intelligence channels."

The Senate Intelligence Committee, meanwhile, is completing work on its own investigation into the use of intelligence by policy makers in the months before the Iraq war. Under Republican leadership, it had delayed an examination of Mr. Feith's activities pending the outcome of the inspector general's report.

The Pentagon's rebuttal vehemently rejected the report's contention that there was "inappropriate" use of intelligence by Pentagon civilians and said the effort to identify links between Saddam Hussein's government and Al Qaeda was done at the direction of Mr. Wolfowitz, who was deputy defense secretary at the time.

Describing the work as a "fresh, critical look" at intelligence agency conclusions about Al Qaeda and Iraq, the Pentagon rebuttal said, "It is somewhat difficult to understand how activities that admittedly were lawful and authorized (in this case by either the secretary of defense or the deputy secretary of defense) could nevertheless be characterized as 'inappropriate.' "

The Feith operation dates to shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, when the Pentagon established a small team of civilians to sift through existing intelligence with the aim of finding possible links between terror networks and governments. Bush administration officials contended that intelligence agencies were ignoring reports of collaboration between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

By the summer of 2002, the group, whose membership evolved over time, was aimed at identifying links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq.

The inspector general's report criticizes a July 25, 2002, memo, written by an intelligence analyst detailed to Mr. Feith's office, titled, "Iraq and al-Qaida: Making the Case."

The memo said that, while "some analysts have argued" that Osama bin Laden would not cooperate with secular Arab entities like Iraq, "reporting indicates otherwise."

The inspector general concluded that the memo constituted an "alternative intelligence assessment" from that given by the Central Intelligence Agency and other intelligence agencies and that it led to a briefing on links between Al Qaeda and Iraq that was given to senior Bush administration officials in August 2002, according to excerpts of the draft inspector general report quoted by Mr. Edelman.

It is not clear whether the inspector general revised his report after receiving the rebuttal.

The draft inspector general report said Mr. Feith's office should have followed intelligence agency guidelines for registering differing views, "in those rare instances where consensus could not be reached."

In his statement Thursday, Mr. Feith said he was pleased that the inspector general had cleared him of violating laws or Defense Department policies, but he called it "wrong" and "bizarre" for the report to criticize civilian officials for scrutinizing intelligence agency conclusions and passing along their findings to senior officials.

Mr. Feith also said that the inspector general's findings reflected "confusion about the way policy and intelligence officials relate to one another in the real world."

Pentagon Probe Deems Intelligence Inappropriate (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

A Defense Department investigation to be presented to Congress on Friday concludes that some of the Pentagon's pre-Iraq War intelligence work was inappropriate but not illegal.

Two people familiar with the findings discussed the main points and some details Thursday on condition they not be identified.

In the report, the department's inspector general said former Pentagon policy chief Douglas J. Feith had not engaged in illegal activities through the creation of special offices to review intelligence. Some Democrats also have contended that Mr. Feith misled Congress about the basis of the administration's assertions on the threat posed by Iraq, but the Pentagon investigation did not support that.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has scheduled a hearing Friday to receive the findings by Thomas F. Gimble, the Pentagon's acting inspector general. The committee's chairman, Carl Levin (D., Mich.), has been a leading critic of Mr. Feith's role in prewar intelligence activities and has accused him of deceiving Congress.

Mr. Levin has asserted that President Bush took the country to war in Iraq based in part on intelligence assessments -- some shaped by Mr. Feith's office -- that were off base and didn't fully reflect the views of the intelligence community.

In a telephone interview Thursday, Mr. Levin said the inspector-general report is "very damning" and shows a Pentagon policy shop trying to shape intelligence to prove a link between al Qaeda and Saddam. Mr. Levin also said it was a "red herring" to say that he or others in Congress claimed that any of Mr. Feith's activities had been illegal. Mr. Feith has said the accusation that he misled Congress was, by definition, a claim that he had acted illegally.

The 2004 report from the Sept. 11 Commission found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Saddam and Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda terror organization before the U.S. invasion.

Asked to comment on the inspector general's findings, Mr. Feith said in a telephone interview that he had not seen the report but was pleased to hear that it concluded his office's activities were neither illegal nor unauthorized. He took strong issue, however, with the inspector general's finding that some activities had been "inappropriate."

Mr. Feith called "bizarre" the inspector general's conclusion that some intelligence activities by the Office of Special Plans, which was created while Mr. Feith served as the undersecretary of defense for policy -- the top policy position under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- were inappropriate but not unauthorized.

Mr. Feith left his Pentagon post in August 2005 and now teaches at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service.

Defense Report OKs Policy Chief's Intelligence Move (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

A report to be released today clears the Pentagon's former policy chief of Democrats' charges he acted illegally and without authorization when he set up a small team to compile intelligence reports.

The report from the Defense Department inspector general focuses on a two-man team that after the September 11, 2001, attacks was assigned the task of studying intelligence reports on terrorist networks. It especially looked at reports of contacts between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, in 2004 accused then-Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith, who created the unit, of "running a private intelligence failure, which is not lawful."

But the IG report specifically rejects that charge, the sources said, adding there was nothing illegal or unauthorized about Pentagon policy-makers looking at intelligence and writing a report. Democrats contend that such work, by law, is done only by intelligence analysts.

Mr. Feith said yesterday he feels vindicated after hearing repeated charges from Mr. Rockefeller and Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. Both serve on the Senate intelligence committee, which failed to find any illegality when it reviewed the Feith unit in 2003-2004.

"It is good but not surprising that the inspector general found that the Pentagon policy office's activities were all legal and authorized and that policy officials did not mislead Congress," said Mr. Feith, who was questioned by senators.

"The policy office has been smeared for years by allegations that its pre-Iraq War work was somehow 'unlawful' or 'unauthorized' and that some information it gave to congressional committees was deceptive or misleading. The office's accusers always couched the charges in vague language, making them difficult to refute with precision. The charges have been repeated persistently despite the lack of any substantiation. The inspector general's report has now thoroughly repudiated the smears."

Mr. Levin, who requested the IG report and has repeatedly referred to the "Feith group" in derogatory terms, has suggested the Democratic-controlled Senate will conduct more probes into the unit.

The Senate Armed Services chairman plans a hearing today on the IG report.

DOJ_NMG_0129958

The IG found one problem in Mr. Feith's shop, questioning the criticism some policy people leveled at CIA analysts. The Defense Department rejected that part of the IG report, saying it was healthy for policy-makers and intelligence analysts to debate findings.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Rockefeller stuck by his charges:

"Individuals in that office produced and disseminated intelligence products outside of the regular intelligence channels. These intelligence products were inconsistent with the consensus judgments of the Intelligence Community. This office did this without coordinating with the Intelligence Community and as a result policy-makers received distorted intelligence."

Senate Confirms Casey As Army Chief Of Staff (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

The Senate voted 83 to 14 yesterday to confirm Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as the Army's new chief of staff, a tally that included 10 Republicans voting against the general who has commanded the Iraq war for the past 2 1/2 years. Though a vast majority of the senators supported Casey's ascension to the Army's top post, several powerful Republicans decried what they regard as Casey's leadership failures amid a deteriorating situation in Iraq.

The vote allowed some Republicans wary of taking a public stand against President Bush's current strategy in Iraq to speak out against the conduct of the war. Though the senators almost unanimously praised Casey's service to the nation, some lashed out at his 30-month tenure as the top commander in Baghdad.

Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.), who has at times evaded questions about the president's plan to secure Iraq, said that Casey's tour saw a steady deterioration in the country's security. "There are many factors that contributed to the failure to improve the situation, but ultimately our military leadership has to bear some responsibility for its choices," Sununu said. "Simply put, we shouldn't reward a lack of success on the field of command with such an important promotion."

More than a fifth of the Republicans in the Senate voted against Casey, including influential members of the Armed Services Committee, which grilled the general during a contentious confirmation hearing last week. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), the panel's ranking GOP member, joined three other Republicans on the committee in opposing Casey's confirmation: Sens. John Ensign (Nev.), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.).

Chambliss said yesterday that he has been unimpressed with Casey's leadership, criticizing him for maintaining his position that the United States did not need additional forces in Iraq even as the war worsened.

"I've been a big supporter of the president on the war itself. My only questions have come . . . with deployment of additional troops, but my concerns have been addressed and answered," Chambliss said, citing his concerns about Casey's strategies. "I think it's a bad decision to put old ideas in place."

Graham said that he voted against Casey because he thinks it is time to stop being overly optimistic about the war. "We have slowly but surely gone backwards, and that strategy General Casey was implementing was not working," Graham said. He added that the administration is now betting everything on the buildup of troops in Iraq. "If this is all in, which I think it is, I'm not so sure I want him to play the hand."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, voted in favor of Casey's confirmation.

"It is not fair that General Casey be tagged with failures, massive failures which were caused by the false policies, the wrong policies, the deceptions, the ignorance, the arrogance, the cockiness of civilian leaders in this administration," Levin said.

Army officials close to Casey said yesterday that he is extremely honored by the confirmation. He could not be reached in Iraq because of the late hour there.

Confirmations of Army chiefs of staff have almost always lacked controversy, but Casey's comes as the U.S. public is growing weary of the Iraq war and as Congress is split over the way forward. According to Senate records dating to 1930, there has been only one other contested confirmation vote for an Army chief, when Gen. Creighton W. Abrams Jr. was confirmed in late 1972. The Senate approved Abrams in an 84 to 2 vote during the Vietnam War.

Senate Confirms Shift Of Gen. Casey From Iraq To Army Chief Of Staff (USAT/AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate on Thursday confirmed Gen. George Casey as the next Army chief of staff, despite reservations by several lawmakers over his direction of the Iraq war.

Casey was confirmed by a 83-14 vote. He had been top U.S. commander in Iraq since July 2004, but President Bush replaced him with Army Gen. David Petraeus as part of an overhaul of his Iraq policies and his team of top U.S. officials in the Middle East.

The Senate a day earlier confirmed Navy Adm. William Fallon to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of U.S. Central Command, which oversees operations throughout the Middle East.

Their approval comes as Democrats launch a full-court press against Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. House Democratic leaders are planning a vote next week on a resolution stating opposition to the buildup, while some senators are considering bogging down upcoming budget bills with anti-war measures.

Despite their opposition to Bush's war strategies, Democrats defended Casey while Republicans who support Bush's policies assailed the general, accusing him of mismanaging the conflict.

"Gen. Casey knows Iraq and the challenges the Army faces there," Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said this week, adding, "The principal failures that led to the chaos in Iraq were due to the civilian leaders."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Casey should be held accountable for giving Congress rosy assessments of the war as the violence got worse.

"I have questioned in the past and question today a number of decisions and judgments that Gen. Casey has made in the past two and a half years," said McCain. "During that time, conditions in Iraq have gotten remarkably and progressively worse."

Testifying this month before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Casey said he had asked for three fewer ground combat units than Bush is sending to Iraq. Bush announced Jan. 10 he would send five brigades to Iraq, whereas Casey had requested only two.

Casey said he does not oppose the deployment of the additional brigades because it would give U.S. commanders in Iraq flexibility.

Casey will replace Gen. Peter Schoomaker, who is retiring.

Retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell also was confirmed Wednesday on a voice vote to become the nation's second national intelligence director.

McCain Vote On General (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) vote against the nomination of Gen. George Casey to become Army chief of staff is a departure from a policy he outlined two years ago on the president's prerogative to appoint advisers.

But a McCain spokeswoman said that his earlier statement should not be taken out of context. She said it referred to filibusters of presidential appointments, not final confirmation votes.

McCain was one of 14 senators to vote against Casey yesterday, but his vote drew a lot of attention because he is the top-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee. Nine other Republicans and four Democrats also voted against Casey, including fellow White House hopeful, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Critics view McCain's vote as an effort to distance himself from President Bush's Iraq war policy while he lays the groundwork for his own presidential campaign. Sixty five percent of Americans disapprove of Bush's job performance, according to a Gallup poll completed over the weekend, a dismal rating that has been widely attributed to lack of support for the war.

Two years ago, shortly after Bush won reelection, McCain declared that the president has a right to appoint his team of advisers, even though they may be controversial or unappealing to senators who have the responsibility of confirming them.

"Mr. President, elections have consequences, and one consequence of President Bush's reelection is that he has the right to appoint officials of his choice," McCain said in a statement on the Senate floor as his colleagues were considering whether to confirm John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

"I stress this, because the president nominates not the Democrats' selection, nor mine or that of any other senator, but his own choice," said McCain. "When President Clinton was elected, I did not share the policy views of some of the officials he nominated, but I voted to confirm them, knowing that the president has a right to put into place the team that he believes will serve him best."

Bolton at the time was a far more controversial nominee. He never received a confirmation vote from the full Senate because Democrats filibustered his nomination with the support of Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio). Bolton attracted widespread criticism after the Foreign Relations Committee received testimony from the nominee's former colleagues, who accused him of being abusive.

Democrats criticized Bolton's nomination because of his outspoken critical views of the U.N., which he described as irrelevant and corrupt.

Melissa Shuffield, McCain's spokeswoman, said his statement during the Bolton debate conveyed his belief that presidential appointees should receive up-or-down confirmation votes, and did not mean to say they are entitled to unanimous approval.

She noted that in the same floor statement that McCain urged his colleagues to allow a vote to proceed.

"For my colleagues who disagree and do not want Mr. Bolton there, I respect their views," he said. "But let's go ahead and give him an up-or-down vote before we go into recess for a week. Let him go."

Senate approval for the position of Army chief of staff is usually routine — either by voice vote or unanimous consent.

There is only one recorded instance of the Senate voting on an Army chief of staff, which happened in 1972 after public support for the Vietnam war had cratered when Sens. Frank Church (D-Idaho) and William Proxmire (D-Wis.) cast the only two votes against Gen. Creighton Abrams. Neither lawmaker sat on the Armed Services Committee at that time, according to Senate records.

"This is not a typical step," said Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, of McCain's vote. "It's a reflection of a deep frustration that McCain has felt for three years about the way this war has been conducted; a frustration with [former Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld, with the president and vice president, and with the military."

McCain did not have a chance to formally register his position on the war earlier this week when he missed the vote on proceeding to consideration of two Iraqi war resolutions, including one he sponsored along with Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.). McCain was in Texas meeting with political supporters.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and other Democrats claimed the vote on whether to end a filibuster of the resolutions would be considered tantamount to a vote on the war itself if Republicans successfully blocked consideration of the resolutions.

Luis Miranda, a spokesman for the Democratic National Committee, said that McCain was trying to distance himself from the president's war policy, but that it would not succeed.

But Ornstein disputed allegations of McCain's political motive.

"This is not an area where McCain is posturing for politics," said Ornstein, who explained that his judgment was based on knowing McCain personally. "That line is drawn. When it comes to war and peace John McCain is going to do what he thinks is right no matter what."

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), one of McCain's rivals for the Republican presidential nomination, declined to offer judgment on his colleague.

"I don't know what his rationale was," he said.

But others said they respected McCain's stance.

"I respect John McCain and his extraordinary knowledge of the U.S. military," said Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), who preceded McCain as the senior Republican on Armed Services. "His vote should be respected."

New Commander, New Plan In Iraq (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

CAIRO

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus – armed with a Princeton PhD, legions of admirers, and a coterie of advisers who have frequently criticized the approach to America's last long war (Vietnam) – arrived in Baghdadthis week to lead a war that even many of its supporters say is approaching zero hour.

The "warrior scholar" brings a new approach, officially taking over command Saturday of operations in Iraq from Gen. George Casey.

The path forward, as General Petraeus has told Congress, means essentially decentralizing operations in Iraq. It's a plan that aims to place bands of US soldiers with Iraqi forces in Baghdad, a high-risk strategy that will put more Americans in daily contact with Iraqis, providing both opportunities to win hearts and minds and more occasions for casualties.

Petraeus says he's optimistic, but he'll have fewer troops to do the job than recommended by the US military's new counterinsurgency manual, which he spent most of the past year helping to rewrite, calls for in these situations.

If he succeeds, the genial Petraeus, skilled at both befriending journalists and the men under his command, could achieve the hero status last bestowed on a US general, Norman Schwarzkopf, after leading the 1991 Gulf War.

But counterinsurgency experts, and some inside the military, say that the deck is heavily stacked against him.

"The strategy is a good one, Petraeus's approach is by far has the best chance of anyone to win. The problem is it doesn't matter how good a campaign you run if you're not given the resources you need," says Thomas Hammes, a retired Marine Corps colonel who is a counterinsurgency expert who served in Iraq. His counterinsurgency book, "The Sling and the Stone: On War in the 21st Century," is considered required reading for commanders in Iraq.

Mr. Hammes, in concert with the counterinsurgency manual that Petraeus helped to write, says the general doesn't have enough manpower for the job that he has been sent to do. In the time frame provided, Hammes is skeptical about success, particularly with Washington looking to substantially reduce US troop levels again in six months time.

Experts say that a standard rule of thumb for counterinsurgency operations, particularly ones aimed at building the security and trust of the host populations, is to have about 20 troops on the ground for every 1,000 inhabitants.

The manual says that this ratio "is often considered the minimum troop density required for effective [counter-insurgency] operations." In his Congressional confirmation hearing, Petraeus said that would indicate a minimum of about 120,000 security forces to control the 6 million resident of Baghdad alone. He estimated that US troops – plus Iraqi soldiers and police – will add up to just 85,000 total during the current escalation in force in Baghdad.

While Petraeus said he was concerned that he wouldn't have more troops, he added that he would be relying on contractors and guards employed by Iraq's ministries to provide some security, "which does give me reason to believe that we can accomplish the mission."

"Why he won't say he needs more troops is, I think, because he knows he's not going to get them. And he knows if you go up on [Capitol] Hill and ask for that you just undercut yourself," says Hammes.

Looking to the past to win Iraq

Petraeus is a New York state native who starred on West Point's soccer team and is now, at 55, a serious marathoner. He sailed through Senate confirmation hearings earlier this month, but will now have to come to grips with the reality of Iraq, a country he hasn't visited since October 2005.

While he emits an aura of quiet confidence, he admits the mission is far from assured of success.

"We face a determined, adaptable, barbaric enemy," Petraeus said at his confirmation hearing. "He will try to wait us out. In fact, any such endeavor is a test of wills. There are no guarantees."

Petraeus has become a proponent of spreading more troops out in the capital, working with Iraqi soldiers, both to keep them honest and improve their capabilities, and focusing on systematically securing the capital, neighborhood by neighborhood.

US combat strength in the country is currently being increased by 21,500, all but 4,000 of them bound for Baghdad. US soldiers will be distributed to police stations the city's nine districts, working side by side with Iraqi soldiers and police, rather than being billeted in the large Forward Operating Bases (FOBs).

Petraeus is looking at past counterinsurgency efforts in places as diverse as Algeria, Vietnam, and Malaysia in making the bet that abandoning the Army's heavy emphasis on "force protection," keeping soldiers out of harm's way as much as possible when on their bases, will actually lead to more safety and success.

The manual he co-authored, calls it one of the "paradoxes of counterinsurgency" and sums it up under a heading declaring: "The more you protect your force, the less secure you may be."

It argues: "If military forces remain in their compounds, they lose touch with the people, appear to be running scared and cede initiative to the insurgents."

David Kilcullen, a former Australian lieutenant colonel who served in Iraq and has a PhD for his work on Indonesia's successful destruction of the separatist Islamist Darul Islam movement in the 1950s, is now Petraeus's principal counterinsurgency adviser. He summed up the new approach in Iraq in a January article in the online Small Wars Journal entitled, "Don't confuse the surge with the strategy."

"The key element of the plan ... is to concentrate security forces within Baghdad to secure the local people where they live," he wrote. "Troops will operate in small, local groups closely partnered with the Iraqi military and police ... this is less like conventional warfare, and more like a cop patrolling a beat."

But Hammes points to the past success of key Petraeus aide Col. H.R. McMaster, who led a highly lauded operation to root out Sunni Arab extremists from the northern Iraqi city of Tal Afar in 2005, as actually emphasizing the need for more troops.

Colonel McMaster built a huge sand berm around the city to control its citizens' movements, aggressively targeted local insurgents, then quickly shifted focus to providing a security presence on the streets and rapidly repairing damaged infrastructure in what was called a "clear, hold and build" strategy. This largely pacified the city, allowing families that had fled to return.

But, Hammes says, "McMaster had a troop ratio of 20 per 1,000, and that was the only place in Iraq that has had that, and he did a masterful job. A lesser commander would have failed even with that, but without that, I don't care how competent a commander you are, you can't get the job done."

Hammes argues that the job might be achievable with more time, given the limited number of boots on the ground, but warns that US politicians appear too fixated on quick results. "If we were saying we hoped to pacify Baghdad in two and a half years' time and then move out and do the same in the rest of the country, OK, that's possible."

Unconventional successes

In his career, Petraeus has proven an exceptional student of both military history and international affairs. He was first in his class at the US Army's Command and General Staff College, and earned his PhD for a dissertation on the lessons of the Vietnam War.

Much of his recent reputation was built on success in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul in 2004. The diverse city – with Kurdish, Shiite, and Sunni populations – would have seemed a likely candidate for the sectarian violence that was already starting to sweep Iraq further south, but was largely peaceful while he commanded the 101st Airborne division there.

In Mosul, he emphasized cultural sensitivity and outreach to locals, both in the conventional settings where his junior officers sat down to hear the grievances of sheikhs, as well as more off-beat approaches, like a talent competition for would-be Iraqi crooners paid for by the US military.

But the relative success in Mosul didn't hold after the 101st's departure, whose 20,000 soldiers were replaced by a force of just 6,000, a Stryker Brigade that relied on high-tech armored vehicles, rather than the intensive foot patrols of its predecessor.

Iraq Security Plan Starts – With Glitches (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON

US and Iraqi forces have begun to implement President Bush's new security plan for Iraq – but the start-up is not without its difficulties.

Iraqi units have met deployment deadlines, but they're not at full strength. The first additional US brigade has arrived in Baghdad, but military officials are steamed that civilian US agencies aren't moving as fast as they are.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has complained that things should speed up, lest insurgents take advantage of the delay to inflict as many casualties as possible.

No one ever said the plan's first stages would be easy ones, noted US officials in congressional testimony this week. The US is taking it one step at a time.

"So far, so good," said Secretary of Defense Robert Gates at a House Armed Services Committee hearing on Wednesday.

According to Secretary Gates, the first official day of the plan was Monday, Feb. 5. For both US and Iraqi forces the new effort will involve a "rolling implementation,"said the Pentagon chief, not an "all at once" surge.

The first extra US forces to be involved in the plan, the Second Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, have already arrived in Baghdad. The lead elements of a second brigade have also arrived and are in the process of planning the arrival of the rest of their unit, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell in a Wednesday briefing.

Iraqi forces have already established 10 joint security stations in Baghdad, said General Caldwell. These are the mini-forts within urban neighborhoods from which US and Iraqi units will operate.

"It's going to be at least double, if not triple that number that are going to eventually be out there," Caldwell told reporters.

Meanwhile, the Iraqi government of Mr. Maliki has complied with a key benchmark for the deployment of his own forces – but only just.

New Iraqi brigades that were told to show up in Baghdad by February have indeed done so, according to Gates. But at least one of the brigades arrived with only 55 to 60 percent of its assigned soldiers.

About 25 percent of the brigade was home on leave, delivering their pay – a common practice in a country with a shattered financial system. Still, deploying brigades at half strength "isn't good enough," Gates admitted before Congress.

"We need to evaluate it as we go along to see if they're fulfilling their commitments," he told the House Armed Services Committee.

At his confirmation hearings earlier this year, Gates suggested that the US would know as early as February whether the Iraqi government would be an adequate partner for the US in the implementation of the new plan.

Asked this week when the US would know whether it was beginning to accomplish its security mission or not, the nation's top uniformed military officer pushed the date for key benchmarks somewhat back.

"We should start seeing results in the March/April time frame," Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the House Armed Services panel.

But military operations are only one part of the plan, noted General Pace. They won't succeed unless political and economic efforts surge as well, he noted.

And the Pentagon is not happy about what it perceives to be a slow response on the part of some other parts of the US government. In particular, Gates complained that the State Department is not stepping up to fill all of the 350 extra diplomatic jobs in Iraq created under the new plan.

Foggy Bottom has in fact asked the Pentagon to fill up to one-third of those slots with military personnel – perhaps reservists.

"It is illustrative of the difficulty of getting other agencies to provide people on a timely basis," Gates told a Senate panel Tuesday.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended her department's performance on Wednesday – pointing out that getting unarmed civilian diplomats deployed to a dangerous combat zone is a different matter than sending trained soldiers, particularly when the size of the entire US diplomatic corps equals about one US military brigade.

Many Foreign Service officers have volunteered for the duty, and the presurge requirement for personnel for the key Provincial Reconstruction Teams has been met, noted Secretary Rice.

But getting the extra people required now may take time.

"The president's plan requires ... 350 people whose skill set is far different than the one we actually have in the Department of State," Rice told the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Wednesday. "These are engineers, these are legal experts, these are soil specialists/scientists who can help on the agricultural side."

Iraq's No. 2 Health Official Is Held And Accused Of Financing Shiite Militants (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 8 — Iraqi and American troops arrested the second highest official in the Iraqi Health Ministry on Thursday, charging that he funneled millions of dollars to rogue Shiite militants who kidnapped and killed Iraqi civilians.

The United States military said in a statement that the official was suspected of using his position to run a rogue unit of the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that claims loyalty to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr. The statement accused the official of flooding the Health Ministry's payroll with militants, embezzling American money meant to pay for Iraq's overworked medical system and using Health Ministry "facilities and services for sectarian kidnapping and murder."

The military's statement did not identify the official, but several Iraqi government officials said he was Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili, a Shiite with longstanding ties to the Sadr organization. An Interior Ministry official said the authorities in recent weeks had come to believe that Mr. Zamili was using government ambulances to ferry weapons and militants across Sadr City, hiding them from American raids.

Mr. Zamili's detainment was the latest of several high-profile arrests or killings of commanders from the Mahdi Army in recent weeks. He was the fifth Iraqi deputy or cabinet level official to be arrested and charged with corruption since 2003, according to Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, and the first known example of a senior Iraqi official charged with directly contributing to the country's convulsive sectarian violence.

He was arrested as new Iraqi Army and police checkpoints appeared all over Baghdad as part of the new security plan for the city. Though it was unclear whether Mr. Zamili's arrest was part of the new plan, it underscored the challenge that American troops faced as they tried to secure the capital while relying on an Iraqi government with questionable loyalties.

The Health Ministry is one of six ministries controlled by officials affiliated with Mr. Sadr. And even as Iraqi hospital officials complain of medicine and equipment shortages, the ministry has often been the site of dramatic kidnappings and killings.

In November, Mr. Zamili's predecessor, Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite, was kidnapped by at least 24 gunmen wearing the uniforms of Interior Ministry policemen. Though he was abducted in a Sunni neighborhood, there were questions at the time about whether he had been removed by Shiite rivals.

Neither American nor Iraqi officials connected Mr. Zamili to Mr. Saffar's kidnapping, but the American statement said the arrested official was implicated in the deaths of several Health Ministry officials, including a director general in Diyala Province.

Though the statement from the American military said Iraqi forces had made the arrest, witnesses said American Humvees flooded the ministry building about 9 a.m., firing warning shots into the air and breaking windows before seizing Mr. Zamili, several guards and important paperwork in his office.

Shiite officials said Mr. Zamili's arrest was an affront to Iraqi sovereignty. The health minister, Ali al-Shammari, called the arrest an abduction and demanded proof to support the charges against his deputy.

Bahar al-Araji, one of 30 members of the Sadr bloc in Parliament, said American troops should have sought permission to search the ministry from the prime minister or an Iraqi court.

"This is not an attack on the Sadr organization," he said. "It's an attack on the Iraqi government."

His comments suggested that the Sadr organization planned to stand by its stated policy of refusing to outwardly fight American and Iraqi troops as the security plan moves through Baghdad. In recent weeks, Sadr officials have repeatedly sought to show that the Mahdi Army is only a defensive organization that aims to protect Shiite residents from Sunni attacks.

The American military also said in a statement that an airstrike in Anbar Province on two suspected safe houses for foreign fighters killed 13 insurgents. But witnesses said the airstrike flattened four houses, killing at least 35 people, including women and children. There was no immediate way to confirm either claim.

Witnesses said the site of the airstrike, a mostly Sunni Arab area northeast of Amiriya, near Falluja, had been the site of vicious battles between fighters with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and local tribes. One tribal leader said the clashes started because Al Qaeda wanted tribal leaders to join its fight, and they refused.

Violence also continued to rage near the capital, with news agencies reporting that gunmen killed 14 men from the same Sunni family just north of Baghdad.

The United States military announced that four marines were killed Wednesday in separate episodes in Anbar Province. Seven other people were killed the same day when a Marine transport helicopter crashed in an insurgent-heavy region northwest of Baghdad.

And in what appeared to be a rare case of cross-sectarian solidarity, the police in Diyala Province said a family of 25 Shiites — moving from a Sunni area after receiving death threats — was saved from death on Thursday when their Sunni neighbors repelled an insurgent ambush. Iraqi security forces were called in to help, and continued the battle, killing six gunmen.

Iraqi Health Minister Arrested In Raid (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi and U.S. forces on Thursday launched a crackdown on the web of patronage that sustains radical anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr, detaining a high-level Iraqi official in connection with the killings of Health Ministry officials and the diversion of millions of dollars to a Shiite Muslim militia.

Iraqi special forces, backed by U.S. troops, stormed the Health Ministry complex in downtown Baghdad, detaining Deputy Minister Hakim Zamili, a Sadr loyalist.

It was the second raid at the ministry in six months, but the first high-profile arrest.

"This is the first visible big fish," said a U.S. advisor to the Iraqi military after Zamili was arrested. "It's one to watch. It has to be the beginning of the housecleaning."

U.S. military officials say Sadr's Al Mahdi army is one of the deadliest groups in Iraq, killing thousands of civilians and troops.

Sadr, who has emerged as an important political power broker, has built his stature by controlling seats in parliament and gunmen on the street.

His hold on key service branches with large budgets, such as the health and transportation ministries, provides patronage for his followers, Iraqi and U.S. officials say.

The arrest of Zamili immediately sparked protest among Shiite lawmakers affiliated with Sadr, who described it as an unlawful kidnapping and an attack on the "dignity of the Iraqis."

Reaction from Sadr's camp and the streets was unusually muted, lending credence to theories that the Shiite cleric is remaining neutral in the early days of the Baghdad security crackdown.

The Health Ministry is controlled by Sadr, Iraqi and U.S. authorities say. It's a house of horrors where health officials have disappeared on their way to meetings, never to be heard from again.

Controlling the ministry means controlling the hundreds of gunmen who guard the gates, plus a billion-dollar budget and thousands of jobs.

U.S. officials no longer visit the run-down ministry. Even for Americans, who typically travel in cocoons of security, the threat level is too high, the U.S. advisor said.

At the nearby morgue, Sunni Arabs have been abducted and killed while trying to retrieve the bodies of slain relatives, forcing many families to leave their loved ones behind and violate Islamic rules on burial.

Sunni doctors from the provinces have stopped coming to the Health Ministry. They cite the danger and a sense that medicine and equipment are withheld from Sunnis, resulting in countless deaths.

Sunni and Shiite patients complain of bribery and corruption throughout the system.

Threats and kickbacks?

In a statement on the raid, the U.S. military did not name Zamili. It identified the detainee as a "senior Ministry of Health official" and said he was linked to the killing of Ali Mahdawi, a health director from a Sunni-dominated province who was kidnapped from the ministry, along with his bodyguards, in June.

"He is reported to openly intimidate and threaten officials who disagree with and question his actions," said the statement, which also alleged that the minister was taking kickbacks on contracts and siphoning off millions of dollars to the Al Mahdi army.

A third of the Health Ministry's budget goes to salaries, making it a rich source of patronage.

The Al Mahdi army also is suspected of using the ministry's ambulances to transport fighters.

Additionally, U.S. agencies have spent at least $493 million of Iraqi reconstruction funds on healthcare. Most new clinics built in Baghdad are in Shiite neighborhoods.

An aide to Prime Minister Nouri Maliki who spoke on condition of anonymity called Zamili's detention a "major arrest." The aide said Zamili was suspected in the kidnapping of another deputy health minister, Ammar Safar, who was abducted from his home in November. Safar has not been heard from since.

'No one is immune'

Although there was no official comment from Maliki's office, the aide said the prime minister had been informed of the raid, which showed that "no one is immune," the aide said.

Health Minister Ali Shammari, a Shiite, called the raid a "violation of the sovereignty of Iraq."

"They humiliated the officials, smashed the glass and broke the doors," Shammari said. Images of dusty boot prints suggesting that troops had kicked down doors played on national television.

Shammari and a group of lawmakers affiliated with Sadr said the charges against Zamili were trumped up. They demanded his release.

"This kidnapping has proved that they are not only targeting the ruling government of Iraq but also the dignity of Iraqis," Nassar Rubaie, a Shiite lawmaker loyal to Sadr, said in a statement.

A delegation of Shiite politicians complained to Maliki, also a Shiite who relies on Sadr for political support. In the past, Maliki has released high-level Shiite suspects detained by U.S. and Iraqi troops.

But U.S. officials hope the raid and arrest represent a departure from the government's unwillingness to go after Shiite militias.

In August, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers raided the Health Ministry, looking for kidnapping victims. They arrested seven of Shammari's bodyguards and confiscated large sums of money and documents.

Increasingly, Maliki is speaking out more forcefully against militias, saying his government will go after both Sunnis and Shiites.

The raid came less than 48 hours after a meeting called by Maliki to tell Iraqi army commanders in Baghdad to go after anyone breaking the law, regardless of their sectarian or political affiliations.

"Maybe, just maybe, this is an indication that the political circles will not intervene," the U.S. advisor said.

Across the country, the violence continued.

A car bomb killed 15 in Aziziyah, southeast of Baghdad, and mortar shells killed seven in Babil province, south of the capital. Shootings, bombings and mortar shells killed at least 52 others around the country, authorities said.

Of those, 20 were found dead across the capital.

The U.S. military announced the death of four Marines in Al Anbar province. They died in separate attacks Wednesday, the military said.

The deaths brought to at least 30 the number of U.S. troops killed in the first week of February, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks coalition casualties.

At least 3,115 U.S. troops have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, the website said.

The U.S. military also said a U.S. airstrike killed 13 suspected insurgents Thursday northeast of the Amiriya neighborhood in Baghdad.

Iraqis Arrest Deputy Health Minister, Allege Links To Shiite Death Squads (USAT/AP)

AP

USA Today, February 9, 2007

U.S.-backed Iraqi forces stormed the Health Ministry and arrested the No. 2 official Thursday, accusing him of diverting millions of dollars to the biggest Shiite militia and allowing death squads use of ambulances and government hospitals to carry out kidnappings and killings.

Shiite politicians allied with anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr denounced the arrest of Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili as a violation of Iraqi sovereignty and demanded that the prime minister intervene to win his release.

But Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his senior advisers remained silent. Al-Maliki, a Shiite, is under strong U.S. pressure to crack down on Shiite militias and has pledged not to interfere in the security operation to rid Baghdad's streets of gunmen from both Islamic sects.

The arrest took place at 9 a.m., an hour after Iraqi government offices generally open. Iraqi troops pushed through the iron gates of the Health Ministry building in northern Baghdad, ordered people to drop to the ground and rushed to al-Zamili's ground-floor office, witnesses said.

One of al-Zamili's bodyguards said American soldiers accompanying the force asked everyone to step aside and approached the deputy minister, who introduced himself. A U.S. soldier handcuffed al-Zamili and led him away, the guard said on condition of anonymity because he feared reprisal.

AP Television News footage of al-Zamili's office showed overturned chairs and smashed computers along with scattered files and telephones on the floor. Dusty, white boot prints marked the door, apparently because the troops had kicked it in.

A U.S. military statement did not mention al-Zamili by name but said Iraqi special troops captured a "senior official" suspected of alleged corruption and links to al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia. The Health Ministry is among six Cabinet posts controlled by al-Sadr, an ally of the prime minister.

The statement also alleged the senior official played a role in the deaths of several ministry officials, including the Sunni director of health in Diyala province. The director, Ali al-Mahdawi, vanished last June after coming to Baghdad for a meeting at the ministry.

According to the statement, the official was believed to have siphoned millions of dollars from the ministry to the Mahdi Army "to support sectarian attacks and violence targeting Iraqi citizens."

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said militiamen were also allowed to use government hospitals and clinics to gather information on Iraqis seeking treatment and "those Iraqis that were discovered to be Sunnis would later be targeted for attacks."

American officials had long complained that al-Sadr's followers were transforming hospitals into bases for the Mahdi militia and were diverting medicine from state clinics to health care facilities run by the cleric's movement.

The clinics helped al-Sadr build a powerful nationwide political movement modeled in part on the Shiite Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

The arrest is likely to add new strains to al-Maliki's fragile coalition as it embarks on a high-risk campaign to curb violence in Baghdad. Shiite politicians persuaded al-Sadr to pull his militiamen back from the streets in the run-up to the security campaign.

But a series of bombings and suicide attacks on Shiite civilians in Baghdad and the southern city of Hillah has led many Shiites to complain that U.S. and Iraqi forces have not launched the security campaign fast enough to protect them against Sunni extremists.

Nasr al-Rubaie, leader of the Sadrist bloc in parliament, called al-Zamili's arrest a "kidnapping."

Health Minister Ali al-Shemari also denounced the raid.

"This is a violation of Iraq's sovereignty," he said. "They should have a court order to carry out a raid like this."

U.S. officials have insisted that al-Maliki rein in al-Sadr's forces, and the prime minister told the cleric last month that he could no longer provide him with political protection in the face of U.S. pressure, according to al-Maliki's aides.

Curbing the militias is considered key to halting the wave of Sunni-Shiite reprisal killings that surged after last year's bombing of a Shiite shrine in the mostly Sunni city of Samarra.

Despite recent efforts, the violence showed little signs of receding.

At least 104 people were killed or found dead Thursday in Iraq, including at least 10 Sunni men gunned down in the village of Rufayaat, just east of Balad. Balad is a majority Shiite town 50 miles northeast of the Iraqi capital, but it is surrounded by territory that is mainly populated by Sunnis.

In the day's deadliest attack, a parked car bomb exploded at a food market in the predominantly Shiite town of Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, killing 20 people and wounding 45, police said.

Another parked car bomb tore through a minibus in the mainly Shiite Amin neighborhood of southeastern Baghdad, killing seven passengers and wounding 10, police said.

Senior Health Official Detained By U.S.-Iraqi Forces (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Iraqi forces today detained a senior Health Ministry official accused of corruption and helping to funnel millions of dollars to Shi'ite militiamen blamed for much of the recent sectarian violence in the capital, the U.S. military said.

The raid was the latest in a crackdown on radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's militia, coming a day after the chief U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said a security sweep to stop the rampant attacks in the capital was under way.

Violence was unrelenting today, with car bombs striking Shi'ite targets in Baghdad and south of the capital. At least 43 persons were killed or found dead in Iraq.

The military also announced that four U.S. Marines were killed yesterday in fighting in Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

The military statement did not identify the detained official, but a ministry spokesman said earlier that U.S. and Iraqi forces had seized Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili, an al-Sadr supporter, from his first-floor office in northern Baghdad.

A large white boot print was left on the bullet-pocked office door, which apparently had been kicked in by the troops, and shattered glass as well as overturned computers and phones were scattered on the floor.

The Shi'ite Health Minister Ali al-Shemari, who also has been linked to Sheik al-Sadr, and several other members of the movement denounced the raid.

"This is a violation of Iraq's sovereignty," he said. "They should have a court order to carry out a raid like this."

The detainee was implicated in the deaths of several ministry officials, including the director-general in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, the military said.

He reportedly orchestrated several kickback schemes related to inflated contracts for equipment and services, with millions of dollars allegedly funneled to the Mahdi Army militia that is loyal to Sheik al-Sadr, according to the statement.

The official also was suspected of providing large-scale employment of militia members who used Health Ministry facilities and services for "sectarian kidnapping and murder," the military said.

Joint U.S.-Iraqi forces stormed the Health Ministry compound early today, causing all the employees to flee, spokesman Qassim Yahya said.

One of Mr. al-Zamili's bodyguards said he heard gunshots, then the Americans asked him to step aside and approached the deputy health minister, who introduced himself by name and title. A U.S. soldier told Mr. al-Zamili he was on a list of wanted names and handcuffed him before leading him away, the bodyguard said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

The U.S. Embassy, meanwhile, said U.S. officials were investigating a Jan. 31 incident involving a civilian helicopter after the New York times reported that insurgents had brought the chopper down with ground fire during a flight between Hillah and Baghdad.

If confirmed, it would be the sixth helicopter to crash in Iraq since Jan. 20, prompting the U.S. military to review flight operations. The most recent crash occurred yesterday when a CH-46 Sea Knight went down northwest of Baghdad, killing seven persons.

Iraq, U.S. Advised To Avoid Offensive Against Militiamen (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 8 -- Iraqi and U.S. forces should not launch a military offensive against the militias -- most of them Shiite -- that are a major source of turmoil in Iraq, but should instead rely on nonviolent steps to bring militiamen into the political fold, according to an Iraqi report that draws largely on the views of prominent Shiite politicians.

"In the short-term at least, there can be no military offensive against the militias. Military confrontation, in the current climate, will only strengthen their appeal and swell their ranks," the Baghdad Institute for Public Policy Research concludes.

The institute said the 18-page report, "Dismantling Iraq's Militias," was based on a round-table discussion by six Shiite politicians, two Kurds and a Sunni Arab. Government officials said Thursday it would be considered in setting policy, but some here saw it as reflecting the private thinking of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as more U.S. troops arrive to try to end the violence.

Maliki has publicly declared that the joint effort will target all lawbreakers equally, regardless of sectarian affiliation. But late last year, his advisers said the prime minister was urging the Americans to combat Sunni groups while Iraqi forces focused on Shiite militias.

"The tense situation between the Mahdi Army militia and the U.S. military means that it would be unwise for multinational forces to go into Shia strongholds at this stage," the report says. The Mahdi Army is led by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, a key Maliki supporter.

Many Iraqi officials say previous Baghdad security plans failed because Maliki did not take a tough stance against that militia.

"I don't want to see the prime minister again violating his commitment," said Tariq al-Hashemi, an Iraqi vice president who leads the most powerful Sunni Arab party. The report's goals would be a "complete deviation of what has been agreed upon from the beginning by the political entities," he said in an interview. "I don't support the theme that the militias could be accommodated or be resolved by the political process," he added.

The report reflects "the government's point of view," said Mahmoud Othman, a Sunni Kurd and a legislator who was a member of the round table. "This prime minister won't go against Sadr or the Mahdi Army. Those people are his supporters." Like other participants, Othman had not been given the finished report and commented based on a reporter's description.

Ahmed Shames, a member of Maliki's media office who was a co-author of the report, said in an interview that it will be widely read in the government, but "it does not mean the government will follow these recommendations."

Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Maliki and one of the politicians involved in the discussions, said the report emerged from frank discussion and did not necessarily represent the prime minister's views. Rikabi reiterated that Maliki will use force against anyone regardless of sect if political solutions are not possible.

The only Sunni Arab in the round table, Mithal al-Alusi, said he was unaware of the report's publication and angered that his name was attached to a document that did not represent his views. "The Dawa party, they organized this meeting in the name of the Baghdad Institute," Alusi said, referring to Maliki's political party. "More than one [participant], not just me, said there is no place for a political solution for killers, militias and terrorists."

The report outlines a three-phase approach to solving Iraq's militia problem. The short-term goal, over a period of about two years, is to use government forces for "defensive military campaigns" to break the cycle of violence in Baghdad. This will deprive militias of their role of protecting embattled neighborhoods, the report says. The second phase would be provision of such services as clearing sewers and cleaning and paving streets. The final step would be integration of some militiamen into the security forces or civil service in a way that holds their political patrons accountable for any crimes they commit.

U.S. Says Airstrike Kills 13 Insurgents (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 8 -- U.S. forces used precision-guided munitions to kill 13 Sunni insurgents west of Baghdad on Thursday and aided Iraqi officials in the detention of a deputy cabinet minister accused of funneling money to a Shiite militia, the U.S. military said.

A doctor and a resident of the area said women and children were killed in the airstrike, but a military spokesman denied there were any civilian casualties.

The strike in Amiriyah targeted two suspected safe houses used by insurgents, a military statement said. U.S. forces said they later detained five suspected insurgents and found weapons including armor-piercing ammunition.

Ahmad Mansoor al-Zubaie, who lives near the scene of the airstrike, said it was aimed at two houses, but destroyed two additional homes.

Another resident, Muhammad Khalaf al-Zubaie, said women and children were killed in the attack.

Muhammad Ismail, a physician who works at Fallujah General Hospital, said more than 30 people wounded or killed in the attack were brought to the hospital. He said in a telephone interview that women and children were among the dead.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, said no civilians were killed. "After an airstrike we put what we call boots on the objective," he said. "We send in an exploration team to see what effect we had. They would see 40 civilians killed in an airstrike and we would report that if it had happened."

Muhammad al-Zubaie also said the target of the attack was Abu Sihail al-Zubaie, a leader of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Also Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi officials detained a deputy minister of health accused of funneling millions of dollars to the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia, according to the U.S. military and Health Minister Ali Hussein al-Shamari.

Shamari called the detention a "kidnapping" and criticized the way the officials took Hakim al-Zamili, one of his deputies. "They broke a door, they broke a window. And they humiliated my employees badly," Shamari said in an interview.

The U.S. military said in a statement that a senior Health Ministry official "is suspected of being a central figure in alleged corruption and rogue infiltration" of the ministry by the Mahdi Army. The statement did not name Zamili.

The detained official allegedly orchestrated several kickback schemes that directed millions of dollars to the militia "to support sectarian attacks and violence targeting Iraqi civilians," the U.S. military statement said. The military also said the senior health official had been implicated in the deaths of several ministry officials.

Shamari said he was not in a position to dispute the allegations, but said the military should have gone through proper channels before making the arrest.

Two deadly incidents involving American private security companies were disclosed Thursday.

Snipers working for one company fatally shot three guards working at the state-run al-Iraqiya television station in Baghdad on Wednesday morning, the director of the station's parent company said in an interview.

The security contractors were accompanying foreign dignitaries who were visiting the Justice Ministry, which is across the street from the station's headquarters, said Habib al-Sadr of the Iraqi Media Network.

Sadr said the three slain guards, Azhar Abdullah Ali, Nibras Muhammad Dawood and Sabah Salman Hassoon, were all in their early 20s. "Not a single bullet was shot toward the ministry building," he said.

The Iraqi guards "had full control of themselves not to attack back. I gave orders, personally gave orders, not to shoot back so that things didn't get worse and we didn't lose more men."

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Iraq, said the incident was under investigation.

It was unclear what company the contractors worked for and whether they were escorting U.S. diplomats.

Also Thursday, defense contractor KBR, a Halliburton subsidiary formerly known as Kellogg Brown and Root, said U.S. military personnel fatally shot a KBR truck driver and wounded another employee near a checkpoint outside a military facility in Balad, north of Baghdad.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with the family of the truck driver who was killed," Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said in an e-mail. "The wounded truck driver was transported to the Air Force Theater Hospital and has since been treated and released."

Another KBR employee, Hector PatiÃ±o, 58, was killed Jan. 13 in the Green Zone in Baghdad in another apparent friendly-fire incident.

Norcross said she could not release the names of the employees shot Wednesday. The U.S. military in Baghdad did not respond to an e-mail inquiry about the incident.

Fintor, the embassy spokesman, said the death was under investigation.

KBR has lost 98 employees to "hostile action" in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait, Norcross said.

Also Thursday, the military disclosed the deaths of four Marines killed in two incidents in Anbar province in western Iraq.

In Balad, a police official said armed men dressed in Iraqi military uniforms attacked a farmhouse northeast of the city early Thursday, killing 16 members of a Sunni family and wounding two. The home belonged to Amar Fadhil Rufaie, said Capt. Hassan al-Rufaie.

A neighbor, Amad Rufaie, said 12 cars entered the farm area and heavy gunfire ensued. When he went to see what had happened, he found 18 people on the ground, all but two of them dead. Many people in the area belong to the Rufaie tribe.

Shiite District, Flash Point In Baghdad, Rebuilds (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 8 — Just past the main checkpoint into Sadr City, children kick soccer balls at goals with new green nets, on fields where mounds of trash covered the ground last summer. A few blocks away, city workers plant palm trees by the road, while men gather at a cafe nearby to chatter and laugh.

Sadr City, once infamous as a fetid slum and symbol of Shiite subjugation, is recovering, with the help of $41 million in reconstruction funds from the Shiite-led government, all of it spent since May, according to Iraqi officials, and millions more in American assistance.

But as Shiite areas like Sadr City begin to thrive as self-enclosed fiefs, middle-class Sunni enclaves are withering into abandoned ghettos, starved of government services.

Many residents credit a Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, and its powerful political leader, the radical cleric Moktada al-Sadr, for keeping the area safe enough to allow rebuilding. Yet the Mahdi Army has also killed American troops and has been linked to death squads preying on Sunnis, making the district a potential target as American troops pour into Baghdad to enforce the new security plan.

The neighborhood, which is Baghdad's largest Shiite area and was named in honor of Mr. Sadr's father, is a web of contradictions, at once a test of whether its progress can be sustained, a flash point for sectarian tensions and the heart of the government's political and military base.

"Sadr City is different because it has been left without services for 35 years," said Hassan al-Shimmari, a Shiite member of Parliament with the Fadila Party. "And with the presence of the Mahdi Army, and its agenda against the Americans — that is what makes it disturbing."

Over three days of interviews in homes, businesses and political offices, residents described their community as tight-knit, often abused and increasingly isolated.

Abdul Karim Kassem, the prime minister in the late 1950s and early 1960s, built the neighborhood as a public housing project for the poor. The rectangle of roughly 125,000 homes northeast of central Baghdad covered an area about half the size of Manhattan, with streets in a grid and simple brick homes of about 1,550 square feet.

DOJ_NMG_0129970

These days, after decades of neglect under Saddam Hussein (though the area was once called Saddam City), many of the houses have been divided into apartments and many more are crumbling.

Sadr City officials, including Rahim al-Daraji, the elected mayor, claim that more than two million people live there, almost all Shiites but with a smattering still of Sunnis and Kurds.

If that number is correct, the district has a higher population density than Calcutta or Hong Kong, which demographers say is unlikely, given the low-rise architecture.

Undeniably, Sadr City has grown in recent months as families moved in from what Iraqis call hot zones, typically Sunni areas where violence has brought daily routines to a standstill. Schools are packed with children, rents have increased and the economy has come alive.

More surprising than the pyramids of fruit at the bustling market, near a park with new red fences, are the signs of leisure, like the new children's bicycles with tassels on the handlebars and the silvery computer shops.

"Our neighborhood is much better than other areas," said Hussail Allawi, 41, in a crowd of men smoking flavored tobacco, a pastime now rare in much of the city. "The people are cooperative. There are many volunteers, including the Mahdi Army, and we are doing our best."

City officials said 16 sewer mains had been cleaned to eliminate the putrid waste that once collected in large puddles, while 22 roads are to be repaved.

Louis J. Fintor, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, said American agencies were also working on more than 35 projects, mostly in health and education. He did not identify their locations or say how much money had been spent. "Getting credit," he said, "is not the motivating force."

Abu Firas al-Amtari, a spokesman for the Sadr political party in Sadr City, said the American and Iraqi governments spent reconstruction money haphazardly. But he acknowledged that the neighborhood was gaining momentum.

"The situation inside is very good," he said in an interview. "We are always afraid of what comes from other neighborhoods."

Bombings here have become less common than in other parts of Baghdad, though a coordinated series of explosions last fall killed 144 people. Residents and Sadr party officials said they felt more secure because the Mahdi Army kept watch. As members of the community, militiamen have an advantage.

"The Mahdi are more loyal because they feel they are protecting their own families," said Ahmed Hashem, 30.

Sadr officials have seized on a simpler refrain: The Mahdi Army makes peace, not war.

Mr. Amtari described the militants as humanitarians, community volunteers and part of "a moral army" that checked vehicles and enforced the law. Naeem al-Kabbi, a deputy mayor affiliated with the Sadr party, said the battles between American troops and the militia in Najaf and Sadr City in 2004 amounted to a misunderstanding — though American troops said they had come under attack while doing little more than running patrols.

Seemingly determined to clean the tarnished Mahdi image, Sadr officials said the militia's members would disarm temporarily during the Baghdad security plan, even if Sunnis or Americans attacked. "Whatever the provocation, with the surge against us or anything else, we will not kidnap anyone or take revenge by ourselves," said Mr. Daraji, the mayor, who has been negotiating with American and Iraqi officials over the role of the militia. "We will leave everything to the government."

Sunni officials said Sadr officials had calculated that if they stayed quiet for the security plan, American troops would eventually withdraw, giving Shiites even more freedom to exercise power.

Salim Abdullah, a senior Sunni member of Parliament, added that the security plan's impact would be blunted in Sadr City because Shiite militias had infiltrated the Iraqi security forces, and could tip off Mahdi militants before raids began.

An open question is whether all the Mahdi fighters will obey orders not to fight. Some residents, who declined to give their names, described the Mahdi Army as a loose collection of often rival and rogue groups, and said arrests — on, say, an especially volatile anti-American street — could set off firefights with the arrestees' families and neighbors, even if senior Mahdi commanders remained uninvolved.

But like the streets themselves, the community's relationship with the militia seemed to be changing. The Sadr organization, whose members once whipped people on the streets for selling alcohol, now works out of a centrally located office that has expanded from a squat one-story building into a small campus with fresh white paint and a covered courtyard. It has the feel of an American post office.

Residents said the building reflected the move from insurgent group to established player. After winning control of six ministries and 30 seats in Parliament, residents said, the Sadrists have become a more traditionally political, less religious force, with leaders primarily interested in safety and power.

There is still a saying in Sadr City that if you anger the Mahdi, "They'll throw you in the trunk," a reference to their notorious gangsterism. And the American military has clearly taken a harder line. Citing evidence that militia members killed Americans and innocent civilians, American troops have arrested or killed several Mahdi commanders in recent weeks as part of their efforts to pacify the capital.

In the latest move, on Thursday, American forces raided the Health Ministry and detained a deputy minister whom they accused of ferrying weapons and militants across Sadr City in ambulances to thwart American raids.

Some residents and officials acknowledge that their sprawling neighborhood includes men who contribute to Baghdad's cycle of violence. One resident said few people had protested the recent increase in American raids because it was clear that some members of the Mahdi Army cared less for the neighborhood than they did for killing and cash.

But in interviews, even critics of the Mahdi Army said that security and economics mattered most, and that as long as the militia kept the neighborhood safe enough to function, it could count on tacit support.

Mr. Allawi, the man smoking at the cafe, said "the people are satisfied" with the spoils of Sadr control.

Muhammad Issa Sachit, 38, a mechanic for the city government who has lived and worked in Sadr City for more than 20 years, said families received a stable fuel supply at competitive prices from the Mahdi Army, more than what most Baghdad communities could depend on.

He also said that when a Sunni neighbor died in a bombing a few months ago, the Mahdi Army rushed in to help the family. "They paid for everything — the funeral, the burial, the food," he said.

The man's wife and children left soon afterward. The house was still empty last week.

Mr. Sachit denied that the family's move had anything to do with a fear of Shiites. Sitting on a green rug in his simple home, he seemed to feel that his neighbor's death was mainly a story of Mahdi Army generosity.

Thousands Displaced As Unrest Grows (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Neighborhoods where Sunnis

and Shiites live side by side are vanishing as residents flee, seeking safety among their own sects

A few weeks ago, young men carrying AK-47 rifles left a note on the door of Ayad al-Hiti's house. The note used a slur on al-Hiti's Sunni religion, called him a collaborator with Sunni extremists, and gave him 48 hours to leave.

Having seen several neighbors turn up dead, al-Hiti, his wife and three children moved the next day. They left their religiously mixed neighborhood and moved into his in-laws' house in a safer area north of Baghdad. The family now shares three bedrooms and one bath among 17 people.

More than 540,000 Iraqis have left their homes over the past year because of sectarian violence, according to a recent estimate by the International Medical Corps (IMC), a relief organization operating in Iraq.

About 90% of displaced Iraqis move elsewhere within the country, the IMC says, usually joining members of their own sect. The resulting separation of Baghdad into more distinct Shiite and Sunni areas has made it easier for militias to attack each other, posing a major challenge to Iraqi and U.S. forces as they implement a security plan in coming months.

The militias "might use heavy artillery because there wouldn't be a danger of harming their own people," says Rabih Torbay, vice president for international operations at the IMC. "The situation (in Baghdad) is looking more and more similar to what happened in Yugoslavia."

"Our only hope now is the new security plan, and the new U.S. strategy in Iraq," says al-Hiti, a taxi driver. "We don't trust this sectarian government at all. They promised a lot but did nothing."

In areas of Baghdad such as Ghazaliya, a neighborhood of about 7,000, clear battle lines have appeared on city streets.

The Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia run by anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, is methodically pushing the majority Sunnis out of their homes and working its way south, U.S. Army Capt. Erik Peterson says.

About half a mile south of the current sectarian dividing line, the U.S. military has set up a combat outpost manned by about 200 Iraqi and U.S. soldiers, says Peterson, who leads the outpost. The sectarian fighting in Ghazaliya is some of the most intense in Baghdad, he says.

Such divisions recall the infamous "Green Line" that divided Beirut into Christian and Muslim areas during Lebanon's 1975-91 civil war. When sectarian lines become more stark, fighters on both sides feel freer to use bigger bombs and more powerful weapons, Torbay says.

The Iraqi government says its new security plan, which includes an additional 21,500 troops sent by President Bush, will attempt to halt the trend.

"Part of the plan is to bring the families back to their homes by directing force against the people that made them leave. (We will) escort them and declare that it will be safe for them to go back," said Ali al-Dabagh, a spokesman for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Al-Dabagh would not provide details on when or how that would happen. But he said there would be "no difference between the Sunni or the Shia. The security plan covers all of Baghdad."

About 2 million Iraqis have fled the country since the U.S. invasion in 2003, according to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The IMC says migration within Iraq accelerated dramatically in February 2006, when al-Qaeda agents bombed two Shiite shrines in Samarra, unleashing a wave of sectarian violence.

Sattar Jabbar, 41, a father of four and a Shiite imam at the al-Jalaika mosque in al-Hahama district north of Baghdad, says about a third of the residents in his once-mixed district have left.

"We used to live as neighbors for centuries, and there were no problems between us at all," Jabbar says. "We have married their women, and they have married our women. We attended their parties and wakes, and they did the same. But after the bombings of Samarra, things collapsed between us."

First, a stranger called Jabbar and threatened to kill him unless he changed his prayer call from Shiite to Sunni. In August, a caller ordered him to leave the mosque. Then, Sunnis put up a roadblock and "began to kill every single Shiite passing that way," Jabbar says.

In mid-January, Jabbar took his wife and four children to live with his wife's parents and her brother. Since then, his old neighborhood has been under mortar attack.

"Our last hope is the new government security plan," Jabbar says. "If it works, all things will succeed. But if it fails, there will be no other solution, and civil war will really break out."

Baghdad Traffic Police Expect The Unexpected (USAT)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

On a typical day, Baghdad's traffic police deal with gunfire, militias and speeding convoys with armed men.

And, oh yeah, there's also the traffic.

With stoplights often dead because of blackouts, security checkpoints blocking many roads and more cars than ever circulating in the city, Baghdad's 1,700 traffic cops have their hands full.

"We keep working because life does not stop despite the hard circumstances Iraq is witnessing now," says Col. Mohammed al-Azzawi, a traffic policeman.

It's dangerous duty. A new Traffic Police Directorate website devotes a section to "traffic martyrs" and displays the photographs of 45 traffic officers who have died in the line of duty.

The number of registered cars on Baghdad's streets has almost tripled since the fall of Saddam Hussein and the end of sanctions imposed by the United Nations. There are now more than 1 million registered vehicles in the city, according to Brig. Gen. Najim Abed, spokesman for the traffic police.

The capital is a traffic nightmare. A number of key roads and at least two bridges over the Tigris River remain blocked to traffic because of security concerns. Thirteen bridges cross the Tigris, which divides the city.

Small vendors, with more goods to sell now, are spilling out into the city's narrow streets, Abed says.

In the middle of it are the traffic police, armed with pistols and wearing blue uniforms. They wave their arms, blow whistles and try to cope with the daily stress.

Militias have set up illegal checkpoints, and U.S. and Iraqi military forces frequently barrel through the streets. Traffic police Lt. Thu al-Fiqar Saif al-Deen, who directs traffic in the Mansour neighborhood in western Baghdad, says the most disruptive convoys are Iraq's national police commandos.

"We got insults from them daily," he says. "They consider themselves above the law. They fire into the sky to terrify people. We face the same problem with the Mahdi Army," a militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

However, al-Deen says the majority of drivers respect traffic police and follow their directions.

Police can now impose fines of up to about $20 on motorists who drive on the sidewalk or go the wrong way on one-way streets.

There is even a new law banning motorists from speaking on cellphones.

If fines are not paid within 60 days, the fine is doubled.

"I know a driver who now owes 2.5 million Iraqi dinars (almost $2,000) because of that," al-Deen says. Under Saddam, fines were about $5, but police could also confiscate a motorist's car for several days as punishment.

The Traffic Police Directorate would not say what percentage of the fines they generally collect, but motorists can be prevented from selling their car if the fines are not paid.

Issuing fines is only part of what traffic police do.

On one occasion, traffic police saw a minibus driving on the wrong side of the road. "We stopped him and asked for his car documents," al-Deen says.

"He refused to give us the documents, so we removed his car plates," which would have prevented the man from driving legally.

"He became angry and threatened us," al-Deen says. "He said, 'I'm working with Americans, and I will teach you a lesson.' We raised our pistols and shot his car with 17 bullets. Then we beat him and broke his arm. He left, and we did not see him again."

Troops Shared Firm Belief In Iraq Service (WP)

Navy Medic, Marine Pleaded to Return; Other Marine Followed Brother's Path

One was a Navy medic, the other a Marine sergeant. Both begged to go back to Iraq for another tour of duty. A third followed her brother into the Marine Corps and, eventually, into the war.

All three died this week as stepped-up security operations intensified fighting.

Seaman Manuel Ruiz, 21, from Maryland's Eastern Shore was among seven people killed when a Marine transport helicopter crashed in Anbar province Wednesday, his family said.

Marine Sgt. Joshua J. Frazier, 24, from Virginia's Spotsylvania County was killed by a sniper Monday as he stood on a rooftop in Ramadi, the Pentagon and his family said yesterday.

And Marine Cpl. Jennifer M. Parcell, 20, of Bel Air, Md., died Wednesday in Anbar province in what the Defense Department described as "supporting combat operations."

In Ruiz's hometown of Federalsburg, a farm community of 2,600, friends and neighbors tied red, white and blue ribbons to lampposts yesterday, and officials made plans to lower flags in his honor. But the gestures seemed inadequate.

"Our hearts are broken," said Connie Blanchard, who works in the town hall accounting office. "He was a very brave and courageous guy."

Ruiz, whose mother, Lisa, also served in the Navy, was 14 days into his second tour in Iraq when he died, said Adam Lusk, a family friend who fought back tears as he described Ruiz's dedication to his job, helping to save lives. "He pretty much demanded to go back."

In a small town where young people often seek the military life as a way to broaden their horizons, Ruiz also stood out as a talented and sensitive artist, said Marjorie Scott, who was Ruiz's art teacher during his four years at Colonel Richardson High School. When he was back from his first tour, Ruiz visited the school in his Navy uniform.

"Any time he talked about the military, his eyes glistened," she said. She said she had worried about him, but he assured her that he was fulfilling his calling. He was assigned to Camp Lejeune, N.C.

"He was well-trained, and he loved what he was doing," Scott said.

Likewise, Frazier believed so deeply in his mission in Iraq that he ignored pleas from his family and begged, pleaded and knocked on doors to get the Marines to send him back to Iraq. It was his third time in combat after previous tours in Afghanistan and Iraq.

He enlisted in the military because of the 2001 terrorist attacks and had recently been promoted to sergeant, his family said.

His elder stepbrother, Aaron Mallin, said Frazier's devotion to the cause was matched by a lifelong interest in stepping in to look after others.

When he was 18, he came home with a black eye. When his brother asked where the shiner had come from, Frazier said he had stepped into a quarrel when he'd seen a man hit a woman.

At home, he looked after his maternal grandmother, Elaine Tate, whom everyone knew as Meemaw. If she needed wood chopped, he did it. If her gutters were clogged, he cleaned them. When the nation was attacked, he felt he had to go.

"He is my little brother, and I idolized him," Mallin said. "It's supposed to be the other way around."

Frazier wanted to be a police officer after graduating from high school, but after Sept. 11, he decided he was going to join the Marines, Mallin said. His mother, Shelia Cutshall, tried to talk him out of it. So did Mallin. They told him not to make a rash decision in anger. They told him to wait a year.

Ten months later, Frazier told them he was still determined to become a Marine. His elder brother, who works for a defense contractor, also tried to persuade his brother to pursue jobs with the Marines that might reduce the risks of combat. But that was not for him.

"He wanted to be an infantryman. He wanted to be a grunt," Mallin said. In telephone calls and notes from Iraq, he expressed concern about the men in his unit with wives and children. "You got the sense that if he could, he would send them home," Mallin said. "He really was quite honorable and passionate about what he did."

Mallin said his younger brother was "fed up" by the mounting doubts expressed back home. After returning from a seven-month tour in April, he began lobbying to go back.

"He begged. He pleaded. He asked for transfers," Mallin said. "Everybody in the family wanted to talk him out of it. But they knew they couldn't."

His family said Frazier asked to be buried near family. A private funeral is to be held at the Montague Baptist Church in Dogue.

Mourners at Parcell's home yesterday declined to be quoted but remembered her as a loving and motivated woman who joined the Marines in 2005, following the path of her older brother Joseph.

The two served together in Iraq briefly before their assignments separated them. Joseph is returning from his tour to be with the family, people at the home said.

Parcell served with the Marine Expeditionary Force based in Okinawa, Japan.

Marine Accused Of Murder, Kidnapping Withdraws Guilty Plea (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

A military judge granted a Marine corporal's request Thursday to withdraw his guilty plea to charges of murdering an unarmed Iraqi civilian who was dragged from his home and shot.

Cpl. Trent Thomas asked to change the plea, saying he no longer believes he is guilty. Thomas now says he believes he was following a lawful order.

"Sir, when my country gives me an order, I follow it," Thomas told the judge, Lt. Col. Tracy Daley.

Thomas, 25, pleaded guilty Jan. 18 to eight felonies including kidnapping, murder and assault. He was one of a squad of seven Marines and a sailor accused last year of hatching a plot to kill an Iraqi in the town of Hamdania. Four others pleaded guilty to lesser charges. Thomas, the squad's second in command, could face life in prison.

The request to withdraw those pleas came at the beginning of the second day of Thomas' sentencing hearing.

On Wednesday, the Navy medic, who said he was one of Thomas' closest friends, testified that the Marine corporal played an instrumental role in carrying out the kidnapping and murder.

Seaman Recruit Melson J. Bacos testified that Thomas, along with Cpl. Marshall Magincalda, entered the home of Hashim Ibrahim Awad's on April 26 while Bacos and Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington waited outside. Thomas and Magincalda returned with a confused-looking Awad, Bacos said, then the troops started walking him away from the house.

For much of that march, Thomas held onto Awad, Bacos said.

"He was grabbing him, pushing him forward," Bacos said. "If he was talking, he told him to shut up, be quiet."

Bacos said the squad forced Awad into a hole and shot him, then tried to cover it up by placing an AK-47 and shovel by his body to make it look like he was an insurgent planting a bomb.

Prosecutors — as well as other squad members who made plea deals — have said the troops wanted to kill an Iraqi insurgent they suspected of planting bombs. They couldn't find the man, and instead kidnapped Awad, according to court testimony.

Bacos, testifying about 12 feet from where Thomas sat, did not make eye contact with his friend, whom he met in 2004 and served with on an earlier Iraq combat tour. When a prosecutor asked Bacos whether it was difficult to testify about Thomas, he said, "It's not easy at all, sir."

Thomas' wife, Erica Thomas, said outside court that her husband is a Christian and a good father to their 2-year-old daughter, and that he bears no anger toward his colleagues or the Marine Corps for prosecuting him.

"He's got no animosity toward anyone," Erica Thomas said. "He would re-enlist in the Marines if he could."

Judge Clears Contractor Of Fraud In Iraq (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Custer Battles Handled Baghdad Airport Security

A federal judge has dismissed a civil case against a military contractor accused of improperly billing Iraq reconstruction authorities for tens of millions of dollars worth of security services that it did not provide.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria said there was no evidence that Custer Battles, a firm started by Army veterans Scott Custer and Michael Battles, committed fraud under a $16.8 million contract to provide security at the Baghdad International Airport in 2003.

"It gives them the vindication they deserve," said Robert T. Rhoad, an attorney for Custer and Battles. "They've been fighting these legal battles for the last three years to try to clear their names from these irresponsible claims that have been made by their competitors."

The case is one of two brought against Custer Battles over its work in Iraq for the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion until a government was elected. A jury found the company, which had offices in Northern Virginia, liable for fraud in an earlier case, but Ellis dismissed that verdict. He ruled that it was improper to bring the charges up in U.S. court because the authority was not a U.S. entity.

Yesterday's ruling involved a second case brought under a federal whistle-blower statute by Robert Isakson, who worked for a Custer Battles subcontractor, and William D. Baldwin, who worked for Custer Battles. They alleged that the company failed to make good on a commitment to provide 138 people as part of its airport security contract. Instead, Alan Grayson, an attorney for Isakson and Baldwin, said Custer Battles moved airport personnel to other contracts and illegally double-billed for their work.

Ellis, however, ruled that the contract didn't call for a specific number of security personnel, and he found that Custer Battles did not knowingly commit fraud.

Grayson said his clients planned to appeal both cases to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond. He pointed to the testimony of Col. Richard Ballard, a former Army inspector general in Iraq, saying that Custer Battles should not have charged the CPA for security services because they were not needed; the airport terminal had already been secured by about 21,000 allied troops.

"The judge disregarded evidence of fraud that was in the record, including evidence that was found by a top U.S. official in charge of fettering out fraud in Iraq," Grayson said. "We believe that all these issues have to be decided by a jury."

Charles Tiefer, a government-contracting professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law, said the judge's ruling "means that taxpayers are going to have great trouble recovering any of the money lost by contractor abuses in Iraq."

"He's requiring a high level of proof that a contractor that obtained a juicy award on dubious grounds was 100 percent fully aware that it was planning to cheat the government," Tiefer said.

Rice Authorizes Talks With Syria On Iraqi Refugee Crisis (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice revealed that she had authorized diplomatic talks with Syria about the Iraqi refugee crisis, despite a continuing freeze on high-level contacts with Damascus.

Rice told a congressional panel that she had instructed the US charge d'affaires in Damascus, Michael Corbin, to meet with the Syrians as part of a new US initiative to tackle a growing Iraqi refugee crisis.

"We have a charge there who does have discussions with the Syrians about a variety of things," she said.

"But I have authorized him explicitly to talk to the Syrians about the issue of refugees."

Officials made clear this did not represent a break with standing US policy not to have high-level diplomatic dealings with the government of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, which Washington accuses of backing anti-US extremists in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian areas.

"This is consistent and in keeping with our existing relationship with Syria and not something that represents any kind of change in that approach," a senior State Department official said.

"Syria plays into it only to the extent that Syria is a prime location for Iraqi refugees," the official said. Between 600,000 and one million Iraqis are believed to be living in Syria.

The administration of President George W. Bush has been under pressure from domestic critics and overseas allies alike to enter into a dialogue with Syria and Iran as part of a broad diplomatic push to stabilize Iraq and further peace efforts in Lebanon and between Israelis and Palestinians.

But he and Rice have refused, arguing that the allied states would seek unacceptable concessions in exchange for their help.

In a sign of the continuing tensions, Syrian Vice President Faruq al-Shara Thursday blamed Washington for the "humanitarian catastrophe" involving Iraqi refugees.

The influx of refugees has "imposed heavy economic, social and security burdens" on Syria, he said.

According to the United Nations, about two million Iraqis out of a population of 26 million have fled the country to escape the war and mounting sectarian violence, many going to Syria and neighboring Jordan.

Another 1.8 million have been forced to flee their homes to safer areas inside Iraq.

Washington has been accused of not doing enough to help the millions of people displaced by the war it unleashed nearly four years ago, having taken in fewer than 500 Iraqi refugees since 2003.

In response, Rice announced on Monday the creation of a high-level task force to look into the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0129976

The group force will examine what additional help the United Nations needs to deal with the immediate humanitarian needs of Iraqi refugees both inside Iraq and in neighboring countries, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

It will also examine how to speed up processing refugees for resettlement, including in the United States, he said.

Rice is scheduled to meet here next week with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Antonio Guterres, to discuss the issue, Casey added.

The United States withdrew its ambassador from Syria after accusing Damascus of involvement in the February 2005 assassination in Beirut of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri, an outspoken critic of Syria's occupation of his country.

But Washington maintains its embassy in Damascus and Corbin and other diplomats are in regular contact with their Syrian counterparts, Casey said.

Syria: Won't Force Iraqis To Return (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, February 9, 2007

Syria will not force any Iraqi refugees to return to their homeland despite the exchange of harsh words between the two countries, the U.N. refugee chief said Thursday.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Antonio Guterres thanked Syria for absorbing a large number of Iraqis who fled the violence in their war-torn country.

Guterres spoke during a visit to a public clinic in Damascus' al-Sayda Zeinab suburb, where many Iraqi refugees live. Earlier in the day, he discussed the status of refugees with Syria's vice president, interior minister and deputy foreign minister.

Iraqis in Syria say they now get a 15-day permit to stay, after which they have to apply for a three-month permit that can be renewed once. After six months, if an Iraqi is not a student or does not have a business or a job, he or she has to leave the country for at least 30 days before being allowed back in again.

In the past, Iraqis needed only an exit stamp in their passports, and many drove to the border and re-entered the same day. No Syrian official has confirmed the measure pertaining to the 30-day stay outside Syria.

But Interior Minister Bassam Abdul-Majid said Iraqis would henceforth have to apply for an official resident permit after 15 days of entering Syria, the Syrian Arab News Agency reported Thursday.

The measure is meant to bring order to issuing residential permits for Iraqis, and help create an accurate count of refugees, Abdul-Majid said.

No Iraqis have been deported so far, he said.

Guterres described talks with Syrian leaders as "very open and frank."

They "were clearly saying that they consider these Iraqis as sisters and brothers and they will not be pushed or forced to go to Iraq. I think that is a very important statement," Guterres said.

Last week, Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh accused Syria of putting thousands of Iraqis in difficult conditions. He also said half the foreign insurgents in Iraq enter the country from Syria.

Guterres has also visited Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Jordan on a tour to push for assistance for the refugees.

Syria, with a population of 18 million, has some 800,000 Iraqi refugees and 500,000 Palestinians. The country also received about 1 million Lebanese refugees in the summer war between Israel and the Islamic militant Hezbollah last year.

Turkish Official Warns Against Vote On Kirkuk (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul warned yesterday that a referendum planned this year on the status of the Iraqi city of Kirkuk should be canceled or else the outcome might widen the sectarian violence that has largely left the northern part of Iraq untouched.

Under Iraq's constitution, the oil-rich city will be able to decide whether to join the Kurdish-dominated Kurdistan region. Turkey, plagued by terrorist attacks by Kurdish separatist rebels, is concerned that control of the city by the semiautonomous Kurdistan would give the region the economic clout to break free from Iraq.

Gul, in a lunch with Washington Post editors and reporters, argued that Kirkuk is an ethnically mixed city, "a small Iraq," and thus should receive a negotiated separate status that keeps it apart from the Kurdish region. Historically there were large percentages of Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens in the city, but former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein attempted to "Arabize" the city. Now, in advance of the vote, Arabs and Turkmens have been driven out, and as many as 350,000 Kurds have flooded the city of 1 million people.

"If Kirkuk is included in one region, that will be a big mistake," Gul said. "Some people want to escape from this bad situation, but they should not fall into a worse situation." Partition of Iraq, he said, "will be the worst situation."

Analysts believe the Kurds will prevail in a vote, but Gul said ethnic groups such as the Turkmens will probably boycott it, depriving the result of legitimacy. He exclaimed: "You think the problem will be solved. No, the problem will get big!"

Turkish officials have warned that they may intervene if the vote goes against their interests. Gul declined to say what would happen, but he pointedly noted that Turkey currently provides Kurdistan with its electricity and 90 percent of its gasoline. He said Turkey is eager for Kurdistan to thrive as part of a stable Iraq.

"You want to think we are against the Kurds," he said. "That is wrong."

Gul said he raised Turkey's concerns about the referendum with U.S. officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in meetings this week. "I saw an awareness about this problem," he said. "Last year it was not like that."

Gul further warned that Washington must take action against militants from the Kurdistan Workers' Party, holed up in Kurdistan. He noted that Turkey is an active contributor of troops to Afghanistan but said, "We don't accept a double standard here," indicating that Turkish patience is ending.

Gul reiterated concerns that strong U.S.-Turkish relations would be shattered if Congress passes a resolution to condemn as genocide the early-20th-century killings of up to 1.5 million Armenians. Turkey's predecessor state, the Ottoman Empire, has been blamed by most scholars for the deaths, but the Turkish government says the toll is exaggerated and the deaths were largely the result of civil unrest, not genocide.

"If it passed, there will be a real shock in Turkey" and the Turkish government would not be able to prevent popular demands to stop cooperating with the United States, Gul said.

Italy Asks U.S. For Judicial Cooperation (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

The Foreign Ministry on Thursday urged the United States to cooperate on judicial matters after a court indicted a U.S. soldier for the fatal shooting of an Italian intelligence agent at a checkpoint in Baghdad.

Spc. Mario Lozano, a member of the New York-based 69th Infantry Regiment, was indicted Wednesday for murder and attempted murder in the death of Nicola Calipari, who was shot in 2005 on his way by car to Baghdad's airport shortly after securing the release of an Italian journalist who had been kidnapped.

Another agent, who was driving the car, and the journalist, Giuliana Sgrena, were wounded.

Italy has not sought Lozano's extradition so far but prosecutors have lamented that U.S. authorities have not responded to requests for more details about the soldier and haven't passed on to him documents concerning the investigation.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Pasquale Ferrara stressed that the Italian judiciary had taken an "independent and autonomous initiative," but said the two countries should cooperate under a treaty of mutual assistance.

"All the opportunities for bilateral cooperation offered by the treaty of mutual judicial assistance that is in effect between Italy and the United States must be fully taken," Ferrara said during a briefing at the ministry.

The comments were made ahead of scheduled talks later Thursday between Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema and U.S. Ambassador Ronald P. Spogli — a meeting that comes amid recent friction in relations between Washington and Rome.

The Pentagon indicated Wednesday that Lozano would not be extradited, saying it considered the incident a "closed matter." The soldier, who is set to be tried in absentia in April, has said through friends in the military that he had no idea the car was carrying the Italians.

Nerves in Rome were frayed last week by a published appeal by Washington's ambassador and envoys from Britain and four other allies for Italy to keep up its military mission in Afghanistan. While insisting that Italy would continue its commitment in Afghanistan, D'Alema criticized the appeal as interference in Italian affairs.

On Thursday evening, D'Alema, who is also deputy premier, reiterated that commitment in talks with Spogli, the Foreign Ministry said.

The meeting allowed both sides to confirm "that traditional constructive collaboration ... which characterizes the relationship between the two countries and between the two governments, and that is based on consolidated understanding and friendship and on a broad sharing of values and aims," the ministry said.

D'Alema and Spogli discussed the published appeal on Afghanistan by the allies and "agreed that the case should be considered definitively closed for good," according to the ministry.

Premier Romano Prodi has pledged to keep Italy's 1,800-member contingent in Afghanistan but far-left allies in his coalition are uneasy with the decision and are threatening to vote against refinancing the mission in an upcoming vote in parliament.

NATO Asked To Meet Promises Already Made To Afghanistan (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0129978

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

SEVILLE, Spain, Feb. 8 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, attending his first conference of NATO defense ministers, told these American allies that they must fulfill their commitments to provide troops for Afghanistan in time for a spring offensive against the Taliban.

Mr. Gates and other NATO officials said progress had already been made on one issue, getting NATO members to lift some of their individual restrictions on the types of operations their forces would be allowed to carry out in Afghanistan.

The goal of the two-day defense ministers' conference here, NATO leaders stressed, was not to obtain new promises of troops and equipment, but rather to compel the member nations to keep the promises they had already made for the organization-led force that provides security operations in Afghanistan.

However, the defense ministers also discussed a new assessment of the situation in Afghanistan prepared by Gen. John Craddock of the United States Army, who recently took over as the supreme allied commander in Europe.

General Craddock's classified review, called a Combined Joint Statement of Requirements, proposes new force levels, and NATO officials say privately that it seeks commitments of about 2,000 additional troops as well as more helicopters and transport aircraft.

Gen. David J. Richards of Britain, the previous NATO commander in Afghanistan, had said last month that unmet pledges of troops and equipment from NATO countries left him 10 to 15 percent short of the forces he needed.

NATO has about 35,000 troops in Afghanistan, about 13,000 of them American. The United States has an additional 9,000 troops in Afghanistan operating outside the NATO mission, handling tasks like specialized counterterrorism work and helping to train Afghan forces. An American, Gen. Dan K. McNeill of the Army, took command of the NATO mission this month, reporting to General Craddock.

"There are no formal decisions taken," Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the alliance's secretary general, said when asked whether the defense ministers had moved toward new troop commitments. "It also is not a force-generation meeting."

Even so, senior officials of NATO nations said more troops were needed because past pledges remained unfulfilled. But they declined to reveal the number of troops or the nations, citing diplomatic sensitivities.

"There is still a request out there for additional forces," said one senior American official traveling with Mr. Gates.

In the years since they were removed from power by the American-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, Taliban fighters there have tended to lie low during the mountainous country's harsh winter and return to action when the weather warms.

Mr. Gates said the goal this year is to have alliance forces ready to beat them to the punch.

"The spring offensive in Afghanistan should be our offensive," Mr. Gates said. "I am optimistic we are going to be successful."

Mr. Gates said he had reaffirmed to the NATO allies that he would extend for 120 days the tour of a brigade of Army troops. He also cited the United States' promise of $8.6 billion for Afghanistan's security forces and $2 billion more for economic development.

NATO officials say Germany has announced that it will add six combat aircraft to the Afghanistan effort to conduct reconnaissance missions. Other nations have said they will send more security trainers.

But Germany's offer seemed somewhat tempered by comments from Franz-Josef Jung, the defense minister. "I do not think it is right to talk about more and more military means," he said according to German press accounts. "When the Russians were in Afghanistan they had 100,000 troops and didn't win."

Asked about those comments, Mr. Gates said the NATO defense ministers had agreed it was important to adopt a comprehensive approach in Afghanistan that would include military action but also bolster programs to improve the economy and government — and to counter the narcotics trade.

American commanders have said that the NATO mission in Afghanistan has been hampered by restrictions, known as national caveats, that some governments placed on their units.

War On Taliban Nears Pivotal Mark (WT/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

The United States and its allies must launch their own offensive this spring against the Taliban in Afghanistan, a senior defense official said yesterday, calling this a pivotal time in the nearly five-year-old war there.

Previewing the message Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was to deliver to NATO allies at a meeting here yesterday and today, the official said now is the time to finally defeat the Taliban, who harbored planners of the September 11, 2001, attacks that prompted the U.S. global war on terror.

In addition, NATO's new top commander, U.S. Army Gen. John Craddock, was presenting ministers with a plan to "rebalance" the force of 35,000, using the more mobile combat units in the southern and eastern regions along the border with Pakistan where combat is expected to be most intense.

Allied officials said Gen. Craddock was seeking 1,500 to 2,000 extra combat troops in addition to the extra brigade provided by the United States and about 800 more from the British. They said he is asking for a couple of combat battalions and some support forces.

The end of winter traditionally has brought an upsurge in attacks by Taliban militants in Afghanistan, and U.S. commanders already have predicted that this spring will be even more violent than last year, when a record number of attacks included nearly 140 suicide bombings.

"We think the upcoming spring in Afghanistan is a pivotal moment in the conflict, and we're encouraging the allies to do as much as they can as soon as they can," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the planned discussions had not been presented to allies. "The offensive should be our offensive. That's the offensive we've been communicating to the allies."

The defense official said there are no plans to further increase the U.S. troop commitment to Afghanistan.

About 27,000 U.S. troops are in Afghanistan, the highest number since the start of the war in 2001. About 15,000 of those troops are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 35,000, while the other 12,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

Mr. Gates, who was making his first appearance at a NATO defense ministers meeting, began a series of private meetings with his colleagues yesterday.

Mr. Gates has said he thinks there is a need for more military trainers to work with the Afghan army.

The call for a spring offensive comes just three weeks after Mr. Gates made his first trip to Afghanistan, which was followed quickly by his decision to increase U.S. troop levels there by several thousand. He ordered a brigade -- or about 3,200 soldiers -- from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division to extend their tour in Afghanistan by four months.

Mr. Gates, who took over the job in late December after the resignation of Donald H. Rumsfeld, will spend about two days at the NATO meeting, then go on to Munich for the annual security conference.

Bombing Campaign Intensifies In Afghanistan (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Air Force uses precision systems against Taliban

The Pentagon is ramping up its bombing campaign in Afghanistan as it plans a major offensive against the resurgent Taliban in the spring.

Close-air-support missions flown by U.S. Air Force pilots increased nearly 80% in the first five weeks of 2007 compared with the same period last year, records show. In such missions, aircraft attack enemy ground forces in close proximity to friendly forces.

The Air Force plans to send in dozens more precision bomb-targeting systems that allow troops on the ground to call in close-air-support missions within a few hundred yards of their own position.

That technology, called ROVER (Remotely Operated Video Enhanced Receiver), allows troops on the ground to share video with pilots in attack aircraft so they both see the target simultaneously, said Lt. Col. Greg Harbin, one of the lead officers on the Air Force ROVER program. He plans to deliver 50 systems to coalition forces in Afghanistan in March.

Along with increasing the effectiveness of airstrikes, the systems will reduce the number of "friendly fire" incidents that have strained relations between U.S. and allied militaries, Harbin said.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates said NATO allies agreed Thursday on a strategy that includes fighting the Taliban, developing the government and economy and training and equipping the Afghan army.

The Taliban has gotten more aggressive each spring, Gates said. The fundamentalist Islamic theocracy ran Afghanistan until ousted by U.S. and allied forces in 2001.

"It's important we knock that back," Gates said of the Taliban's expected offensive. His remarks came after a meeting with defense ministers from NATO countries.

Last month, President Bush asked Congress to spend $10 billion in Afghanistan over the next two years — $8 billion to train and equip Afghan security forces and $2 billion to fund reconstruction projects. The Pentagon also announced Jan. 25 that 3,200 U.S. soldiers with the 10th Mountain Division will stay in Afghanistan four more months to bolster the force there.

There are about 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan: 13,000 of them work with NATO troops in the International Security Assistance Force; 8,000 train Afghan troops and mount counterterrorist operations.

Two NATO nations, Denmark and Lithuania, agreed Thursday to bolster their contingents in Afghanistan. Franz-Josef Jung, Germany's defense minister, questioned the need to for more troops.

"I do not think it is right to talk about more and more military means," Jung said. "When the Russians were in Afghanistan, they had 100,000 troops and didn't win."

Gates said some NATO nations lifted restrictions on how and where their troops are used. He did not provide specifics on the restrictions, also called caveats.

The caveats placed on allied troops have stymied U.S. efforts to counter the Taliban insurgency. Some restrictions involve a refusal to fight in bad weather or in certain parts of the country, said a November report by the Congressional Research Service (CRS).

Gen. James Jones, who heads the U.S. European Command, asked Germany last fall to send troops to southern Afghanistan to fight the Taliban, but Germany declined, according to the report.

NATO asked France, Turkey, Italy and Spain to send troops to the south, but they, too, declined. The countries said that they had committed troops to peacekeeping forces in Lebanon or that their own areas of responsibility in Afghanistan remained "restive," according to the CRS report.

Though the report noted that problems with caveats remain in Afghanistan, it said the Netherlands had increased its fighting role despite the move's unpopularity with Dutch voters.

Coalition nations have been involved in friendly-fire incidents in which their troops have been killed by U.S. or other forces.

Harbin, the Air Force officer, said the ROVER system can prevent incidents such as one in which a U.S. pilot mistakenly fired on a British convoy in Afghanistan, killing one British soldier. Other friendly-fire incidents include four Canadians being killed in 2002 and one Canadian killed last September.

The Air Force has loaned 12 ROVER systems to British troops.

Virtual War, Real Healing (LAT)

By Larry Gordon

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

San Diego — NONE of this is really happening, but the experience is almost overwhelming in "virtual Iraq."

The Humvee plows along a desert road. The engine rumbles underfoot and Blackhawk choppers whirl overhead. A sandstorm blows in, and insurgents pop up and start to shoot with sickening blasts that shatter the windshield. Is that the smell of burning rubber?

Those sensations of war are being fed into a special helmet, goggles and earphones. They are conjured by a computerized virtual reality developed in part by gaming engineers and psychologists at USC and being tested, among other places, at the Naval Medical Center in San Diego. The goal is to treat post-traumatic stress disorder.

Universities, private firms and the federal government are pouring millions of dollars into creating and testing such virtual Iraqs to help ease the psychological disorder that, according to a 2004 study by the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research, affects more than 15% of combat personnel returning from Iraq.

Sufferers may have anxiety, nightmares, flashbacks, emotional numbness, extreme jumpiness and physical pain. Unable to return to combat or civilian jobs, some receive disability payments for years or for life.

With a therapist's supervision, the virtual Iraqs are designed to vividly, yet safely, allow those veterans to confront war experiences in ways that go beyond traditional counseling and drug therapy. The computer programs, even with the somewhat cartoonish digital depictions of combat, seek to relieve trauma by repeatedly revisiting its origins and not letting fear fester. Lt. Cmdr. Robert McLay, a Navy psychiatrist who is a research leader on virtual-reality treatment of PTSD in San Diego, explained that more customary forms of exposure therapy for trauma may require visits to actual locations, such as returning a rape victim to the scene of the assault. "You don't want to send someone who is traumatized back to Iraq," he said. "This allows us to bring someone back, but within the situation here."

And, he said, some PTSD sufferers are unable or unwilling to recall things in counseling sessions without stimuli, such as the digital images of a combat hospital, a recorded Islamic prayer melody or the smell of cordite explosives misted into a psychologist's office.

In 2005, the Office of Naval Research awarded $4 million to support tests of such virtual-reality treatments in San Diego and at Tripler Army Medical Center in Hawaii. The funds also bolster related work by USC's Institute for Creative Technologies in Marina del Rey, the University of Washington and allied high-tech firms.

Cmdr. Russell Shilling, the Office of Naval Research's program officer for medical science and technology, said virtual Iraqs might be especially useful to remove the stigma of psychological therapy for a younger generation who grew up playing video games.

Though it is too early to make judgments about the trial runs, early results "look very promising," Shilling said.

The National Institute of Mental Health is funding a $2-million study at Emory University School of Medicine that uses a virtual Iraq along with a drug, D-cycloserine, that has been shown to reduce the fear of heights.

"The potential impact for men and women with stress adjustment problems is really substantial" and the possible impact on medical research "is extraordinarily important," said Farris Tuma, chief of the national institute's traumatic stress disorders program.

But Tuma cautioned that no treatment is a panacea. "We want to be careful not to oversell it as a simple fix for very complex conditions," he said.

AT the sprawling Navy hospital near San Diego's Balboa Park, researchers are testing two somewhat different systems: one for combat fighters who saw no relief from other therapies, the other for medics and support staff traumatized by war.

So far, McLay said, nine people have completed the cycle of 10 sessions. The goal by next year is have 150 treated at San Diego and Camp Pendleton, including some also suffering from concussions and crushed limbs.

Marines put on a helmet and goggles that allow them to be visually and aurally engulfed, often for 45 minutes. They stand or sit over a small platform that can vibrate. They work a joystick that allows them to walk or ride at various speeds. They can change directions on computerized streets and alleys by twisting their heads and bodies. In one biofeedback version, their respiration, heart rate and palm sweat are monitored.

Psychologists such as Karen Perlman sit at computers and help tailor the experience to the patients, conversing with them throughout.

The treatment usually starts with a digital scene and no violence. But in subsequent sessions, the therapists — after giving warning — heighten the intensity and specifics of the re-created event. They can make the platform shake more violently. They can set off simulated explosions and gunfire and add fog, smoke and night-vision effects, along with the smells of body odor and Iraqi spices.

"Habituation occurs when they repeat their story over and over again," Perlman said. "They start to learn they can tolerate their distress, they can work through it."

If all of that proves to be too much, the session can be interrupted for a discussion or be made less vivid.

Researchers say they want to ensure the experience feels real enough to trigger emotions without being overly bloody. Though some patients have temporarily removed the goggles or asked for a break, no one has completely freaked out, according to McLay. "We are prepared for that experience," he said. "The great thing about virtual reality is that you can turn it off."

Citing privacy issues, authorities did not allow interviews with patients. But a reporter was permitted to talk to a Navy medic who recently served in Iraq and who, though not a PTSD patient, tried one system.

"It's pretty real. The vibration and the sights and sounds and everything were pretty darn close. I was waiting for shrapnel overhead," said Eugene Gochicoa, a Navy corpsman 1st class. "It did kind of take me back to when I was back there … except I knew I was safe here."

FOR a reporter, a test run at USC's lab had a disorienting double effect: the fun of being inside an astonishingly lively video game but also the dread of being trapped in a dangerous situation that other people controlled. The scenarios were changed to give me a sampling: I drove a Humvee through a smoky field until insurgents' bullets cracked the windshield. I had a growing sense of paranoia. I heard my own footsteps as I walked quickly down a street past suspicious characters.

Hearing prayer calls, I entered a beautifully decorated mosque, where I suddenly encountered a gunman. Again, the story line switched and I heard and felt helicopters nearby. I ran past burning cars and a wounded man holding his head. Am I the next to be shot?

Engineers want to make systems more portable. And redesigns may make the simulated urban streets messier and add smells — such as roasting lamb.

One of the systems grew out of the computerized war training program known as Full Spectrum Command, which was designed, with Army funding, at USC's Institute for Creative Technologies. The institute also produces Hollywood special effects and multimedia systems for healthcare and education.

The Army software later was adapted for the popular Full Spectrum Warrior video game and then morphed again, in collaboration with Virtually Better Inc. in Georgia, for the therapy. "From training to toy to treatment" is the way the sequence was described by USC professor Albert "Skip" Rizzo, one of its adapters, along with computer engineer Jarrell Pair.

Rizzo, a psychologist who works in gerontology and directs the institute's virtual-reality psychology lab, previously used other VR programs to aid Alzheimer's and brain-injury patients and youngsters with attention deficits. VR, as it is often called, is being tried around the country for addictions and phobias, such as fear of flying. Weill Cornell Medical College in New York is testing a version for people who witnessed or responded to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in 2001.

Because there are no clear battle lines and it is difficult to identify enemies, the Iraq war is a petri dish for the constant stress that can produce PTSD, Rizzo said.

"We are sending teenagers 19 years old to fight wars, and we owe them whatever can be done, using the latest technology, to look after those people after the fact," he said.

The federal government has a financial, as well as humanitarian, interest in trying to speed treatment and reduce long-term disability payments. But even if some otherwise healthy malingerers use the technology to bolster phony trauma claims, Rizzo said, he can live with that "as long as I know that the people who really need the treatment are getting it."

A more primitive virtual-reality therapy — depicting a jungle and Vietnam-era helicopters — produced some significant improvement for Vietnam War veterans, researchers at the VA Medical Center in Atlanta reported in 2001. According to study leader Barbara Rothbaum, director of Emory University's trauma and anxiety recovery program, the experience was so effective that some of those veterans said they saw tanks and Viet Cong, even though none were presented on-screen.

Patients, she said, "will fill in with their own memories."

A Better Way (WSJ)

By Morton Abramowitz And Leslie H. Gelb

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Not many in Washington think President Bush's military surge will solve Iraq, but there is plenty of enthusiasm for a diplomatic surge. The Iraq Study Group, much of Congress, think-tankers and media pundits urge diplomacy as the way out. "Give diplomacy a chance," they say. "Talk to everybody, especially the bad guys, and we'll find common ground." The general enthusiasm is not surprising, given the decline of diplomacy during the Bush administration.

We should be wary of quick fixes. Military or diplomatic surges reflecting desperation rarely turn out as hoped. Diplomacy cannot resolve Iraq's internal conflicts, though it may help lubricate a deal reached by Iraqis, or an American exit from Iraq. Region-wide diplomacy can help over the long term, if based on a sound policy to re-establish American power in the Mideast, Gulf and world-wide.

But diplomacy by itself rarely changes the facts on the ground, and right now, the facts appear to be a nonfunctioning central government, half the country sunk in civil/sectarian war, and Sunnis leaving Iraq in droves. Despite optimistic rhetoric about diplomacy, it is virtually certain that the neighbors won't step into this maelstrom, rescue the U.S. and compel their various Iraqi allies to buy a deal. At this point, no diplomatic enthusiast has explained convincingly what incentives Syria and Iran have to help the U.S.

Nor do the neighbors have the power to compel a settlement. Advocates of a diplomatic solution say the U.S. can do in Iraq what it did in Bosnia with the Dayton Accords. But Iraq is not Bosnia. At Dayton, the U.S. and eventually Serb leader Slobodan Milosevic himself wanted the war to end, and, most importantly, had the muscle to compel the parties to accept the territorial and political divisions produced by war. In Iraq, the U.S. is not able to enforce its will, and no neighbor, or group within Iraq, has the power that Milosevic had in Bosnia.

Regional diplomacy might prove useful if the Iraqis gain momentum toward a power-sharing deal, but can't make tough calls without outside aid and pressure. At that point, the neighbors could help. But as for Arab-Israeli talks helping to settle Iraq -- that's an illusion.

Iraqi leaders don't care much about the Palestinians. They see them as past supporters of Saddam Hussein. Where serious American efforts to broker an Israeli-Palestinian deal could help is not in Iraq, but in tamping down further inroads by Iran among Arab terrorist groups.

In fact, this is where the real value of U.S. diplomacy comes in. Iranians and terrorists can stoke hatred and wars; only the U.S. can lead the parties toward peace agreements and economic development. But to do this, Washington needs a coherent policy before it can have an effective diplomacy. The Bush team first has to figure out realistically how to change the balance of incentives and pain for Iran and Syria, and then translate this into diplomacy.

Right now, the U.S. is isolated, widely seen as without a coherent policy, and therefore without much power. Yet the ultimate paradox is that the U.S., not Iran, remains the major power in the area.

Diplomacy with Iran will take patience and the non-hysterical application of American power. Iran is a politically divided and economically poor country; it is not a regional superpower. Most Iranians don't like their present political leaders and are open to the U.S. connection. Without giving up, or giving in on key security concerns, Washington can let the great majority of Iranians in and out of government see the benefits of better relations with the U.S., and allow that thought to settle in. As for Syria, it causes a lot of trouble in the region, but its leaders, with their own internal problems, also have demonstrated they can act on national self-interest when Washington gives them that choice.

If the U.S. puts the policy pieces in place -- working toward a realistic outcome in Iraq, toning down bellicose rhetoric, pursuing Arab-Israeli talks, and letting America's economic and political power do the talking -- most nations will rally to us. That's what happened in Asia during the darkest days of Vietnam. President Nixon and Secretary of State Kissinger put together triangular diplomacy with China and the Soviet Union, giving the U.S. new global diplomatic leverage, and they reaffirmed American military presence and security commitments to Asian friends. East Asian countries knew they needed America for their peace and prosperity, and quickly moved behind Washington. Though different from Asia, Arab leaders also know they need America.

Probably, the U.S. would have done better to try to establish and maintain diplomatic contacts with friends and enemies in the region all along. But too much water and blood have now passed under the bridge for such wishful thinking.

Jumping into diplomacy without a careful weighing of underlying policy and power could strengthen the bargaining hands of the tyrannical regimes, confuse and unsettle friends, and put all the pressure for making concessions on the U.S. Better for the moment to let the Saudis continue sounding out the parties, and spend the next months figuring out exactly what to do in Iraq, how to use diplomacy to support that, and how to re-establish U.S. diplomatic power in that nasty part of the world.

An Iraq Interrogator's Nightmare (WP)

By Eric Fair

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Aman with no face stares at me from the corner of a room. He pleads for help, but I'm afraid to move. He begins to cry. It is a pitiful sound, and it sickens me. He screams, but as I awaken, I realize the screams are mine.

That dream, along with a host of other nightmares, has plagued me since my return from Iraq in the summer of 2004. Though the man in this particular nightmare has no face, I know who he is. I assisted in his interrogation at a detention facility in Fallujah. I was one of two civilian interrogators assigned to the division interrogation facility (DIF) of the 82nd Airborne Division. The man, whose name I've long since forgotten, was a suspected associate of Khamis Sirhan al-Muhammad, the Baath Party leader in Anbar province who had been captured two months earlier.

The lead interrogator at the DIF had given me specific instructions: I was to deprive the detainee of sleep during my 12-hour shift by opening his cell every hour, forcing him to stand in a corner and stripping him of his clothes. Three years later the tables have turned. It is rare that I sleep through the night without a visit from this man. His memory harasses me as I once harassed him.

Despite my best efforts, I cannot ignore the mistakes I made at the interrogation facility in Fallujah. I failed to disobey a meritless order, I failed to protect a prisoner in my custody, and I failed to uphold the standards of human decency. Instead, I intimidated, degraded and humiliated a man who could not defend himself. I compromised my values. I will never forgive myself.

American authorities continue to insist that the abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib was an isolated incident in an otherwise well-run detention system. That insistence, however, stands in sharp contrast to my own experiences as an interrogator in Iraq. I watched as detainees were forced to stand naked all night, shivering in their cold cells and pleading with their captors for help. Others were subjected to long periods of isolation in pitch-black rooms. Food and sleep deprivation were common, along with a variety of physical abuse, including punching and kicking. Aggressive, and in many ways abusive, techniques were used daily in Iraq, all in the name of acquiring the intelligence necessary to bring an end to the insurgency. The violence raging there today is evidence that those tactics never worked. My memories are evidence that those tactics were terribly wrong.

While I was appalled by the conduct of my friends and colleagues, I lacked the courage to challenge the status quo. That was a failure of character and in many ways made me complicit in what went on. I'm ashamed of that failure, but as time passes, and as the memories of what I saw in Iraq continue to infect my every thought, I'm becoming more ashamed of my silence.

Some may suggest there is no reason to revive the story of abuse in Iraq. Rehashing such mistakes will only harm our country, they will say. But history suggests we should examine such missteps carefully. Oppressive prison environments have created some of the most determined opponents. The British learned that lesson from Napoleon, the French from Ho Chi Minh, Europe from Hitler. The world is learning that lesson again from Ayman al-Zawahiri. What will be the legacy of abusive prisons in Iraq?

We have failed to properly address the abuse of Iraqi detainees. Men like me have refused to tell our stories, and our leaders have refused to own up to the myriad mistakes that have been made. But if we fail to address this problem, there can be no hope of success in Iraq. Regardless of how many young Americans we send to war, or how many militia members we kill, or how many Iraqis we train, or how much money we spend on reconstruction, we will not escape the damage we have done to the people of Iraq in our prisons.

I am desperate to get on with my life and erase my memories of my experiences in Iraq. But those memories and experiences do not belong to me. They belong to history. If we're doomed to repeat the history we forget, what will be the consequences of the history we never knew? The citizens and the leadership of this country have an obligation to revisit what took place in the interrogation booths of Iraq, unpleasant as it may be. The story of Abu Ghraib isn't over. In many ways, we have yet to open the book.

Britney Vs. The Terrorists (WP)

By Robert R. Reilly

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

In the spring of 2003, across a field of rubble in Baghdad, a young Iraqi journalist accosted me and demanded: "Why did you stop broadcasting substance and substitute music?" The year before the Broadcasting Board of Governors, the government entity in charge of radio broadcasting, had shut down the Voice of America's Arabic service, and it ended most of its Farsi service in 2003. Voice of America had been broadcasting features, discussions of issues and editorials reflecting U.S. policies. But now it filled 50 minutes of each hour on Arabic-language Radio Sawa and most of the time on Persian-language Radio Farda with Eminem, J. Lo and Britney Spears.

This change in format provoked other angry questions: Are Americans playing music because they are afraid to tell the truth? Do they not have a truth to tell? Or do they not consider us worth telling the truth to?

We did not fight communism with pop music. In fact, during the Cold War, America used its government media institutions to broadcast its ideas and beliefs. So why are we not refashioning those successful broadcast strategies and trying to spread our ideas in the Muslim world, the breeding ground of much of the world's terrorist threats?

Members of the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG) have shared their answer: Radio Sawa's progenitor, media mogul Norman Pattiz, was still serving his Clinton-appointed term in 2002 when he told the New Yorker that "it was MTV that brought down the Berlin Wall." (Not Ronald Reagan, Lech Walesa or Vaclav Havel, of course.) President Bush's appointees did not improve the board's outlook. In October 2002, Ken Tomlinson, then the board's new chairman, approvingly quoted his son as saying Spears's music "represents the sounds of freedom." It seems that the board transformed the "war of ideas" into the battle of the bands.

So, is MTV winning the "war of ideas"? After years of the United States broadcasting Britney Spears to the Levant, the average radical mullah has not exactly succumbed to apoplexy or come to love democracy. A State Department inspector general's draft report on Radio Sawa (the final report was never issued) found that"it is difficult to ascertain Radio Sawa's impact in countering anti-American views and the biased state-run media of the Arab world." Or, as one expert panel assembled to assess its value concluded, "Radio Sawa failed to present America to its audience."

The BBG has achieved part of its objective in gaining large youth audiences in some areas of the Middle East, such as in Amman, Jordan, where it has an FM transmitter. But as the Jordanian journalist Jamil Nimri told me: "Radio Sawa is fun, but it's irrelevant." We do not teach civics to American teenagers by asking them to listen to pop music, so why should we expect Arabs and Persians to learn about America or democracy this way? The condescension implicit in this nearly all-music format is not lost on the audience that we should wish to influence the most -- those who think.

Some, of course, suspect that the United States is consciously attempting to subvert the morals of Arab youth. Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes told columnist Cal Thomas in December that our "view of freedom is sometimes seen as licentiousness. . . . And that is only exacerbated by the movies and the television and some of the music and the lyrics that they see exported from America." Especially, Hughes might have added, since the BBG, on which she sits as an ex officio member, promotes this very image.

Becoming a caricature of ourselves is bad policy and bad public diplomacy. The job of U.S. international broadcasting is to present, before we are attacked, what much of the world saw only after Sept. 11 -- the sacrifice, bravery and piety of the American people -- as part of a complete picture. By presenting this aspect of our culture, we might even prevent the miscalculations of those who believe they should attack the United States or can do so with impunity because we are a weak, irreligious, morally corrupt country.

We need radio broadcasting in the "war of ideas," but it has to deal in ideas to be effective. The "MTV message" is something that commercial broadcasting can do and would do better than government-funded radio. Government broadcasting is needed when the United States must communicate a message to a key audience that that audience otherwise would not hear.

Music may have a role in this kind of broadcast mission, but only if it is part of a larger, idea-based strategy. Where are the ideas that will help us win this war, and why are they not being deployed by all available means to the places that most need to hear them? Isn't it time to change our tune?

Your Money At War (NYT)

By Kristin Henderson

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

Washington

EVERY morning that my husband was in a war zone, whether it was Afghanistan or Iraq, I woke up knowing that today could be the day my world might end. He's a Navy chaplain, but when he's convoying with the Marines, hunkering down with them under fire, he is as exposed as they are. Even those tucked away on bases over there face mortar attacks.

This takes a toll on the families left behind. "Everyone up here is on Prozac," a wife from Fort Drum, N.Y., told me. We field phone calls from our loved ones on the frontlines. We deal with money shortfalls and anxious children. And then our combat veterans come home. In the last few years, divorces among enlisted soldiers shot up 28 percent and the suicide rate among Iraq veterans doubled.

Though some claim that all Americans are making sacrifices for the war on terrorism, it's just not true. The few who are sent to fight and those left behind who are an intimate part of their daily lives are the ones whose mental health, finances and relationships are taking the hit.

A universal draft would certainly help spread the sacrifice. But we all know that the privileged will find a way to avoid serving, as they did by paying $300 during the Civil War or claiming college deferments during Vietnam.

What we need is a war tax, dedicated to financing the support services needed by military families and combat veterans. Perhaps it would be more accurate to call it a long-term costs-of-war tax. Because the tax I'm proposing, like the needs it's intended to meet, will not end when the war does.

Historically, war taxes are how America finances its military conflicts — taxes on income, beverages, tobacco, utilities and more. The federal government first imposed what became a 3 percent tax on long-distance telephone calls in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War. Since then, it's been repealed, most recently last summer, and reinstated several times.

Some argue that sharing the sacrifice by raising taxes hurts the economy. But clearly the phone tax didn't damage the growth of the telecommunications industry. And during its last three years in existence, it brought $15 billion into the government's general fund.

If a phone tax were reinstated, or a tax on oil or clothing — something we use in proportion to our income — then all Americans would wind up shouldering at least a small portion of the burden of our nation's wars. Military families would be exempt.

Unlike the old phone tax, however, this new tax must be dedicated to financing programs that support and heal combat veterans and their families during deployment and afterward — combat trauma counseling, respite child care, part-time jobs for spouses trying to make ends meet, marriage counseling. These programs have always suffered from meager budgets, and while the public's interest will inevitably move on, the needs won't go away as long as America has a military.

For those who oppose the war and spending any additional money on it, all I can say is that this isn't about financing a war. It's about reducing human suffering. And for everyone who claims to "support the troops" — peace activists and war supporters alike — put your money where your bumper stickers are.

Senate Democrats Condemn Policy Of Placing Unconfirmed U.S. Attorneys (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Senate Democrats plan to bring legislation to the floor next week that would rein in the Bush administration's power to appoint U.S. attorneys without Senate confirmation, an increasingly bipartisan concern as the number of abruptly dismissed prosecutors grew to eight.

Senate leaders announced their plans hours after the Judiciary Committee approved a bill reversing a little-noticed provision of last year's Patriot Act reauthorization that allows the Justice Department to sidestep Senate approval in naming interim U.S. attorneys. Three Judiciary Republicans backed the bill, signaling heightened concerns on both sides of the aisle at the pattern of attorney axe-ings.

"We have a new topic: It's called 'crony-gate,'" Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) told reporters yesterday, vowing to "do everything I can to get this to the floor."

Nevada's U.S. attorney, Daniel Bogden, a Bush appointee whose actions have been questioned in a civil suit against a key supporter of Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons (R-Nev.), was asked to step down just before Christmas. The home-state U.S. attorney of Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), Democratic Caucus secretary, late Wednesday revealed that the Justice Department also had asked for his resignation.

"This has come home for me in a very personal way," Murray said, adding that her state's departed attorney is also a Republican.

Justice has strongly defended the dismissals, with Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty telling Judiciary this week that the administration will seek formal Senate confirmation for each of the new prosecutors. But two removals in particular, those of San Diego-based U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and Arkansas U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins, have sparked Democrats' ire.

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) noted colleague Mark Pryor's (D-Ark.) uncharacteristic alarm at the naming of Timothy Griffin, a former staffer in White House adviser Karl Rove's office and onetime national GOP opposition research director, to replace Cummins.

"Mark Pryor is a mild-mannered, soft-spoken senator, unlike some of us, but he's righteously upset," Durbin said.

The revision in the Patriot Act rewrite was intended for use in national-security emergencies, when U.S. attorneys might need quick appointment to pursue terrorism suspects. Yet GOP lawmakers have backed administration suggestions that Lam was removed amid complaints about her record of prosecuting immigration-related cases.

An October 2005 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales from 19 California House Republicans blasted Lam's office for a "lax prosecutorial standard" in only prosecuting apprehended illegal immigrants who have two felony convictions on their records. Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), a signatory of that letter, earlier chastised Lam for amassing "an appalling record of refusal to prosecute even the worst criminal alien offenders."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who first raised concerns that Lam will leave her post next week unable to complete her corruption probe of imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), inquired in June about the low number of immigration prosecutions in Lam's district.

One House GOP aide contended that the bipartisan concern over Lam clouds Democratic attempts to link her dismissal to the Cunningham probe.

"Democrats don't want to talk about the fact that they actually had substantive concerns with this particular U.S. attorney," the aide said.

House Democrats aim to move the Senate's bill quickly through the process, holding a hearing in the Judiciary panel's subcommittee of jurisdiction during the first week of March and a markup soon after, Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) said in a statement yesterday.

Meanwhile, Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) has been asked to recommend candidates to fill the open Nevada attorney's post, but Reid said he had no knowledge of talks on Bogden's replacement.

"Maybe it's somebody from Scooter Libby's office," he quipped.

Senate Panel Reacts To Attorney Firings (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

A Senate panel advanced a bill Thursday to curb the Justice Department's power to replace federal prosecutors after seven forced resignations sparked accusations of political favoritism.

The Judiciary Committee voted 13-6 to send the measure to the Senate floor, where it is certain to face opposition from Republicans who oppose giving more appointment power to federal judges.

"I'm going to do everything I can to get it to the floor next week," said Senate Majority leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

"It'll be over my objection," shot back Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl of Arizona.

The House is expected to begin hearings on a similar bill next month.

Three Republicans, Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Charles Grassley of Iowa and Orrin Hatch of Utah, joined all the panel's Democrats in backing the bill.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and may be dismissed for any reason, or no reason at all. It's the process of replacement that, the bill's proponents argue, should prevent political cronyism.

Sponsored by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the measure would eliminate a provision in the antiterror Patriot Act that gave the attorney general new power to replace fired U.S. attorneys indefinitely, avoiding the Senate confirmation process.

Feinstein's bill would allow the attorney general to appoint an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. If after that time someone had not been nominated and confirmed by the Senate, authority to appoint an interim U.S. attorney would fall to the district court.

The bill would apply to any interim U.S. attorneys who have not been confirmed, including those appointed to replace the seven prosecutors who have been fired since the Patriot Act reauthorization went into effect, according to a spokeswoman for Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

The Justice Department opposes the bill, saying the attorney general's authority to choose prosecutors should not be handed to courts because district court judges, they contend, are often unqualified to make such decisions. Kyl said he would remove his objection if Reid agreed to remove the provision giving district court judges the 120-day backup power to appoint interim prosecutors.

"We are disappointed by congressional efforts to restrict our ability to appoint our own employees for temporary periods of time while a permanent nominee is selected," said Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos.

Senate Democratic leaders sent Attorney General Alberto Gonzales a letter Thursday asking him to publicly answer several questions about the matter, including any role that presidential adviser Karl Rove might have had in replacing Arkansas U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins with former Rove adviser Tim Griffin.

Senate Democrats accuse the administration of slipping the provision into the Patriot Act reauthorization that took effect last March with the intent of circumventing the Senate confirmation process and rewarding political allies. Specter, who wrote the reauthorization as chairman of the committee, says he was unaware of the provision and opposes it.

The Democrats cite the firings since March of seven U.S. attorneys from Arkansas to California, some without cause, as evidence that the administration is punishing prosecutors whose work targeted Republican allies and rewarding those faithful to the GOP.

Gonzales has denied that charge and promised to submit every replacement for Senate confirmation.

Earlier this week, his deputy, Paul McNulty, told the panel that some of the ousted prosecutors were fired for performance-related causes he would not describe, while others were asked to leave without cause.

Democrats demanded the performance reports of all seven dismissed prosecutors and threatened to subpoena the material. McNulty cautioned that the reports might not detail any reasons for dismissal.

The panel's action came a day after one of those fired, former U.S. Attorney John McKay of Washington state, said his resignation was ordered by the administration without explanation seven months after he received a favorable job evaluation.

"I was ordered to resign as U.S. attorney on Dec. 7 by the Justice Department," McKay, who led the Justice Department's Western Washington office, said Wednesday in a telephone interview. "I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues."

The Seattle Times reported Thursday that in his last performance review, McKay received a highly favorable report from a 27-member team from the Justice Department's Evaluation and Review Staff.

Fired Prosecutor Disputes Justice Dept. Allegation (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

A recently fired U.S. attorney based in Seattle said yesterday that he was told of no performance problems when he was asked to resign, and he called critical remarks by a top Justice Department official "unfair" and inaccurate.

The comments by former U.S. attorney John McKay add to a growing tide of criticism of the Justice Department's decision to fire seven top prosecutors without explanation, and came on the same day the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 13 to 6 to limit the attorney general's power to appoint replacements.

McKay said in an interview that his Seattle office received glowing reviews as recently as last fall, when an intensive Justice Department audit heaped praise on McKay and his staff.

McKay challenged testimony this week by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, who told the Senate panel that McKay and five other Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys were forced to resign for "performance-related" reasons.

"That is unfair," McKay said. "That reflects on my former colleagues in the office and the good work that we did, and I know that's not true."

McKay is the third U.S. attorney to speak publicly about his dismissal. Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that he was given no explanation for being forced out and that he had not been told of any problems with his performance.

McNulty's testimony Tuesday also included an admission that the chief prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark., was fired to make way for GOP stalwart J. Timothy Griffin, a protege of presidential adviser Karl Rove and former researcher for the Republican National Committee.

The firings have angered lawmakers in both parties and have rapidly evolved into a serious political problem for the Justice Department. Yesterday's vote by the Judiciary Committee included approval from three Republicans: Sens. Arlen Specter (Pa.), Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) and Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

The measure would repeal a provision in last year's USA Patriot Act reauthorization law that gave Attorney Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales the authority to appoint interim prosecutors for indefinite terms. The new legislation would return to the previous system, under which the attorney general appoints a replacement for 120 days and district courts appoint an interim U.S. attorney if a permanent one is not named in that time.

Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said the legislation is necessary to ensure Senate oversight and limit the "politicization of U.S. attorneys offices."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said that allowing Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors is "good government and constitutionally sound."

"We are disappointed by congressional efforts to restrict our ability to appoint our own employees for temporary periods of time while a permanent nominee is selected," Scolinos said.

The House Judiciary Committee plans to hold hearings on similar legislation next month. They may include testimony from some of the fired prosecutors.

The leader of the House Democratic caucus, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), has called on Gonzales to appoint one of the fired prosecutors, Carol S. Lam of San Diego, as an outside counsel to continue the corruption investigation related to former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), who pleaded guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes in 2005 and is serving a sentence of as much as eight years. Scolinos said career prosecutors will be able to continue handling the case while a replacement is chosen.

In addition to Lam, McKay and Bogden, three other U.S. attorneys were told on Dec. 7 to resign: Paul K. Charlton in Arizona; David C. Iglesias in New Mexico; and Kevin Ryan in San Francisco. A seventh U.S. attorney, Bud Cummins in Little Rock, was notified he was being removed last summer.

McKay said he was called Dec. 7 by Michael A. Battle, head of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, who only months before had sent him a congratulatory letter for the laudatory report issued by the Justice Department audit team. He said Battle told him to resign by the end of January.

"When I was composed enough to ask him why, he told me he couldn't answer any of my questions," said McKay, who has accepted a teaching position at Seattle University Law School. "I was immediately so surprised. He said nothing about performance issues or management or anything else."

McKay said that four days after Battle's call, the White House counsel's office also informed him that he was not among a group of three finalists for a federal judgeship in Washington state. He declined to say whether he believed political considerations went into his dismissal.

McKay angered other Republicans when he declined to intervene in a ballot dispute in the 2004 Washington governor's race. His brother, Mike McKay, served as U.S. attorney in Seattle under President George H.W. Bush.

In a highly unusual move, the chief judge of the federal court in Seattle publicly came to John McKay's defense.

"We were dismayed to see that the Justice Department was suggesting there was something wrong with his performance as a United States attorney," said Judge Robert Lasnik, a Clinton-era appointee who said he was speaking for all the judges on the Seattle court. "We unanimously agreed that he was absolutely superb."

Scolinos declined to comment on McKay's remarks.

Senators Weigh PATRIOT Act Attorney Provision (CONGD)

Senate judiciary panel revises rule for U.S. attorneys

Reacting to Democratic allegations the Bush administration fired several U.S. attorneys possibly for politically connected replacements, the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday revised rules for filling U.S. attorney vacancies.

On a 13-6 vote, the committee adopted a compromise measure from Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, ranking member Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. Their plan restricts the authority of the U.S. attorney general from filling prosecutor vacancies for an unlimited time without Senate confirmation.

The committee held a hearing Tuesday on the firings of at least seven U.S. attorneys. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said six of the U.S. attorneys were dismissed for "performance related" matters. A seventh, former U.S. Attorney Ed Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., was let go last year to be replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove, McNulty acknowledged.

But McNulty denied Democratic charges that the dismissals were politicized to reward Republicans and avoid the Senate confirmation process.

One of those fired was former U.S. Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted former Rep. Randy (Duke) Cunningham, R-Calif. Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting about $2.4 million in bribes. The Justice Department has denied Lam was fired because of the Cunningham case, which was praised by McNulty as "a very good thing for the American people." However, he did not give a reason for Lam's dismissal.

Under the USA PATRIOT Act reauthorization last year, a provision was inserted that eliminated a century-long rule that limited the attorney general to making interim appointments to fill vacancies for no more than 120 days. Under the old rule, if a U.S. attorney vacancy was not filled within 120 days, the U.S. District Court could fill the vacancy.

Reid Calls Dismissal 'cronygate' (RGJ)

By Diana Marrero, GANNETT NEWS SERVICE

Reno (NV) Gazette-Journal, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON - Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid accused the Bush Administration Thursday of forcing the U.S. Attorney for the district of Nevada to step down as part of an attempt to name more political allies as federal prosecutors.

Daniel Bogden, 50, resigned last month after consulting with officials at the Department of Justice. He is among at least seven U.S. Attorneys who have been forced to resign or have been fired in the past few months - sparking accusations of political favoritism by the Bush administration.

Reid, a Nevada Democrat, vowed he would act to correct the situation.

"What has happened in my town in Nevada is ... distasteful to say the very least," Reid said. "We want to know what's going on."

Reid's comments came on the same day the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a bill to curb the ability of the Justice Department to replace federal prosecutors without Senate confirmation. Reid wants to act on the legislation next week.

Alberto Gonzalez's Coup D'etat (SALON)

By Joe Conason

Salon.com, February 9, 2007

The Constitution be damned, the attorney general has seized control of U.S. attorney appointments for partisan purposes.

Under any circumstances, the Bush administration's sudden, explicitly political dismissal and replacement of United States attorneys in judicial districts across the country would be very troubling -- both as a violation of American law enforcement traditions and as a triumph of patronage over competence.

But as the story behind these strange decisions unfolds, a familiar theme is emerging. Again, the White House and the Justice Department have been exposed in a secretive attempt to expand executive power for partisan purposes. And again, their scheming is tainted with a nasty whiff of authoritarianism.

There is much more at stake here than a handful of federal jobs.

Leading senators of both parties are disturbed by these incidents because U.S. attorneys -- the powerful officials appointed by the president to prosecute federal crimes and defend federal interests in each of the nation's judicial districts -- are supposed to be as nonpartisan as possible. Democrats mostly appoint Democrats and Republicans mostly appoint Republicans, but the U.S. attorneys are usually chosen with the advice and consent of the senators from their home states, and then confirmed by the full Senate, with a decent respect for skill and experience as well as political connections.

The reason for this appointment process was simple: These prosecutors must police the politicians. They are expected to guard the nation's judicial system against the varieties of political abuse that are typical of authoritarian systems. They are granted a substantial degree of independence from the government in Washington, including the attorney general who functions as their boss.

To ensure that no U.S. attorney could be fired on a whim and replaced with a malleable hack, the relevant statute required that whenever a vacancy occurred in midterm, the replacement would be appointed by federal circuit judges rather than by the president. Getting rid of irksomely honest and nonpartisan prosecutors was difficult if not impossible.

But that wholesome safeguard was breached in December 2005, when the Senate renewed the Patriot Act. At the behest of the Justice Department, an aide to Sen. Arlen Specter slipped a provision into the bill that permitted the White House to place its own appointees in vacant U.S. attorney positions permanently and without Senate confirmation. So silently was this sleight of hand performed that Specter himself now claims, many months later, to have been completely unaware of the amendment's passage. (Of course, it would be nice if the senators actually read the legislation before they voted, particularly when they claim to be the authors.)

The staffer who reportedly performed this bit of dirty work is Michael O'Neill, a law professor at George Mason University and former clerk for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. As the Washington Times explained when O'Neill was appointed as the Senate Judiciary Committee's chief counsel, many observers believed that Specter had hired him to reassure conservatives of his loyalty to the Bush White House. Right-wing distrust had almost ousted the Pennsylvania moderate from the Judiciary chairmanship, and appointing O'Neill was apparently the price for keeping that post.

Evidently O'Neill rewarded Specter by sneaking through legislation to deprive him and his fellow senators of one of their most important powers, at the behest of an attorney general intent on aggrandizing executive power. The results of this backstage betrayal -- now playing out in a wave of politicized dismissals and hirings -- were perfectly predictable and utterly poisonous.

Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted the sensationally crooked Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, was fired for no known reason while she is still pursuing important leads in that historic case. Cunningham is supposed to be cooperating, but if Bush replaces her with a partisan stooge, he may be able to keep his secrets. Bud Cummings, the respected U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark., was canned to make room for a Republican opposition research operative and Karl Rove acolyte named Timothy Griffin. Could that conceivably have anything to do with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential candidacy? Paul Charlton, the U.S. attorney in Arizona, was thrown out while investigating allegations of corruption against Republican Rep. Rick Renzi.

And John McKay, the U.S. attorney in Seattle whose diligence has been praised by judges and lawyers of both parties, was simply ordered to quit last December, for no obvious reason. Although McKay's last evaluation by the Justice Department was excellent, the attorney general insists that all of these curious firings were due to "performance" issues.

Any such self-serving statements emanating from Alberto Gonzales should always be greeted with appropriate skepticism. So should the claim that he sought to seize control of interim U.S. attorney appointments because of his concern over the "separation of powers" issues supposedly inherent in judges' appointing prosecutors. As the McClatchy Newspapers reported on Jan. 26, Gonzales has named at least nine "conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle" to positions vacated by professional prosecutors.

On Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted to restore the old nonpartisan system for replacing U.S. attorneys and to require Senate confirmation of all new appointees. The full Senate and the House of Representatives should do likewise, despite Republican opposition, but that is not enough. The Senate Democrats should continue to probe the attorney general's little coup d'état and all of the resulting appointments. That is the best way to discourage future usurpations -- and to frustrate whatever skulduggery was afoot this time.

Editorial: U.S. Attorney: Ideology Vs. Justice (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 9, 2007

The Bush administration again has been caught undermining American justice in Seattle and across the nation. The best hope is that the exposure will, over the long term, serve to hinder extreme right-wing hopes of turning the entire legal system into a reflection of arch-conservative ideology.

As reports this week have shown, the administration removed John McKay, the highly able former U.S. attorney heading the Justice Department's Seattle office. It was part of at least seven such removals that became a focus of a U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday.

A deputy attorney general defended the actions in six firings as "performance-related," a ludicrous and offensive characterization in McKay's case. The committee has promised to check previous job performance records and the like for the fired attorneys. The deputy acknowledged that in another case, a prosecutor was removed to make way for a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove. It's likely something similar was at play in the whole scheme, which one former U.S. attorney told the committee was unprecedented. A source told the Seattle P-I's Paul Shukovsky the firings were part of an effort to make room for up-and-coming young Republicans.

As the Iraq reconstruction fiasco best illustrates, this is an administration with an appalling record of putting considerations of ideology ahead of competence. Appointing young conservatives as U.S. attorneys might pave the way for their selection as U.S. judges later. We hope Congress will have a long memory about anyone receiving such a dubious appointment to a U.S. prosecutor position. This administration won't reform, but lessons can be learned for the future.

L.A.'s Lawyer To The Stars -- And The Majority Leader (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

What do Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Britney Spears, Bruce Willis, Paris Hilton's ex-boyfriend/videographer Rick Salomon and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) have in common?

They've all hired Los Angeles celebrity lawyer Martin Singer, known for his take-no-prisoners style and investigative prowess, to be their attorney.

Seems Reid paid Singer $25,000 on Dec. 14 from his senatorial campaign account for unspecified "legal fees," according to his most recent Federal Election Commission report.

So what prompted Reid to join this prestigious group of clients?

His spokesman, Jon Summers, told our colleague Howard Kurtz that Reid "sought outside counsel regarding his response to the AP story written by John Solomon," now at The Washington Post. The story was about how Reid reported the 2004 sale of land he once owned -- he made a profit of $700,000 on the property, which he had not owned for three years.

Summers said the story was "misleading" and had "inaccuracies." The AP stood by the story, and Reid amended his financial disclosure forms after the report. Reid's amendments are being reviewed by the ethics panel, Summers said.

He said Reid "obtained approval from the ethics committee for this expenditure."Someone's Getting Bumped

It's always a pain to take your vehicle into the shop for repairs, be told it will take weeks to fix and then get some cheesy loaner in the meantime.

It's even worse when your vehicle is Air Force One. Seems President Bush's 747 is in the shop for an extensive overhaul, a job that could take many months.

The president is always required to have a plane and a standby, in case of emergencies. There's a second 747 ready to go as Air Force One, but his backup now is one of the 757s out of the government fleet of only four such planes. These are used by, among others, Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Problem is that two of those four 757s also are undergoing long-term maintenance overhauls. So that leaves only one of the big planes available. Cheney has dibs over Rice, unless he's flying domestic and she's going overseas.

But next week they're both going overseas, Cheney to Asia and Rice on her latest major trip to the Mideast. She is to meet with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and then go on to Berlin for a session with the "Quartet" of would-be peacemakers: the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia.

So Rice gets bumped to a smaller plane. It's still quite nice, but it has room for only three reporters, instead of her usual complement of 13 or 14.

Unclear how many press are going with the loquacious vice president.Gonzales Travels to Balmier Climes

Speaking of trips, while folks in this area are freezing, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is off this week to Central and South America for a series of chats with various officials about drugs, copyright laws and other exciting topics. On Monday, he talked about gangs with El Salvador's president.

Tuesday he flew to Buenos Aires and on Wednesday (sunny and 84 degrees) toured the Buenos Aires Jewish community center, where a terrorist bomb killed 85 people in 1994. Yesterday it was off to Brasilia (temps in the 80s but partly cloudy) for meetings with various folks there. He had "a fruitful discussion on a number of topics of mutual importance to Brazil and the United States" with his Brazilian counterpart, he announced.

Today, it's to be Rio -- no carnival action, we're told -- to speak at an exciting conference about copyright laws.

The department says the curiously unimportant trip was planned long before anyone predicted the current cold snap -- or that increasingly nasty spat over the firings of those U.S. attorneys.Punching Not Among Obama's Strengths

Conservative news organizations got it half right when they reported recently that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) was once schooled in a foreign-sounding place that may have promoted violent techniques. But it turns out it wasn't a madrassah he attended but rather a "dojang," where he learned taekwondo.

Obama, who studied the Korean martial art in the early 2000s, was "not the best kicker, not the best puncher," his former teacher, Chicago financial capital planner David Posner, told our colleague Mary Ann Akers--http://www.washingtonpost.com/thesleuth.

On the other hand, Obama was "very disciplined, very diligent" and had "phenomenal balance, very good footwork" -- critical in a presidential campaign -- and "really good, solid stances" -- less important these days.

DOJ Official's Romance Raises Conflict Questions (LAW)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 8, 2007

When Sue Ellen Wooldridge stepped down last month from her job as the Justice Department's top environmental prosecutor, it wasn't her desire to return to the private sector that was notable, it was her timing.

Days earlier, Wooldridge's boyfriend —oil and energy lobbyist J. Steven Griles —had been put on notice that he was a target of the federal public-corruption investigation involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The romance between Wooldridge, 46, and Griles, 60, is significant and has had an impact beyond the Justice Department's Abramoff probe. Both previously held high-ranking jobs at the Interior Department — Griles was deputy secretary there, while Wooldridge was deputy chief of staff to then-Secretary Gale Norton and later the agency's top lawyer.

At Interior, they concealed their relationship from multiple department investigators looking into Griles' contacts with former lobbying clients —even as Wooldridge responded to the investigators on Griles' behalf and, later, as solicitor, oversaw Interior's ethics office, according to two current government officials with knowledge of the investigation and one former Interior official. These sources say the romance between Wooldridge and Griles was going on as early as February 2004.

Details of their relationship raise questions about the vetting process for presidential nominees at both the Justice and Interior departments, in addition to Wooldridge's candor with those who examined her credentials.

According to a transcript of her March 11, 2004, Senate confirmation hearing for the Interior solicitor job, as well as her written answers to Senate questions, Wooldridge did not disclose her relationship with Griles, despite being asked about Interior's investigation of Griles in a written question from Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and despite the fact that, as solicitor, Wooldridge would oversee the department's ethics office, which had been monitoring Griles.

Nor was the relationship disclosed to Interior Department Inspector General Earl Devaney, who conducted an 18-month investigation into numerous ethical allegations against Griles. Upon learning of the relationship after Griles left Interior in December 2004, Devaney, according to two sources, was furious.

Wooldridge left Interior in the fall of 2005, when she was confirmed to become the DOJ's assistant attorney general for environment and natural resources. According to a senior DOJ official, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top Justice officials were unaware of her relationship with Griles until months after Wooldridge had been confirmed. That disclosure came long after FBI agents and prosecutors in the Justice Department's Criminal Division had begun investigating Griles as part of the Abramoff probe, according to a source with knowledge of the investigation.

Efforts to contact Wooldridge and Griles in person at a townhouse in Falls Church, Va., owned by Griles and listed by both individuals as a home address in a public-records database, were unsuccessful. (Wooldridge also owns two houses in Arlington.) Phone messages left at Griles' home number were not returned. Barry Hartman, a lawyer for Griles in the Abramoff probe, also did not respond to repeated phone messages or to a detailed list of questions provided for this article.

The law firm representing Wooldridge, D.C.'s James Sharp & Associates, responded to a lengthy set of questions with a statement saying, "Ms. Wooldridge has testified before the grand jury, but is not now nor was she ever" a target in the Abramoff probe. The statement also said that after Griles left Interior to return to lobbying in December 2004, "Ms. Wooldridge recused herself from any matters involving Mr. Griles' clients, whether at the Department of Interior or Department of Justice." The law firm refused to answer any other questions regarding Wooldridge and Griles, and did not dispute or confirm the time frame of the relationship laid out by the current and former officials.

In response to a series of written questions regarding Wooldridge, an Interior spokesman said in a statement last week that "at some point following her move to the Solicitor's Office, Ms. Wooldridge did verbally inform the Designated Agency Ethics Official that she and Mr. Griles had begun dating." Wooldridge received a recess appointment on May 28, 2004.

This spokesman said he had "no knowledge of the timeline of the dating relationship."

The spokesman's statement in part backs up the claim of Wooldridge's lawyers that after Griles left Interior, Wooldridge verbally recused herself from matters involving his clients.

After 14 months on the job at the Justice Department, Wooldridge offered little explanation for her decision to step down in her Jan. 8 resignation letter, stating simply that after six years in government service she had "decided to return to the private sector."

But even those close to Wooldridge suggest that her relationship with Griles may have cost Wooldridge her government career.

"She has a personal relationship with Mr. Griles, and Mr. Griles is the subject of an investigation," says Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Calif.), Wooldridge's friend. "I assume that would make anyone uncomfortable." Wooldridge worked for Lungren while he was California attorney general. Lungren also testified on Wooldridge's behalf at both her Senate confirmation hearings.

Finding mr. Right

Griles resigned his lobbying position with the firm of Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles on Jan. 10. The Washington Post reported that day that he'd been informed the previous week he was a target in the Abramoff probe for allegedly making false statements to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee.

In e-mails released as part of a report on the investigation by that committee, Abramoff referred to Griles as "our guy" at Interior. The June 2006 report noted that Griles had met with Abramoff and an associate about coming to work for Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig. The report also scrutinized tens of thousands of dollars in donations by Abramoff's tribal clients to the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, a group with close ties to Griles and then-Interior Secretary Norton. The report said it could not "definitively" conclude that Griles had assisted Abramoff's clients at Interior, but it also noted that the committee could not reach "any definitive conclusions as to the veracity of Griles' testimony on his relationship, and interaction, with Abramoff."

Griles and Wooldridge came to Interior from different backgrounds. Griles is a career Washington insider. Before becoming Interior deputy secretary in 2001, he spent eight years in the Reagan administration's Interior Department, including five years as the assistant secretary for land and minerals management. He'd then spent years lobbying for coal, oil, and other corporate interests.

Wooldridge came to Washington in 2001 as a rising star with an earthy sense of humor. Soon after arriving, she made news for joking at a conference in Scottsdale, Ariz., about her experiences castrating sheep with her teeth while growing up on a small California farm. The captain of the women's basketball team at the University of California, Davis, Wooldridge went on to Harvard Law School and returned to California in 1987 to work for the Sacramento firm of Diepenbrock, Wulff, Plant & Hannegan.

There she met Lungren, who was impressed with her intelligence and drive. Lungren was elected California attorney general in 1990. After winning re-election in 1994, he brought Wooldridge to the state legal office. There, Lungren made her California's lead negotiator in the multibillion-dollar settlement, known as the Master Settlement Agreement, between tobacco companies and 46 state governments.

It was during those negotiations that Wooldridge met Norton, who was then Colorado's attorney general, and cemented a bond that would carry her to Washington, friends of Wooldridge say.

Saying no

After George W. Bush became president, Norton became secretary of the interior. Wooldridge was brought on as her deputy chief of staff in 2001, and she quickly became involved in attempting to resolve disputes over access to water in the West. The No. 2 position at Interior went to Griles, who overcame opposition to his nomination by a number of environmental and watchdog groups for his background as an energy lobbyist.

By late 2002, Griles was the focus of what would become a wide-ranging ethics investigation by the inspector general's office at Interior. Among the activities being scrutinized: the possibility that Advanced Power Technologies Inc., a former client of Griles, was given preferred treatment for Interior contracts; a dinner party Griles planned for senior Interior officials at the house of Marc Himmelstein, his former lobbying partner, whose firm was then paying Griles severance of more than a quarter-million dollars annually; and contacts by Griles with the Environmental Protection Agency regarding an assessment of a massive coal-bed methane project planned by some of his former clients in Wyoming and Montana.

It was also in 2002, according to a report produced by the inspector general, that Wooldridge was given a new duty. After an incident in which Advanced Power Technologies was given access to Griles' government conference room to pitch a new technology to a group of top Interior officials (Griles himself did not attend the presentation), Wooldridge was assigned to screen Griles' contacts on all matters in which he was recused.

By February 2004, as the inspector general's office was nearing completion of its investigation of Griles' contacts with former lobbying clients, the romantic relationship between Griles and Wooldridge had quietly blossomed, current and former officials say.

The next month, the Office of Government Ethics issued a letter analyzing the facts contained in the inspector general's draft report about Griles, clearing him of misconduct in a number of matters but concluding that Griles may have committed an ethical violation regarding his involvement in the coal-bed methane project approval sought by several of his former clients.

Wooldridge leapt to his defense. According to the inspector general's report, Wooldridge contacted the office with a memorandum for the record disputing the Office of Government Ethics analysis. Ultimately, when the inspector general's report was released in March 2004, it did not accuse Griles of breaking any law but stated that Griles had landed himself in an "ethical quagmire."

The final report concluded that Griles' many former clients with business before Interior, combined with the department's weak ethics oversight, was "a train wreck waiting to happen."

The report recommended reorganizing and strengthening Interior's ethics office. Among the recommendations: "Ethics advisers must be willing to say the word 'NO!' — even to high-level political appointees."

Guarding the henhouse

It's not clear when Norton became aware of the relationship between her two subordinates. Norton resigned from the government in March 2006 and is now a corporate lawyer for Royal Dutch Shell Inc. A lawyer for the former interior secretary said she was traveling overseas and could not be reached for comment.

But in 2003, part of her response to criticism of Interior's weak ethics practices was to consolidate responsibility for ethics advice within the Office of the Solicitor. In January 2004, Bush nominated Wooldridge to be the department's new solicitor, a position, according to one former Interior official, for which Griles had recommended her.

As part of her confirmation process, in March 2004, Sen. Wyden submitted a written question to Wooldridge noting her involvement in advising Griles on his ethics agreements. Given that her office would now oversee all of Interior's ethics matters, how would she ensure that all ethics agreements would be enforced? In a 720-word response, Wooldridge discussed a number of changes in Interior's ethics bureaucracy. But she offered just a single reference to Griles, an acknowledgement that she was "aware" of the inspector general's recently issued report. In closing, she wrote, "I will take the steps necessary to ensure that ethics agreements and recusals are enforced."

At Wooldridge's March 11 confirmation hearing, Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) asked, "Are you aware of any personal holdings, investments, or interests that could constitute a conflict or create the appearance of such a conflict?"

Wooldridge responded: "No, Senator. I have reviewed those with counselors for the department and ethics counselors, and with regard to my investments and interests, I do not believe there are any conflicts of interest."

Although Wooldridge ascended to the solicitor's job via a recess appointment, the Senate later confirmed her to the post. As solicitor, Wooldridge took over the supervision of not only Interior's ethics office but also the department's roughly 400-lawyer legal team and the mammoth, long-running Indian trust fund case now known as Cobell v. Kempthorne. She also worked frequently with the DOJ's Environment and Natural Resources Division, which represents Interior in a number of matters.

When Thomas Sansonetti stepped down from heading that DOJ office in April 2005, Wooldridge was selected by Bush for the slot.

In October 2005, as Wooldridge was again up for Senate confirmation for that job — which would make her the country's top environmental prosecutor — she was asked in a Judiciary Committee questionnaire to identify the categories of litigation and financial arrangements that were likely to present potential conflicts of interest.

The question came at a time when, according to Wooldridge's lawyers, she had recused herself from involvement in any cases involving Griles. In a standard response to the question — explaining that she would seek the advice of appropriate officials and recuse where necessary — Wooldridge did not mention Griles, nor did she mention that Griles' lobbying clients that year included the American Petroleum Institute, Consol Energy Inc., and Newmont Mining Corp.

Ann Klee, who as EPA general counsel worked closely with Wooldridge during Wooldridge's tenure at Justice, says she wasn't aware that Wooldridge had recused herself from any matters at the DOJ. But Klee, now a partner at Crowell & Moring, says she believes Wooldridge is someone who would do the right thing.

"She is one of the smartest, most effective lawyers that I've ever worked with and has more integrity than anyone I've ever worked with," says Klee, who also worked with both Griles and Wooldridge at Interior. Asked about Wooldridge's relationship with Griles, Klee pauses before saying, "I can't talk about her personal life."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bush's Uncle Benefited From Illegal Stock Sale, Records Show (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wires

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

President Bush's uncle William H.T. Bush was among a group of directors of a defense contractor who reaped $6 million from what federal regulators say was an illegal five-year scheme by two company executives to manipulate the timing of stock option grants, documents show.

Bush, known as "Bucky," becomes the second member of the president's family to become enmeshed in the stock options scandal this month. The two cases are unrelated.

Bucky Bush is the youngest brother of former President George H.W. Bush. He was an outside, non-executive director of Engineered Support Systems Inc., a defense contractor whose profits were bolstered because of the Iraq war.

The St. Louis-based company, a supplier of equipment and electronics to the military that was acquired last year by another defense contractor, has been under investigation by federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission concerning the alleged options backdating scheme.

Last week in U.S. District Court in Houston, President Bush's youngest brother, Marvin, was named as a defendant in a suit charging that officers and directors of HCC Insurance Holdings benefited from backdated options.

Marvin Bush, who is now an advisory director, was a director of the firm at the time some of the backdated options were issued. According to the complaint, Marvin Bush made $2.2 million by cashing in the questioned options. The class action suit was filed in behalf of HCC stockholders.

Bucky Bush and the others who sat on the board of Engineered Support Systems, known as ESSI, were not accused of any wrongdoing in the SEC's civil lawsuit. The action, filed Tuesday against the company's former chief financial officer and former controller, accuses them of enriching themselves and others with the backdating scheme.

More than 100 public companies are under investigation by the SEC and the Justice Department for alleged improper options backdating.

Bucky Bush was not immediately available to comment Thursday, an aide at the former president's office in Houston said.

He made about $450,000 in January 2005 by exercising his company stock options and selling shares, his filing with the SEC shows. When questioned by a Times reporter about the sale at the time, he said he had not pulled any strings in Washington to win Iraq war contracts for ESSI.

Pixar Pay Package To Lasseter Included Well-Timed Options (WSJ)

Pact Jobs Helped Arrange Had Grant Date 3 Months Before Deal Was Signed

Steve Jobs helped negotiate an employment contract with a top film director that included a large stock-options grant with an especially well-timed date, according to a person familiar with the matter.

The options grant, part of a 2001 employment contract reached between Pixar Inc. and noted animated-film director John Lasseter, carried the lowest share price of the previous year -- on a date more than three months before the employment contract was actually signed. Mr. Jobs, then Pixar's chairman and chief executive, signed the agreement on behalf of Pixar.

It remains unclear what role, if any, Mr. Jobs played in selecting the prior grant date of the agreement's stock options. The grant is one of several the Emeryville, Calif., movie company awarded at yearly lows, a pattern that has raised questions about whether the Pixar grants were improperly backdated.

Pixar was bought last year by Walt Disney Co., which is conducting an internal investigation into Pixar's options-granting practices. Federal prosecutors in San Francisco also are looking into Pixar options and are awaiting the conclusion of the Disney probe, according to people familiar with the matter. Mr. Jobs sits on Disney's board and is its largest individual shareholder. Mr. Lasseter is Disney's chief creative officer of its animation studios.

Disney declined to comment beyond its previous statements. Disney referred all questions for Mr. Jobs to Apple Inc., where a spokeswoman said he wasn't available.

In November, Disney Chief Executive Bob Iger said that "we aren't aware of any basis under which stock options that were issued by Pixar would have a material impact on our financial statements." The company declined to make Mr. Lasseter available for comment. Mr. Lasseter appeared yesterday at a Disney analysts meeting in Orlando, Fla., where he unveiled plans for a third "Toy Story" movie.

· The News: While at Pixar, Apple's Steve Jobs helped negotiate an employment contract with a film director that included a large stock-options grant that carried the lowest share price of the previous year on a date more than three months before the contract actually was signed.

· Background: Disney, which bought Pixar, is conducting an internal investigation into Pixar's options-granting practices. Federal prosecutors also are looking into Pixar options and, along with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, are examining Mr. Jobs's role in stock-options backdating at Apple.

The prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission already are examining Mr. Jobs's role in stock-options backdating at Apple, where he is chief executive. An internal probe by Apple recently cleared him of any wrongdoing but said Mr. Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates."

Pixar and Apple are two of nearly 140 companies under federal investigation for possible stock-options manipulation. Options let recipients buy company shares some time in the future, usually at the price on the day they are granted -- meaning recipients profit when shares rise above their grant-date price. Backdating involves pretending that the grant was made earlier than it actually was, at a lower price, thus enhancing potential profit.

SEC filings show that on March 21, 2001, Mr. Jobs signed a new, 10-year employment agreement with Mr. Lasseter, a two-time Oscar winner whose directing credits include "Toy Story" and "A Bug's Life." The contract superseded a seven-year contract that Pixar had signed with the director in 1997.

By late 2000, after two "Toy Story" hit movies, Mr. Lasseter had become the animation world's biggest superstar, and was seen as Pixar's most-valuable asset. Mr. Jobs was therefore anxious to lock him into a long-term contract, according to a person familiar with the matter. He may have been concerned that a competitor might try to poach Mr. Lasseter. Indeed, Disney appeared interested in the animator. Then-CEO Michael Eisner had wooed Mr. Lasseter, and another person familiar with the matter says that within Disney there was discussion of whether he could be hired.

The new Pixar contract included a $5 million signing bonus, a $2.5 million annual salary and one million stock options. But the options weren't priced on the date of the contract. "In connection with the Employment Agreement, Mr. Lasseter was previously granted an option to purchase 1,000,000 shares of our common stock at the fair market value on the date of such grant," according to Pixar documents filed with the SEC.

The options were dated Dec. 6, 2000, carrying a strike price of the stock's close the day before. That price marked the yearly low and was at the bottom of a months-long slide. By the close of trading on March 20, the day before the contract was signed, Pixar's shares had climbed 24%, increasing Mr. Lasseter's potential profit by $6.4 million. Between 2003 and last year, Mr. Lasseter exercised and sold about 880,000 of the options, adjusted for a two-for-one split, at various prices before converting the remaining shares to Disney shares when the acquisition took place, SEC records show.

Mr. Lasseter's Dec. 2000 grant featured several peculiarities that raise questions about when he actually received them, according to a review of SEC filings.

Under SEC rules at the time, Mr. Lasseter was required to report the options grant to the SEC no later than 45 days after the end of Pixar's fiscal year -- which meant a deadline of mid-February 2001. But the grant wasn't reported until May 9, 2001 -- 84 days past the deadline for disclosing the options to the SEC and 49 days after the new contract was signed. Moreover, on April 30, 2001, Pixar told the SEC that Mr. Lasseter's filing "will be filed late," without any explanation.

According to a person familiar with the situation, Pixar prepared and filed SEC filings on behalf of its executives.

In his 1997 contract, Mr. Lasseter also received stock options. He reported those to the SEC within two weeks of the grant date, nearly a year before the agency's deadline. He included them on a form reporting the exercise of some earlier options he had received. At the time, the SEC gave corporate insiders a choice of reporting option grants either on so-called Form 4s in which they reported other stock transactions or on separate annual Form 5s which could be filed later.

Mr. Lasseter had a similar opportunity to report his options grant with the December 2000 date. On March 12, 2001 -- nine days before he signed his new employment contract -- Mr. Lasseter filed a Form 4 with the SEC reporting the sale of some Pixar shares. But he didn't include any mention of the options dated in December. Mr. Lasseter wasn't the only Pixar employee to be awarded options with the timely Dec. 6, 2000, grant date and a strike price the day before. So was Edwin Catmull, who co-founded Pixar with Mr. Jobs. Mr. Catmull received 500,000 options.

As it happened, Mr. Catmull reported exercising on Dec. 5 some other options he had, and reported that exercise to the SEC in a Form 4 filing on Jan. 9, 2001. But the filing made no mention of the 500,000-option grant of Dec. 6, 2000. He reported that grant to the SEC in a Form 5 filing on Feb. 13, 2001.

Mr. Catmull had recently been promoted. On Jan. 24, 2001, Pixar announced that he had been named president. Disney declined to make Mr. Catmull, who is now president of the combined Disney and Pixar animation studios, available for comment.

Another peculiarity that raises questions of when Mr. Lasseter actually received the grant is contained in the wording of the employment agreement. According to his new contract, his December 2000 options vested, or became exercisable, "on an equal monthly basis over the ten years of the [employment] agreement." Since the agreement wasn't signed until March 21, 2001, that would mean that the options began vesting in April 2001.

Yet Mr. Lasseter's Form 5 filing seems to contradict this, stating that the options carried an expiration date of Dec. 6, 2010, or 10 years after the grant date, and that they will "vest each month over a 10-year period." That suggests they began vesting in January 2001.

Aon To Review Options Practices (CHIT)

By Becky Yerak, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 9, 2007

A stock buyback helped boost Aon Corp.'s per-share earnings in the fourth quarter, but it also disclosed Thursday that it has launched a "comprehensive review of option grant date practices and related accounting issues."

The Chicago-based insurance brokerage and consulting firm said it recently determined that incorrect dates for "certain" stock options granted in 2000 and in certain previous years appear to have been used for accounting purposes.

"Based upon our preliminary review, the company has not found evidence of intentional misconduct or financial self-dealing, including backdating or other manipulation of stock option pricing," Aon said in its earnings release, issued after the market closed.

But Aon said that its audit committee has begun a thorough review of option grant date practices. Aon wouldn't say which of the certain options are in question, though a spokesman did say that they don't involve the options of Patrick Ryan, Aon's executive chairman who was chief executive in 2000.

It said it hasn't yet been able to determine the amount of additional compensation expense or related impact on taxes, but said it doesn't expect it to be material in 2005 or 2006. It said it will try to quantify the impact on finances for previous periods by the time it files its annual report on or before March 1.

Stock option scandals have caused the downfall of several prominent chief executives who received option grants that had been backdated, or artificially rigged to make them more valuable. Nearly 200 companies have disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department or internal investigations are looking into potential problems with backdating.

Meanwhile, Aon had fourth-quarter net income of $224 million, or 68 cents a share, compared to $224 million, or 65 cents a share, in the same period a year ago.

It repurchased about 11 million common shares in the fourth quarter for $390 million. Diluted average shares outstanding were 333.6 million in the latest quarter, compared with 347.5 million in the year-ago quarter.

Aon said income from continuing operations, excluding certain items, was 67 cents a share, compared with 47 cents a share a year ago. On that basis, analysts were expecting 63 cents a share, according to Thomson Financial. Revenue rose 7 percent, to $2.4 billion.

Restructuring expense in the most recent quarter was $86 million, compared with $123 million for the fourth quarter of 2005. A previously announced three-year restructuring plan is now expected to result in pretax charges of $365 million. That's up from estimates of $260 million in early 2006 and $300 million in the third quarter of last year.

IRS Proposes Penalty Relief For Options (AP)

IRS Proposes Tax Penalty Relief for Backdated Options, Simplifying Employee Paperwork

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Companies can voluntarily pay the additional taxes rank-and-file workers face because they were issued backdated stock options, the IRS said Thursday.

The Internal Revenue Service initiative affects the additional 20 percent tax and any interest tax employees would owe after exercising backdated stock options. The proposal's main benefit would simplify taxes for individuals whose companies agree to pay the additional taxes. It wouldn't apply to top executives and company insiders.

The IRS said its "Compliance Resolution Program" would help employees who may be unaware that they held backdated stock options.

Options give holders the right to buy stock at a particular point in the future at a predetermined price. Federal authorities have been probing whether companies have backdated the exercise price of the options to a date when the price was lower.

Federal authorities are scrutinizing the options practices of nearly 140 companies. There are many other companies conducting internal reviews of their stock option plans.

"This shameful practice was widespread," IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said. "We are allowing employers to satisfy the tax obligations of employees who did not knowingly participate in these schemes."

He added the IRS plan doesn't extend to "the executives and insiders who were the principal beneficiaries of the backdating schemes." The offer applies to employees, except for executives, insiders, and shareholders owning at least 10 percent of a company who are required to disclose their holdings under federal securities laws, IRS said.

"The opportunity will not be available for backdated options exercised by most corporate executives or other insiders," IRS said in a press release.

IRS is still pursuing enforcement investigations into the options backdating cases.

"We continue to pursue these cases and work closely with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department as appropriate," Everson said. The IRS said this new plan doesn't involve or affect any other federal agency's investigations or regulatory action.

Exercising backdated stock options can result in serious tax consequences. Employees that did so in 2006 may owe an additional 20 percent tax, plus an interest tax, under deferred compensation regulations. With stock options that aren't backdated, the employee would owe income tax on the difference between the value at the date of grant and exercise.

The new IRS initiative allows companies to step forward and pay the additional 20 percent tax and any interest tax that employees owe.

IRS Urges Companies To Pay Taxes Owed By Workers Unaware Of Backdated Options (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Internal Revenue Service has come up with a plan to help rank-and-file employees who owe taxes because they unwittingly received backdated stock options: Have their employers pick up the tab.

The IRS initiative, which is voluntary, proposes that companies with backdating problems pay the steep additional taxes due from lower-level employees who exercised backdated stock options in 2006.

The theory: Employees who had nothing to do with receiving backdated options shouldn't be penalized. Top corporate officials of companies with backdating problems will remain on the hook for taxes on exercised stock options that were backdated.

"We're sending the message here that a proper penalty has to be paid but allowing it to be resolved by the companies so [lower-ranking] individuals aren't swallowing the penalty," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in an interview. "We think it's appropriate to pursue more directly individuals who were manipulating and benefiting from the untoward conduct."

The IRS program comes as more than 140 companies are facing potential problems about how their stock options were dated. More than 130 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Justice Department has charged five executives with criminal wrongdoing in connection with stock-options backdating.

Robert Salwen, a compensation attorney and consultant in Scarsdale, N.Y., said the IRS announcement isn't a major concession by the government, but is really "a way for companies to minimize the embarrassment of having failed to comply" with tax rules on stock options.

Under IRS regulations, each affected employee is required to go through the task of calculating the penalties and interest due on improperly dated options, then report that on their individual 1040s. What the IRS is doing, Mr. Salwen says, "is allowing companies to take on the burden of having to report and calculate the penalty taxes." Some lawyers say it is hard to imagine many companies taking advantage of the new IRS program, since paying employees' taxes doesn't resolve any corporate-tax issues and there is no penalty to corporations for not participating in the program.

The initiative comes in response to a request by a group of lawyers and accountants who sought to develop a settlement program where companies would pay something less than the full tax that employees would be charged.

"We proposed the IRS develop a program where companies can say we're not sure we have a problem [but] we'd be willing to pay something to make it go away," said Mary B. Hevener, a partner in Baker & McKenzie LLP's Washington office. "I'm a little surprised it's this tough. For them to announce settlement terms that are the maximum conceivable amount that anyone will pay, people aren't going to take them up on the settlement."

Another obstacle: A number of companies haven't completed internal investigations looking into whether options were backdated, so they may not know if they have a problem, or the potential cost to fix it.

The IRS has given companies until Feb. 28 to notify the agency of their intention to participate in the program and until March 15 to contact employees about their participation. The program applies only to options that vested in 2005 and 2006 and were exercised last year.

Mr. Salwen said he expects some companies will take up the IRS on its offer. And he figures the IRS would benefit, too. Instead of having to audit hundreds of individual filings from employees at a particular company to ensure compliance, it only has to look at information filed by the company itself.

Under IRS rules, employees have to pay regular income tax on income they have received from exercising stock options, based on the difference between the option's strike price and the market value of the stock when the option is exercised

For employees who received backdated options, they may have to pay an additional 20% tax, plus an interest tax, under 2004 deferred-compensation regulations. The rules don't apply to options that vested before 2005.

While companies can't resolve their top executives' taxes through this program, some have taken steps to spare them from the tax on any options they haven't yet exercised, by repricing the options to fix the backdating. In some of these cases, the companies have paid the executives a special bonus to compensate them for the repricing.

Prosecutors Deny Dragging Feet In Nacchio Trial (AP)

By Sandy Shore, AP Business Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

DENVER (AP) - A federal judge sharply rebuked prosecutors and Joe Nacchio's attorney's Thursday, calling them "petulant children" as he issued several orders in the insider trading case against the former Qwest chief executive.

"This just seems to be petulant children in a sandbox kicking sand at each other," U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham said, referring to a series of motions exchanged between the two sides this week as the March 19 trial approaches.

"I think what you need to do is stop whining and get on with the business of preparing for this trial," he told the attorneys.

Nottingham had stern words for both sides as he worked his way through the motions with attorneys sitting quietly in the courtroom or listening via telephone. He set a series of deadlines ahead of the next status conference on Feb. 23.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers have been arguing over the evidence exchange process, which includes witness interviews, documents and classified government information.

Nacchio's attorneys complained this week that prosecutors have been dragging their feet in turning over evidence and that they needed a 60-day delay to review material they received as late as Monday.

Prosecutors denied the accusations and said the process had been slow because of the procedures in federal law that must be followed for classified documents.

Nottingham said he was dismayed by how long it has been taking to turn over evidence but stopped short of penalizing prosecutors, instead ordering them to produce transcripts of witness interviews within 48 hours.

He rejected what he called the defense's "backhanded, lame request for a continuance," saying there was no showing of prejudice that would require a delay. "This case is going to be tried March 19th on schedule," he said.

Nottingham also ruled that one government motion and some documents filed with the court would not be shared with Nacchio's attorneys, saying the information was highly classified and needed to be guarded for national security concerns.

He noted that the information - with some details such as names and locations of buildings omitted - had been given to the defense.

By telephone, defense attorney Herbert Stern began to object saying that his team was "as trustworthy" as the prosecutors when Nottingham interrupted.

The judge said he never questioned whether the defense team could be trusted but that the more people who knew about the documents' contents the greater chance that the information would be released inadvertently.

"My reason (for withholding the full documents) has nothing to do with whether you can be trusted," he told Stern. "I don't appreciate you're trying to make a record of something I didn't say."

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge that Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

He has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts which made him more optimistic about the Denver-based telephone company's financial future.

The documents are protected by the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets strict guidelines for viewing secret government material such as business contracts.

Attorneys for both sides have been working on substitute explanations for the documents that can be made public at trial without violating the law.

It requires attorneys and the judge to receive Justice Department security clearances before they are able to review the contracts in secure facilities.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

4 Admit Conspiracy In Stock-Tip Case (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

A former pharmaceutical executive and two of his sons pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy charges for engaging in what authorities called a "brazen" scheme to profit more than $2 million from illegal stock tips passed among the family members and their friends.

Zvi Rosenthal, 62, a former vice president at Taro Pharmaceutical Industries of Hawthorne, N.Y., shared confidential information about the generic-drug maker's products and financial condition with his sons Amir, 29, and Ayal, 26, more than a dozen times from 2001 to 2005, according to securities regulators.

The three men and Amir Rosenthal's friend David Heyman, 29, pleaded guilty to a single count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. Each defendant faces a maximum prison term of five years and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced in May, U.S. Attorney Roslynn R. Mauskopf said.

Securities and Exchange Commission officials yesterday filed related civil insider-trading charges against the men and several of their alleged confederates, including Oren Rosenthal, 30, Rosenthal's eldest son, and Bahram Delshad, 55, Amir Rosenthal's father-in-law.

Mark K. Schonfeld, director of the SEC's Northeast Regional Office, said the case is particularly disturbing because it appeared to be a "family business based on insider trading."

Members of the Rosenthal family and many of their friends worked as lawyers and accountants at respected businesses, including the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers. They were people "who had every reason to know better," said Bruce Karpati, an assistant regional director at the SEC.

The Rosenthals created a hedge fund, Aragon Partners, to hide the source of their stock trades from authorities, according to court papers. Hedge funds are investment pools designed for wealthy individuals and are subject to less oversight than other investment vehicles. The men also traded using sophisticated options contracts, rather than run-of-the-mill shares of Taro and other stocks, to avoid detection, regulators said.

Zvi Rosenthal engaged in some of the improper trades when he was on probation for making false claims to the Defense Department while employed at a contractor that made military uniforms, according to the 51-page SEC complaint. He resolved that case by pleading guilty to a single felony false-claims charge in 2000. At the time, Zvi Rosenthal also agreed to a $20,000 fine and three years of probation, including six months of home confinement and electronic monitoring.

Amir Rosenthal, a former corporate lawyer at a large New York law firm that prosecutors did not identify, received kickbacks from two of the people with whom he shared confidential information. A friend gave him more than $6,300 in cash to buy a plasma television, and Delshad gave him $66,000 in installments routed through Delshad's children, SEC lawyers said.

In all, the family members and their friends collected more than $1.5 million in profit and avoided millions of dollars more in potential losses by trading on confidential tips, for a total of nearly $4 million, according to regulators.

Paul Shechtman, a lawyer for Amir Rosenthal, said, "I've never seen so much hard-earned human capital lost in one day."

Former Thacher Proffitt Associate Admits Role In Insider Trading Scheme (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 9, 2007

A former associate at Thacher Proffitt & Wood faces up to five years in prison after he pleaded guilty Thursday in Eastern District of New York federal court to an insider trading scheme involving his father, brother and a childhood friend who worked at Ernst & Young.

The 29-year-old attorney, Amir Rosenthal, his co-defendants and several others named in a civil securities complaint earned as much as $3.7 million by trading on inside information provided by Rosenthal's 62-year-old father, Zvi, a former executive at Taro Pharmaceutical Industries, Ltd., according to prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Another Thacher Proffitt associate Thursday settled related civil insider trading charges and may face termination by the firm.

Thacher Proffitt did not do business with any of the companies whose shares were traded, and Rosenthal, a graduate of New York University School of Law, was not alleged to have relied on firm information. He executed several trades before joining the firm in September 2004. The firm suspended him in April 2006 after the SEC and federal prosecutors began an investigation. He was terminated in June 2006.

But Rosenthal did provide information to his supervisor at Thacher Proffitt, associate Young Kim, according to the SEC.

Kim's future employment was in question Thursday after Thacher Proffitt learned that he had settled a civil complaint with the SEC for $4,288 and agreed to pay $42,000 in penalties. He consented to a judgment without admitting or denying the SEC's insider trading allegations.

Thacher Proffitt knew Kim was a potential witness against Rosenthal and was being questioned about insider trading, but it did not know until Thursday that the SEC would take action against him or that he would agree to pay civil penalties, according to a spokesman.

"It's a complete surprise to us," the spokesman, Paul Tvetenstrand, said. "We were not aware that Young Kim had done anything wrong and was anything other than a witness."

Kim, who joined the firm in 2000 after graduating from Cornell Law School in 1998, was on vacation and could not be reach for comment; his attorney, Susan Walsh of Moskowitz & Book, was also unavailable.

Tvetenstrand said the firm would speak with Kim upon his return and decide his future.

"We are a securities law firm," Tvetenstrand said. "We cannot afford to even have the slightest shadow of a doubt about our credibility."

In a 90-minute hearing Thursday, Eastern District Judge John Gleeson accepted guilty pleas from Rosenthal; his father, a resident of Tenafly, N.J., who has a prior conviction for defrauding the government; his 26-year-old brother Ayal, an accountant at PricewaterhouseCoopers; and his friend David Heyman, 29, an accountant at Ernst & Young. Amir Rosenthal and Heyman attended high school and Rutgers University together.

Zvi Rosenthal, wiping away tears, admitted that since 2001 he had provided Amir with inside information about Taro Pharmaceutical, including details about pending Food and Drug Administration approval for the company's drugs. He also told his son when Taro's profits would not meet expectations so his son could trade on the subsequent decline in the value of the company's shares.

Amir Rosenthal admitted that he passed similar information to his brother and to Heyman.

The Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office said the men made more than $2 million through insider trading. The SEC put the figure at $3.7 million, including gains by three others who were not charged criminally: Kim; Bahram Delshad, Amir's father-in-law; and Amir's 30-year-old brother Oren, a former attorney at the New York office of O'Melveny & Myers.

Rosenthal also attempted to trade on information provided by Heyman in 2005 about an upcoming merger between two large, publicly held companies -- information Heyman had learned as an employee of Ernst & Young (the U.S. Attorney's Office did not identify the companies). The merger did not happen and Rosenthal realized no gain. He also received kickbacks from Heyman ($6,300 for a plasma television for Zvi) and Delshad ($66,000 delivered in $11,000 installments through Delshad's children).

Under federal sentencing guidelines agreed upon by prosecutors and defense attorneys for the men, Amir Rosenthal will likely receive 33 to 41 months in prison, with a maximum of 5 years. His father will likely receive 51 to 71 months. Heyman faces 21 to 27 months, while Ayal Rosenthal faces up to 6 months.

Tvetenstrand described Rosenthal's guilty plea as "very sad."

Amir Rosenthal's attorney, Paul Shechtman of Stillman, Friedman & Shechtman, said, "This is a very sad chapter for a good family."

A Matter Of Fair Play (NYT)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

Financial markets run on information. Knowledge turns into money for whoever reacts to changes the fastest and makes the right bets. Most part-time investors working with their nest eggs know they're a step slower than the top professionals at Wall Street banks and hedge funds. But that doesn't mean they deserve an unfair playing field.

That's why we applaud the Securities and Exchange Commission's decision to begin a broad examination into whether employees at major Wall Street banks have been leaking information to their favorite customers, like funds. As Jenny Anderson reported recently in The Times, the S.E.C. is requesting reams of information from large banks to determine whether bankers are tipping off hedge funds — whose active trading tends to make them lucrative customers — about other client's orders as a way to curry favor with them.

When most people hear about insider trading, they think of buying shares before a piece of good news drives up the stock price. But trading on nonpublic information can get much more complicated than that. Front-running is the technical term for buying ahead of a big sale or purchase. When, for instance, a mutual fund company buys a large stake in a stock, the stock will go up. Anyone who is aware of what is about to happen during the lag time between when the order is placed and when the purchase is made could get in first and make a killing, although it is illegal to do so. It would also mean the mutual fund would pay more for the same stock than it would have absent the front-running.

It is good to see the commission playing an active role. We hope that it is not just reacting to recent Congressional scrutiny. The former chairmen of the Senate Judiciary and Finance Committees, Arlen Specter and Charles Grassley, released an interim report last week taking the commission to task for mishandling an inquiry into possible insider trading involving the hedge fund Pequot Capital Management. Last fall, Mr. Grassley asked the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm, to take a closer look at the commission's enforcement and compliance divisions. Its report is expected by June.

Whatever happens, it is clear that the growing power of hedge funds in an ever more complex market requires increased scrutiny. While the S.E.C. looks for signs of insider trading, Congress should pass legislation to regulate hedge funds.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Lawyers Grill NBC's Russert (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- NBC's Tim Russert deflected criticism of his ethics and credibility as he completed a heated second day of cross-examination Thursday in the trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter Libby.

Russert, who testified that he never discussed outed CIA operative Valerie Plame with Libby, was the final prosecution witness before Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald rested his three-week perjury and obstruction case. Libby's attorneys will begin calling witnesses Monday.

The journalist was subjected to the kind of interrogation he usually gives guests on his Sunday television show "Meet the Press," as attorneys flashed excerpts of his previous statements on a video monitor and asked him to explain inconsistencies.

A law school graduate, Russert avoided several traps defense attorneys laid before him. He seemed uncomfortable at times, however, as they asked him to explain why he willingly told an FBI agent about a July 2003 conversation with Libby, then gave a sworn statement saying he would not testify about that conversation because it was confidential.

"Did you disclose in the affidavit to the court that you had already disclosed the contents of your conversation with Mr. Libby," asked Theodore Wells, one of Libby's attorneys.

"As I've said, sir ... "Russert began.

"It's a yes or no question," Wells interrupted.

"I'd like to answer it to the best of my ability," Russert said.

"This is a very simple question. Either it's in the affidavit or it's not?" Wells asked. "Did you disclose to the court that you had already communicated to the FBI the fact that you had communicated with Mr. Libby?"

"No," Russert said.

Wells wants to cast Russert as someone who cannot be believed, who publicly championed the sanctity of off-the-record conversations but privately revealed that information to investigators. Russert said he viewed the FBI conversation and testimony to prosecutors differently.

Russert's credibility is under fire because he and Libby tell very different stories about a July 2003 phone call that is at the heart of the case. The question of which to believe could be a critical jury room issue.

Both men agree that Libby called Russert to complain about a colleague's news coverage. Libby says at the end of the call, Russert told him "all the reporters know" that Plame, the wife of a prominent war critic, worked for the CIA. Russert testified that part of the conversation never occurred.

"That would be impossible," Russert testified Wednesday. "I didn't know who that person was until several days later."

Libby subsequently repeated the information about Plame to other journalists, always with the caveat that he had heard it from reporters, he has said. Prosecutors say Libby concocted the Russert conversation to shield him from prosecution for revealing classified information from government sources.

Libby's attorneys say Russert knew about Plame from colleagues David Gregory and Andrea Mitchell. Mitchell said in an interview that she and other reporters knew Plame worked for the CIA but she later recanted that statement. Wells had hoped to play clips of Mitchell discussing her statements on the Don Imus morning show on MSNBC.

Fitzgerald successfully argued that the tapes not be played.

"We might as well take 'Wigmore on Evidence' and replace it with 'Imus on Evidence,'" Fitzgerald said, referencing the classic treatise on evidentiary law. "There's no Imus exception to the hearsay rule. This has no business in a federal court."

Wells has questioned Russert about other phone conversations he couldn't remember, inconsistencies between his current account and FBI notes of an agent's original interview with him, and the likelihood that he would've let such a high-ranking official off the phone without fishing for some news.

DOJ_NMG_0130003

Suggesting that Russert was eager to see Libby face charges, Wells played a video of Russert discussing the impending indictment with Imus. Russert sounded giddy at times in the discussion, laughing and describing the anticipation as "like Christmas Eve."

Russert said he was eager for the story to unfold like any big event.

"Did you take joy in Mr. Libby's indictment?" Fitzgerald asked during follow-up questioning.

"No, not at all," Russert said. "And I don't take joy in being here."

Libby's attorneys also will try to undercut the credibility of former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who testified that Libby revealed Plame's identity to her. Defense attorney William Jeffress said he intends to call Miller's former boss, Times managing editor Jill Abramson, to try to refute Miller and question her credibility.

Prosecution Rests Case In Libby's Perjury Trial (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Prosecutors rested their case yesterday in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, completing a methodical portrait of a top-tier presidential aide who they say diligently scrambled to defend the White House against an early critic of the Iraq war and then lied to investigators about what he had done.

Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald concluded the prosecution's portion of the trial after 11 days in which he laid out for jurors a chronological narrative -- of a volatile period inside in the White House in 2003 -- that was sometimes dry but provided tantalizing glimpses into the worlds of President Bush's closest advisers and an elite tier of Washington journalists.

The prosecution first demonstrated the steps Libby allegedly took to find out the identity of Valerie Plame, an undercover CIA officer married to a former ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it justified the invasion of Iraq.

Fitzgerald then led jurors through the sequence of journalists and a White House press secretary Libby allegedly told about Plame in an effort, the prosecutor alleges, to discredit her husband by suggesting Wilson was sent on the CIA-sponsored mission as a result of nepotism.

Finally, the prosecutor -- relying on an FBI agent, eight hours of audiotapes of Libby testifying before a federal grand jury, and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert -- laid out the fabrications the government contends Libby told about his role in the leak.

On Monday, defense attorneys are scheduled to begin presenting their case, which will try to cast a more flattering light on Libby's statements and behavior. The defense has said it plans to begin by calling as witnesses several journalists, including some from The Washington Post, in part to show that Libby did not mention Plame to every reporter with whom he spoke early in the summer of 2003, around the time of the CIA leak.

The prosecution rested after one of Libby's attorneys spent hours yesterday hammering the ethics, memory and motives of Russert, potentially the government's most damaging witness. As the grand finale in the prosecution's effort to prove that the vice president's former chief of staff lied to investigators about his role in the leak, Russert told jurors it was "impossible" that he had disclosed Plame's identity to Libby, as Libby told FBI agents and a federal grand jury.

To try to undermine his testimony, defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. suggested that Russert harbored personal animosity for Libby and was "elated" when he was indicted in 2005.

On the witness stand for more than five hours of pointed cross-examination over two days, Russert said that he took no joy in Libby's fate and that, on the morning of Oct. 28, 2005, he had been keyed up only because a major news story on the indictments was to unfold within hours. But Wells implied to the jury that Russert had darker motives.

The defense played in court snippets of radio personality Don Imus's interview of Russert that morning. Russert, the moderator of NBC's "Meet the Press," spoke in giddy tones that contrasted markedly with his sober, careful style in court.

"It was like Christmas Eve here last night," Russert told Imus about his newsroom's anticipation of the results of the federal investigation that Fitzgerald was about to announce. "Santa Claus is coming tomorrow. Surprises! What's going to be under the tree?"

Wells also read parts of a transcript from that same day's broadcast of the "Today" show, in which Russert explained to host Katie Couric the significance of possible indictments against Libby or President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, which newspapers were reporting that morning.

"It's huge, Katie," Russert said on the program. "This is the first time in 130 years that a sitting White House official would come under indictment."

Russert's buoyant tone, Wells contended, reflected "bad blood" between Russert and Libby. Wells also pressed Russert to try to illustrate that he had a flawed memory, that he could have learned of Plame from two NBC colleagues, and that he acted inconsistently by answering an FBI agent's questions early in the investigation but seeking unsuccessfully months later to fight a grand jury subpoena for his testimony.

Fitzgerald tried unsuccessfully yesterday to persuade U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to prevent the defense from reading the jury excerpts of Russert's "Today" comments. "To turn it into a grudge match -- with some sort of bad blood -- I think that is a stretch," Fitzgerald argued.

Wells also suggested that Russert's 22-minute deposition with the special counsel had been incomplete because Russert was not asked whether he was told about Wilson's wife by NBC colleagues Andrea Mitchell or David Gregory, who were working on aspects of the unfolding Wilson story. Russert acknowledged that he was not asked about either one during his deposition but told the jury "they never came forward" to share with him anything they were learning about Wilson from administration officials.

Libby, 56, faces five felony counts of lying to investigators and a grand jury. He is not charged with actual disclosure of Plame's identity. He has repeatedly testified that he shared information about Plame with other reporters only after learning it from Russert during a telephone call.

Libby has acknowledged that Cheney first told him about Plame's CIA job in June 2003 but said that he forgot he knew about her by the time that, according to his account, Russert mentioned her nearly a month later.

Russert testified Wednesday that he could not have told Libby about Plame because he had not heard of her until she was publicly revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak on July 14, 2003 -- four days after Russert spoke with the vice president's right-hand man.

Fitzgerald has argued that Libby fabricated the story about learning the information from Russert to protect himself from criminal charges. Passing along gossip from a reporter would not be a crime, but disclosing a CIA officer's classified status to reporters after learning it from the vice president could be.

NBC's Russert Wraps Up Prosecution Case In Libby Trial (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — The prosecution finished presenting its case in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. on Thursday, leaving his defense lawyers to try to undo the government's contention that Mr. Libby lied under oath during an investigation into the leak of a C.I.A. officer's identity.

Mr. Libby's legal team will begin with a parade of Washington journalists as witnesses for the defense when the proceedings resume Monday. But lawyers for Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, left it a mystery as to whether they would call the two star attractions on their witness list: Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby himself.

The last day of the prosecution's case was largely consumed with an intense battle of wills between Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., and the final prosecution witness, Tim Russert of NBC News. Before the jurors left for a long weekend, they were bombarded as they have been each day with a fast-moving and complex torrent of information.

They seemed to pay close attention as Mr. Wells, known for his cross-examination skills, and Mr. Russert, a successful public communicator, went at each other for a second consecutive day.

Mr. Wells focused on Mr. Russert's behavior when he was first called by an F.B.I. agent and asked about a telephone conversation he had had with Mr. Libby on July 10 or 11, 2003.

In that call, the agent told Mr. Russert that Mr. Libby had said in an interview that he first learned of the identity of the C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson, from Mr. Russert in the July 2003 conversation.

Mr. Russert told the agent that Mr. Libby's assertion was untrue, that the issue of Ms. Wilson never came up in that conversation.

Mr. Wells, using the technique that Mr. Russert is known for as moderator of "Meet the Press," then put up on video screens throughout the courtroom Mr. Russert's words in an affidavit he filed later. In an effort to avoid complying with a subpoena to testify about the same subject before a grand jury, Mr. Russert swore that he could not discuss the conversation because to do so would violate his deeply held journalistic principles.

"Did you disclose in the affidavit to the court that you had already disclosed the contents of your conversation with Mr. Libby" to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Mr. Wells asked.

"As I've said, sir ... ," Mr. Russert began.

"It's a yes or no question," Mr. Wells interrupted.

"I'd like to answer it to the best of my ability," Mr. Russert replied.

"This is a very simple question. Either it's in the affidavit or it's not," Mr. Wells said. "Did you disclose to the court that you had already communicated to the F.B.I. the fact that you had communicated with Mr. Libby?"

"No," Mr. Russert said.

The July phone conversation between Mr. Libby and Mr. Russert is at the heart of the five-count felony indictment. Mr. Libby swore that he did not learn the identity of Ms. Wilson from fellow administration officials but learned it then from Mr. Russert.

Prosecutors have asserted that Mr. Libby concocted that testimony to avoid acknowledging that he learned about her from fellow officials.

Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed publicly on July 14, 2003, in a column by Robert Novak, only days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband criticizing the Bush White House.

Mr. Russert was notably more subdued during his two days of cross-examination than the ebullient personality he presents on television. He seemed initially taken aback by the pace and ferocity of Mr. Wells's questions. But by Thursday he had regained much of his confidence.

The Libby defense won a victory of sorts when Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed to exclude part of one of the five felony counts against Mr. Libby. But it remained unclear whether the change, which was not contested by the prosecutors, would matter in jury deliberations.

Mr. Libby's team won another victory when Judge Walton ruled that the defense could call as a witness Jill Abramson, the managing editor of The New York Times.

Mr. Libby's lawyers want to question Ms. Abramson in an effort to discredit one of the prosecution witnesses, Judith Miller, a former reporter for The Times. Ms. Miller, who went to jail for 85 days before agreeing to testify before the grand jury, has provided pivotal testimony against Mr. Libby, saying he informed her in detail about Ms. Wilson in several conversations.

Ms. Miller also testified that after a July 8, 2003, breakfast meeting during which Mr. Libby spoke at length about Ms. Wilson, she recommended to Ms. Abramson, then the Washington bureau chief, that the newspaper assign a reporter to look into Mr. and Mrs. Wilson.

Ms. Abramson had been quoted in The Times denying such a conversation, and Mr. Libby's lawyers want Ms. Abramson to cast doubt on Ms. Miller's credibility.

Ms. Abramson will probably testify on Tuesday, and other journalists, like Bob Woodward and Walter Pincus of The Washington Post, will take the stand on Monday.

Prosecution Rests Case Against Libby (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — After 11 days of testimony from some high-profile witnesses, prosecutors on Thursday wrapped up their case against former White House official I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — and the task now facing the defense appears daunting: convincing jurors that one Washington insider is to be believed when his version of events is at odds with that of so many others.

Libby's attorneys have succeeded in showing that prosecution witnesses at times suffered memory lapses. But those testifying against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff in his perjury and obstruction trial were consistent on two key points: what they did not tell Libby, and what he told them.

Tim Russert, NBC News' Washington bureau chief and moderator of "Meet the Press," was the latest to testify that Libby's description of events is wrong.

Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that he learned of CIA officer Valerie Plame from Russert.

Previous witnesses have testified they learned of Plame from Libby, which defense lawyers deny.

Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald wrapped up his argument in typically matter-of-fact fashion Thursday, telling U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton: "At this time the government rests its case." The defense is set to begin Monday.

Libby's trial, the first high-profile prosecution of a senior administration official in Washington in more than a decade, has been a legal and political spectacle, providing details of how the Bush administration launched a campaign against Plame's husband, a critic of the Iraq war.

The case grew out of Libby's statements to federal investigators about his conversations with three journalists around the time Plame was named in a July 14, 2003, newspaper column by Robert D. Novak. Libby, prosecutors charged, obstructed a federal probe into how Plame's identity became public. Disclosing the identity of an undercover officer can be a felony.

Russert completed his second day of testimony Thursday with a series of testy exchanges with Libby's lawyers, who sought to portray him as an unreliable witness with a grudge against the defendant.

At one point, Libby's lawyers played a tape of an interview with Russert by radio host Don Imus on Oct. 28, 2005, the day Libby's indictment was announced. Russert sounded giddy as he told how the pending release of legal documents targeting White House officials had the feel of "Christmas Eve" for reporters in Washington.

Theodore Wells Jr., Libby's lead attorney, suggested Russert was relishing the idea that Cheney's chief of staff was in serious legal trouble. "Who was Santa Claus?" Wells asked, wondering aloud if Russert saw prosecutor Fitzgerald in that role.

Russert insisted that he was merely describing the atmosphere of anticipation surrounding a case that had been two years in the making. When Fitzgerald asked whether Russert took any joy in Libby's legal trouble, the newsman turned solemn.

"No, not at all, and I don't take joy in being here," Russert said.

Later in the session, the case drew comparisons to the O.J. Simpson murder trial, which was criticized for how long it took to complete.

With jurors out of the room, Wells argued for permission to present more tapes of the "Imus in the Morning" show in which Russert and NBC News reporter Andrea Mitchell discussed the case. Fitzgerald protested that doing so would be tantamount to replacing traditional rules on evidence "with Imus on evidence."

"Or O.J. on evidence," Walton said, adding that the Simpson trial had dragged on for nine months largely because attorneys were given extraordinary latitude to pursue tangential arguments and evidence.

Libby has said, through his lawyers and in court papers, that he first heard about Plame in a conversation with Russert a few days after the New York Times published a July 6, 2003, column by her husband, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, criticizing the administration's use of prewar intelligence.

Russert testified he did not learn her identity until reading Novak's July 14 column. Two other journalists have testified that Libby told them about Wilson's wife.

The defense contends that Libby did not knowingly lie, but may not have recollected the conversations accurately because he was swamped with pressing national security matters. A memo from his files introduced into evidence shows that he learned about Plame from Cheney before he talked with the reporters. Libby has said he forgot that too.

Fitzgerald has alleged that Libby concocted the story about Russert after realizing that, by talking with reporters about Plame, he may have committed a felony by disclosing classified information.

In court, Fitzgerald has shown how Cheney's office mobilized to attack Wilson; the vice president even prepared the talking points. An issue of such importance to Cheney, Fitzgerald has argued, would be hard to forget.

Fitzgerald has "methodically constructed a wall of witnesses who all testified to what a significant issue Plame and her husband were," said Henry E. Hockeimer Jr., a Philadelphia lawyer and former federal prosecutor. "It's going to be hard for the jury to believe Libby simply was too busy at the time of his grand jury testimony to remember his conversations."

The prosecutor also has elicited testimony from former senior government officials that they remember telling Libby about Wilson's wife well before Libby says he learned about her from Russert.

The defense is expected to attack some of those witnesses in the days ahead. Walton ruled Thursday that Libby's lawyers could call New York Times Managing Editor Jill Abramson to discredit former Times reporter Judith Miller, who testified against Libby.

Other journalists, including Bob Woodward of the Washington Post, are expected to testify that Libby did not leak them information about Plame.

The defense has indicated that it also plans to call Cheney, presumably to buttress the point about his former aide's workload, but the timing of his appearance is unclear.

Whether Libby will take the stand in his own defense is unclear. His lawyers previously indicated he was going to testify, but they appear to be rethinking their plans.

"The defendant testifying in any case is your moment of truth for winning or losing," said Guy Singer, a Washington lawyer and former federal prosecutor. But, he said, Libby may have more to lose than to gain by taking the stand and allowing Fitzgerald — once described by a colleague as "Eliot Ness with a Harvard law degree" — to cross-examine him.

"I think that is very, very risky," Singer said. "He would have to explain his motives."

Fitzgerald would probably ask Libby, for example, whether it was true that he was engaged in a pitched battle to fight off what Wilson was saying publicly. The question would put Libby in a bind.

"If he admits it, he helps make the government case," Singer said. "If he denies it, he may appear to be lying."

Prosecution Rests After Russert Completes Testimony In Libby Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A television journalist deflected criticism of his ethics and credibility as he completed a heated second day of cross-examination Thursday in the trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter Libby.

NBC newsman Tim Russert, who testified that he never discussed outed CIA operative Valerie Plame with Libby, was the final prosecution witness before Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald rested his three-week perjury and obstruction of justice case.

Attorney's for Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, will begin calling witnesses Monday.

Plame's husband, former ambassador Joe Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's Iraq policy in a leading newspaper and on television in 2003.

The trial has provided the jury - and the public- a rare glimpse into how the highly disciplined Bush administration dealt with the media and how reporters extract or are provided information from high-level sources

Russert was subjected to the kind of interrogation he usually gives guests on his Sunday television show "Meet the Press," as attorneys flashed excerpts of his previous statements on a video monitor and asked him to explain inconsistencies.

A law school graduate, Russert avoided several traps defense attorneys laid before him. Defense attorney William Jeffress said he intends to call Miller's former boss, Times managing editor Jill Abramson, to try to refute Miller and question her credibility.

'Law And Order' Star Stands By Libby (NSDY/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

Long Island Newsday, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- One of the nation's most familiar "prosecutors" showed in Scooter Libby's camp in court Thursday.

But it was a "prosecutor" who only plays one on TV.

Joining Libby's public relations person, Barbara Comstock, in the public gallery was former Tennessee Republican Sen. Fred Thompson, who plays a New York City prosecutor on the NBC series "Law and Order." He came to listen while another NBC star, Washington bureau chief Tim Russert was cross examined by defense attorney Theodore Wells.

At one point, Libby's wife, Harriet Grant, went back and sat beside Thompson. They hugged, laughed and chatted for a few minutes before she returned to her seat in the front row.

Asked why he came Thompson said, "I'm a friend of Scooter Libby and his family."

During a late-morning break, Libby and Thompson shook hands in the hallway and went into a private conference room to chat. Thompson did not return for the conclusion of the morning session.

The former senator is on the steering committee of the Scooter Libby Legal Defense Fund Trust, an organization that set out to raise more than $5 million to help finance Libby's defense.

Thompson, who declined to answer more questions Thursday, hosted a fundraiser at his northern Virginia home last May to raise money for Libby's defense fund.

In Defense Of The Desperate (and The Notorious) (NYT)

By Robin Finn

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

REGRETTABLY, Ephraim Savitt is a little late for this friendly cross-examination, but not because he shrewdly anticipates that its subtext will be something scathing along the lines of "Don't you worry that everyone despises you for your emphatic defense of a cold-blooded murderer like Ronell Wilson? Where are your scruples?"

As a federal prosecutor for nearly eight years in the 1980s, Mr. Savitt takes such predictable ranting from a nonstudent of jurisprudence in stride. His laurels include the Justice Department's first conviction of ranking members of the Gambino crime family, Gene Gotti among them.

Sonorous of voice (part Motown-ish croon, part rabbinical oratory that is a genetic gift from his father, who died when he was 19), and impeccable of tailoring (his fluffy alpaca overcoat suggests topnotch llama), Mr. Savitt, 55, sweeps off the elevator into the vestibule of his Madison Avenue office.

He smiles, apologizes and insists that most people accuse his coat of "being designed by Smokey the Bear." Glib, yes, but too much of a mensch to be slick.

Then he wields his excuse for tardiness, a verbal bludgeon aimed straight at the conscience: It would be beyond impolite, would it not, for a criminal defense lawyer to duck out early from a meeting convened to formulate defense strategies for a desperate client. Which his tend to be, regardless of whether they are "white-collar criminal" types who can afford his regular $500 hourly fee or the cash-poor committers of capital crimes he defends, at the court's request, for a mere $163 an hour. That means taxpayers foot the bill. All the way to the Supreme Court, perhaps, in the Wilson case.

"There is no way that I will compromise in my defense of a client no matter how bad my client may be, or is perceived to be," is Mr. Savitt's mantra, mellifluously delivered, as he leads the way to an overheated office overstuffed with "ersatz mechanical piggy-banks and antique Judaica. It's a vice," he says of his collecting habits.

He keeps an assortment of antique silver, much of it acquired in Israel, at home on the Upper West Side, where his wife, Leah, four children, and the Lincoln Square Synagogue absorb his spare time. That is in short supply since the list of federal crimes that can result in the death penalty was expanded in 1994.

"There are a lot of Ronell Wilsons around, and I try not to make this my exclusive business," he says of defending murderers. "People hated me even before I took this case." (He received an anonymous death threat for being on Mr. Wilson's defense team.)

"I'm not at all excusing what he did. But to me, the only question now is when exactly is he going to die in prison, not if he's going to die in prison. I have nightmares about going to Terre Haute if he goes to the death chamber. I don't want to see it happen, but if it does, I suppose it is my moral obligation to be there for him."

More than a decade ago, Mr. Savitt was one of four lawyers appointed to represent defendants in the first capital prosecution in New York under the current federal death penalty act, and he has since defended other criminals in this predicament. Only Mr. Wilson received a death sentence.

In 1996, he obtained a life sentence for Peng You Zhong, a member of a Chinese gang accused of kidnapping, torture and murder. In 2003, he won a life sentence for Emile Dixon, a convicted murderer and crack dealer. On March 26, the trial of Richard James, accused of murder in what Mr. Savitt terms "a hybrid insurance fraud/death penalty case" begins.

He also represents Vincent Basciano, a k a Vinny Gorgeous, a reputed mobster accused of making death threats against Greg Andres, a federal prosecutor, and Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, of Federal District Court, coincidentally the presiding judge in the Wilson case.

Formal sentencing, scheduled for March 29, is the next step in the legal odyssey of Mr. Wilson, convicted of murdering two undercover detectives in a botched gun sale and already the recipient of a jury sentence of death by lethal injection. (Mr. Savitt is not sold on lethal injection as a painless ending and believes the death penalty should apply only to child murderers and terrorists, people he would refuse to defend.)

"I don't believe Ronell Wilson is the worst of the worst," he says.

The petulant Mr. Wilson, whose post-verdict misbehavior includes sticking out his tongue after the jury delivered its sentence last week and smashing a chair through a window at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn over the weekend, is the first defendant in New York in more than 50 years to receive a death penalty in a federal trial.

IT is the kind of history I don't want to make," says Mr. Savitt. "If I had my druthers, I would rather it had not been me on the defense team; there's no such thing as a 'good' death penalty case. But it doesn't make any sense not to appeal. I don't think justice has been vindicated by this sentence."

"Whatever happens at the appellate level, I think this case has a decent chance to go all the way to the Supreme Court," he adds, "because this whole area of the law is evolving and there's not a lot of appellate guidance, there were mistakes made." Among other concerns, Mr. Savitt feels that his client's statement of remorse was "sanitized" by the judge, dampening its effect.

Born in Paris to Holocaust survivors, Mr. Savitt moved with his family to Washington Heights as an infant. It was, he recalls, a tough neighborhood; at age 14, he was accosted by a knife-wielding man and harassed for wearing a yarmulke. "I guess I grew up learning," says Mr. Savitt, who went to law school at Fordham and opened his own firm in 1989, "how not to be a chicken." Murderers don't scare him. Prosecutors, either.

Stalker Usually Not A Stranger; Trigger Is Often Jealousy (USAT)

By Wendy Koch, Usa Today

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Nicole Kidman, Sharon Stone, Meg Ryan, Brad Pitt, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Steven Spielberg, Gwyneth Paltrow, Richard Gere and Katie Holmes share an experience beyond being on the Hollywood A-list. They've all reported being stalked, often by delusional fans.

Their widely publicized cases are unusual, though, because they involved strangers. Most stalkers and victims know each other, and many have a current or former romantic tie, says Mary Lou Leary, executive director of the National Center for Victims of Crime.

She cites government figures showing that 77% of female victims and 64% of male victims knew their stalkers. The most common trigger: a broken, lonely or jealous heart.

Astronaut Lisa Nowak, charged this week with attempted murder, knew Colleen Shipman, the woman she is accused of attacking at Orlando International Airport early Monday. Police said Nowak viewed her as a romantic rival over fellow astronaut William Oefelein.

After the alleged attack, Shipman filed a petition for a protective order in which she said Nowak had stalked her for about two months.

The case is unusual in that it alleges one woman stalked another, says Mindy Mechanic, assistant professor of psychology at California State University, Fullerton. She says most stalkers are men.

Noting Nowak's accomplished career, Mechanic says she has seen cases of stalkers who are highly educated, successful people but emotionally immature.

In celebrity cases, she says, stalkers often have psychiatric disorders. The more typical stalker, however, is someone who has trouble letting go of a real or imagined relationship but whose emotional condition may be less severe than a mental illness.

"The problem with stalking-related behavior is it's a slippery slope," she says. "It's normal not to want to let someone go," but it can become a problem when a rejected person persists, she says.

"It's often about power and control," Leary says. She says it can become dangerous, leading to sexual assault and murder, especially when a stalker takes the attitude that "if I can't have you, no one will."

The most recent comprehensive research on stalking, a 1998 Justice Department study, found that more than 1 million women and about 370,000 men are stalked annually in the USA. Women account for 78% of the victims and men for 87% of the perpetrators. The study said one in every 12 women will be stalked during her lifetime, and 81% of women stalked by a current or former intimate partner were physically attacked.

A survey of nearly 10,000 adults published in 2006 found 4.5% reported having been stalked. It was done by Kathleen Basile, a scientist at the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control.

Leary says no figures exist on whether stalking has increased, but she says awareness of it as a crime has grown.

DOJ_NMG_0130010

Victims need to report abuse but often find it difficult to accept that they're being stalked, says Lois Manns of the West Virginia Foundation for Rape Information and Services.

All 50 states have adopted anti-stalking laws, and 15 consider a first offense a felony, says Leary, a former prosecutor. She says, however, that it's often difficult to prove stalking, and that convicted stalkers tend to get light sentences.

Leary says stalkers have become better at evading detection and increasingly use Global Positioning System devices, spycams and computer software. She says many are no longer "lurking in the shadows in a trench coat."

N.J. Man Sentenced For Trying To Have Sex With Teen (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, February 9, 2007

NEW YORK -- A Hillsdale, N.J., man was sentenced on Thursday to 46 months in federal prison and fined $10,000 for traveling to Waltham, Mass., to have sex with a 15-year-old girl.

The defendant had actually been chatting on the Internet with an undercover police officer instead of a teenager.

After numerous Internet messages, the U.S. Justice Department said 49-year-old Martin Rob Van Vliet traveled to Waltham to meet the girl. Investigators presented evidence during the six-day federal trial that Vliet wanted to "commit a sexual act" with the girl.

Investigators said the exchanges took place in a Yahoo Inc., chatroom.

"Dateline NBC" continues to report on the national problem of child sex predators. "Dateline" has set up numerous sting operations catching grown men arriving to have sex with children, only to be confronted on camera and then arrested by law enforcement.

Fumo's Lawyer: Charges Political (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 9, 2007

State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's lawyer attacked the U.S. attorney's motives yesterday and called the 139 charges against his client nothing more than a malicious effort by the Bush administration to drive powerful Democrats from office.

"This is an indictment born of political ambition," lawyer Richard A. Sprague told reporters. "It reeks of malice."

Sprague described U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan, who was appointed by President Bush, as a political operative who loaded Fumo's indictment with "twists and distortions, venal and salacious entries, deliberate statements out of context."

Meehan's spokesman called Sprague's comments "inaccurate and regrettable."

Sprague's harsh words came on the same day that Fumo resigned from an influential post: a seat on the Delaware River Port Authority, which runs the PATCO line and regional bridges.

Fumo is charged with fraud, conspiracy, and obstruction of justice on a grand scale - using state Senate staff and funds from a neighborhood charity to support an opulent lifestyle and then orchestrating a cover-up after the FBI started asking questions.

In all, prosecutors say Fumo (D., Phila.) misused more than $2 million in public money and funds from the charity he helped create, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods. Fumo's influence gained the charity $30 million from Peco Energy, the DRPA, and state grants.

Fumo, whose personal worth exceeds $20 million, is accused of using the charity's money to pay for political polls, cars, power tools, farm equipment, personal errands and shopping sprees.

Among the most sensational allegations is that Fumo used people on the Senate payroll to clean his house and spy on ex-girlfriends and political opponents.

If convicted, Fumo likely faces two to four years in prison, and perhaps as many as 10 years.

Sprague, one of the city's most prominent lawyers, convened yesterday's news conference at his Rittenhouse Square law office a day after his client, one of the most powerful politicians in Pennsylvania, pleaded not guilty.

Sprague offered a glimpse into Fumo's defense against the obstruction-of-justice charges - that the senator directed a cover-up by ordering aides to destroy e-mails after he learned of the FBI investigation.

Fumo did nothing wrong, Sprague said. The senator's office simply followed a longstanding "document retention" policy that called for the office to routinely clear computers of old e-mails.

"Mr. Meehan knows that when Citizens' Alliance was under investigation, Sen. Fumo went and sought advice from a lawyer - not me - on whether he had to change his policy... . That lawyer told Sen. Fumo, 'No, you don't have to change your policy because you haven't been subpoenaed... .' "

The 81-year-old lawyer, a former prosecutor who rarely holds news conferences, spoke for 75 minutes yesterday but refused to answer specific questions about Fumo's spending and use of staff.

Instead, he mostly mocked Meehan and his case:

On using Senate workers for personal tasks:

"... Ask yourself: What is to prevent someone who is devoted, dedicated to their boss, Vince Fumo, to knock themselves out and, beyond their Senate time, do activities that make his time more efficient and make him more effective as a state senator?"

On using Senate workers for political tasks:

"How is it that Vince was able, as everybody concedes, to be the most effective senator Philadelphia has ever had? By just sitting in his office, or by doing political activity, anywhere, everywhere?"

On Meehan's post-indictment news conference:

"Mr. Meehan said that Sen. Fumo crossed the line. He did this, he did that... . Mr. Meehan talks as though Sen. Fumo has been convicted. That kind of presentation is an outrage."

On the size of the 267-page indictment:

"How do you make headlines as a prosecutor? I know all the tricks of the trade... . When you have a weak case, throw in the kitchen sink. Throw everything you possibly can in the indictment. Maybe something will stick."

On whether the Bush administration specifically targeted Fumo:

"Hopefully, they are... using the FBI to get Osama bin Laden and not Vince Fumo, but what I am saying is that they, from on high, do have a policy of using local U.S. attorneys to try to get effective Democrats."

Because of the scope of the case, Sprague said, he expects the trial won't begin for a year. He said the government has interviewed more than 1,000 people and plans to call 100 to 200 witnesses at trial.

"I am going to stick with this case and try this case," Sprague said. "I am 81 years young."

Meanwhile, Fumo yesterday continued to shed some of his clout in the state and the region - at least temporarily.

He stepped down from the DRPA, where he was long a power who exerted control over the agency's money and jobs. Fumo helped direct about $10 million from DRPA to Citizens' Alliance.

"I regret, due to the lack of time and energy, to be able to serve on the DRPA board," Fumo wrote in a letter to Auditor General Jack Wagner, who appointed Fumo.

Fumo yesterday also pulled his name from consideration as vice chairman of the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency, the state's wealthy college-loan agency. But he'll remain on the board.

The indictment has already hit Fumo in his pocketbook: When he stepped down as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee on Monday, Fumo also lost his $98,691 salary as a Senate leader.

Fumo, who has served for 29 years, now makes as much as a freshman senator - $73,614.

Fumo's Lawyer Says Staff Worked Hard Out Of Love For Boss (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale

AP, February 9, 2007

PHILADELPHIA - Indicted state Sen. Vincent J. Fumo's legal camp fired back at federal prosecutors Thursday, accusing them of malice, and defended Fumo's use of state workers for personal and political chores.

Veteran lawyer Richard A. Sprague - previewing the apparent defense strategy - said that state Senate aides loved Fumo and happily worked day and night for him.

"I have seen people who just had a joy of being there and working as a team for a guy they adore," Sprague said at a news conference. "I really see love expressed by them, for him."

Sprague argued that devoted staffers were lawfully entitled to "knock themselves out" for Fumo beyond their Senate workday. Their help enabled Fumo to concentrate on more important legislative duties, he said.

The 139-count indictment filed Tuesday accused Fumo, a Democratic power broker, of using staff and a local nonprofit group to clean his mansion, work his 100-acre farm, drive spare vehicles to his vacation homes, help out political allies, assist his campaigns and even spy on former lovers.

Much of the work was done during business hours, prosecutors said. They say Fumo defrauded the state out of more than $1 million and a South Philadelphia charity he allegedly controlled, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, out of a similar amount.

The trial could hinge on whether Fumo, a multimillionaire, ordered the employees to perform the tasks in question.

According to the indictment, state senators cannot use Senate employees on state time to perform personal or campaign tasks. "Senators were further prohibited from requiring, as a condition of their employment, that Senate employees perform such tasks on behalf of a senator after working hours," it states.

Prosecutors say Fumo controlled 90 Senate employees, and many more through Citizens' Alliance and the various boards on which he served, including the Delaware River Port Authority, the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency and the Independence Seaport Museum.

They say he rewarded loyalty with undeservedly high salaries or no-work state contracts.

"What business is it of the federal government to determine whether a state senator's staff is too big?" Sprague asked.

Sprague, a fiery former city prosecutor, called the investigation partisan and suggested the Republican Justice Department has its eyes on effective Democratic lawmakers like Fumo.

"This is not a case of greed. This is an indictment that was born of political ambition," Sprague said.

He charged that U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan had allowed "malicious leaks" during the four-year Fumo probe.

Meehan denied the charges.

"These comments are inaccurate and regrettable and we will present our case in court," he said through a spokesman.

Fumo pleaded not guilty to the charges at an arraignment Wednesday.

He has resigned from his leadership post on the Senate Appropriations Committee, and on Thursday was replaced as vice chairman of the PHEAA's board of directors. However, Fumo remains on the agency's board and in his Senate seat.

More Records Subpoenaed In U.S. Inquiry Into Bruno (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

A federal grand jury investigating the business dealings of Joseph L. Bruno, the State Senate majority leader, has issued subpoenas to two more companies that had been affiliated with an Albany businessman who is his friend and business associate, according to documents filed with securities regulators.

The subpoenas were received on Monday by Motient Corporation in Illinois and its subsidiary, TerreStar Networks, a Virginia provider of mobile satellite communications services, Motient disclosed in papers submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission yesterday. The Albany businessman, Jared E. Abbruzzese, resigned as chairman of TerreStar last month and had previously been a consultant to Motient.

The scope of the subpoenas, which sought documents related to Mr. Bruno, Mr. Abbruzzese and unidentified people and companies, suggested that the federal investigation of Mr. Bruno's business activities is widening. Although the nearly yearlong inquiry is believed to have focused on a consulting business the senator ran out of his home — whose clients included Mr. Abbruzzese — an array of Mr. Bruno's financial activities have also come under scrutiny in recent months.

The grand jury has issued subpoenas for information on Mr. Bruno's financial records and real estate investments; a consulting arrangement he had with an Albany-based investment firm; his dealings with a veterinarian with whom he owned racehorses; a $500,000 state grant he directed to an upstate company, Evident Technologies, in which Mr. Abbruzzese was an investor; and records of a state lobbying commission's inquiry into Mr. Bruno's use of airplanes provided by Mr. Abbruzzese.

Mr. Bruno has denied any wrongdoing. His spokesman had no comment on the subpoenas yesterday.

A message left for Stephen R. Coffey, a lawyer for Mr. Abbruzzese, was not answered. Attempts to reach Mr. Abbruzzese were unsuccessful.

It was unclear yesterday what connection, if any, Mr. Bruno had to Motient or TerreStar. He has not reported owning stock in either company on the annual financial disclosure statements he filed with the Legislative Ethics Committee.

Two years ago, Mr. Bruno disclosed owning stock in another firm connected to both of those companies: Tejas Inc., a small Texas-based securities brokerage of which Mr. Abbruzzese was once vice chairman and a major shareholder.

Mr. Bruno consulted with Mr. Abbruzzese before investing $31,500 in a public offering of Tejas stock in February 2005, a few months before Mr. Abbruzzese's consulting firm, Capital and Technology Advisors, merged with Tejas. Although the value of Mr. Bruno's shares increased for a time, he ultimately sold them at a loss.

About a year before Mr. Bruno bought his Tejas stock, Tejas was retained by Motient to provide investment banking services, at the suggestion of Mr. Abbruzzese, whom Motient had hired to help restructure the company following a bankruptcy, according to court papers that are part of a lawsuit filed in Delaware by Motient stockholders who accused Mr. Abbruzzese and his consulting firm of enriching themselves at Motient's expense.

The suit claimed that Mr. Abbruzzese pressured Motient's board to hire Tejas, while failing to disclose that he had options to purchase 100,000 shares of Tejas stock, whose price surged on the strength of the business being sent its way by Motient. Tejas announced a two-for-one dividend for its shareholders in November 2004, as the share price was approaching record highs.

"After Tejas began work for Motient," the stockholders' lawsuit said, "Tejas's investment banking revenue increased over 25,000 percent, annual profit increased over 2,600 percent and Tejas's stock price appreciated 900 percent in one year."

DOJ_NMG_0130013

A judge dismissed the suit last March, saying the claims did not constitute malfeasance under Delaware law. Tejas — which divested itself of Mr. Abbruzzese's consulting firm last year — has declined to comment on its dealings with Mr. Abbruzzese or on Mr. Bruno's investment.

Cocke Deputies Take Part In 'Rose Thorn' Arrests (KNOXNS)

By J.j. Stambaugh

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 9, 2007

Another round of arrests Thursday in the ongoing "Rose Thorn" corruption probe in Cocke County marked the first time local deputies have played a public role in the FBI-led initiative.

Four men were charged as part of an alleged illegal gambling operation based on cockfighting and were taken into custody by FBI agents assisted by state troopers and the Cocke County Sheriff's Department, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith.

The Rose Thorn investigation began in 2001 as an effort to root out corruption in the Cocke County agency. Longtime Sheriff D.C. Ramsey, who hasn't been charged, resigned early last year after it was revealed he had been targeted by the FBI because of allegations of protecting gambling operations.

A new sheriff, former state Trooper Claude Strange, has since taken the department's helm, and the FBI has made a point of trying to build bridges between the agencies. Strange couldn't be reached for comment.

Like Smith, FBI spokesman Gary Kidder said Thursday's arrests were a joint effort and "we want to emphasize we had excellent cooperation and assistance from" the Cocke County agency.

Kenneth R. Frazier, 64; his brother, Allen Eugene Frazier, 60; George Ray Hicks, 69; and Ernest Arrowood Jr., 67, were charged in a criminal complaint with conducting an illegal gambling business and sponsoring or exhibiting gamecocks in an animal-fighting venture.

The first offense is a felony that carries up to five years in prison, while the second charge is a misdemeanor.

Kenneth Frazier is the owner of the 440 Cockfight Pit on Camber Drive near Newport. His brother and the other men were allegedly involved in the pit's operations, according to the complaint filed by FBI Agent Thomas Farrow.

The cockfighting arena was allegedly an illegal gambling facility similar to the Del Rio Cockfighting Pit that was raided by a small army of state and federal agents in mid-2005.

The Rose Thorn investigation has uncovered large-scale drug trafficking, automobile chop shops, prostitution, public corruption, extortion and illegal gambling operations built around both cockfighting and video poker machines, authorities say.

Seven Cocke County lawmen have either been convicted or have pleaded guilty to crimes such as cocaine trafficking, attempted money laundering, perjury, and shaking down drug suspects and illegal immigrants.

Last year, Gov. Phil Bredesen's campaign returned more than $22,000 in contributions given since 2001 by individuals caught up in the Rose Thorn probe.

The money had either been donated by or raised through the efforts of Harold Grooms, a convicted chop shop operator who has been identified as a Rose Thorn target because of allegations of cocaine and marijuana trafficking.

Bredesen's campaign also returned $10,000 given by a man named Kenneth Frazier. It's unclear from public records whether the Kenneth Frazier who donated the money to Bredesen is the 440 pit's owner or a close relative who shares his name.

George Hicks gained notoriety more than 20 years ago when he was arrested by the FBI as part of another crackdown on vice in Cocke County. In 1983, Hicks was arrested for taking part in a cocaine-smuggling scheme along with then-Sheriff Bobby Stinson and ultimately served time in federal prison.

The four defendants were released on their own recognizance after their arrests and are scheduled to appear in federal court in Greeneville on Thursday, Smith said.

Tucson Man Gets 30 Months In Theft Case (AZREP)

By Celeste Sepessy, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, February 9, 2007

A Tucson man received 30 months in prison on Wednesday in connection to theft of government property.

Christopher Howard, 34, pleaded guilty to the theft of a Naval Aircraft Inertial Navigation System on Sept. 28 of last year, according to the U.S Attorney's Office.

Howard stole the system from Aerospace Maintenance and Regeneration Center in Tucson. The navigation system, worth $92,000, provides an electronic map to Navy pilots.

The United States Air Force Office of Special Investigations and the FBI conducted the investigation after receiving a tip that the equipment was stolen, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

The agencies found Howard shortly after and obtained the navigation system before Howard was able to sell it.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Petermann said Howard had been regularly surveying the center before stealing the system.

During this time, local authorities noticed a car parked near the maintenance center after-hours and saw Howard trespassing. The police cited Howard, taking down his name and information. They then notified maintenance center authorities of the incident.

This record helped lead the investigation toward Howard, Petermann said.

"The system actually had a sticker on it that said, 'Be careful with this device. It is worth its weight in gold," Petermann said. "Howard's eyes must have popped."

After his conviction, officials took Howard to the Corrections Corporation of America, a private federal facility in Florence.

Man Admits Sending Host Of Spam E-Mails (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- A man who flooded e-mail systems with millions of messages advertising software that could steal passwords pleaded guilty to violating a federal anti-spam law.

Joshua Eveloff, 27, of Carter Lake, Iowa, admitted Wednesday that he faked information on the e-mails to conceal that they came from him.

The messages, which promised to "steal anyone's password" and "read your FBI file," were sent to millions of people over three months in 2004. The FBI began investigating after a Florida company reported that its computers had been used to transmit at least 1.5 million e-mails in six hours.

Prosecutors said the case was only the nation's third to be brought under federal legislation banning unsolicited e-mails.

Eveloff could face up to three years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000 when he is sentenced in April.

Michael Twombly, of Cardiff, pleaded guilty in January to related charges and also will be sentenced in April. Prosecutors say he helped Eveloff lease computer access throughout the country.

Carjacking Charges Dropped (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 9, 2007

Focus is on expected capital murder case in slayings of Knox couple

In a move that was not entirely unexpected, prosecutors on Thursday announced their intent to drop federal carjacking charges in connection with the slayings of a Knox County couple.

"There are jurisdictional lines that just cannot be crossed," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Jennings said at a hearing Thursday before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton.

"It is the opinion of U.S. Attorney Russ Dedrick that the most serious crimes should be prosecuted by Knox County," Jennings said.

The decision to drop the federal case against all but one suspect comes after state prosecutors filed a 46-count indictment alleging a slew of crimes, including first-degree murder, kidnapping, rape and theft.

It is consistent with the notion espoused by some that the U.S. Attorney's Office marshaled its vast resources to beef up an investigation into the slayings last month of Channon Christian, 21, and her boyfriend, Christopher Newsom, 23, and make quick work of a roundup of suspects.

The federal indictment allowed authorities to keep suspects Lemaricus "Slim" Davidson, brother Letalvis "Rome" Cobbins and George "Detroit" Thomas behind bars while Knox County District Attorney General Randy Nichols' office took its time preparing what is one of the most detailed indictments to be issued by a grand jury here in years.

That state indictment adds suspect Vanessa Lynn Coleman to the list of accused killers but left off Eric Dewayne "E" Boyd, who has been named as an accessory to carjacking in the federal case.

Jennings said Dedrick is not seeking to drop the federal case against Boyd.

"The state presentment does not charge Mr. Boyd," he said.

Dropping the federal case against the remaining suspects will allow the massive team of investigators from agencies including the Knoxville Police Department, Knox County Sheriff's Office, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives and the U.S. Marshals Service to focus efforts on building what many expect to be a capital murder case in Knox County Criminal Court.

But federal prosecutors aren't willing to abandon the case entirely should the state prosecution somehow go awry, Jennings indicated at Thursday's hearing.

"We will resist any move by the defense to dismiss with prejudice," Jennings said.

That statement came after Davidson's attorney, David Eldridge, said he needed time to mull the dismissal request to see if he might find legal grounds to ask U.S. District Judge Tom Varlan to specifically bar federal prosecutors from resurrecting the carjacking case.

Varlan still must rule on the motion to dismiss. Meanwhile, Guyton set a July 9 trial date for Boyd, who is represented by attorney Richard Gaines. Boyd is accused of helping Davidson hide out after the slayings.

Parolee Executed In Texas For Strangling Of Stepdaughters (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A parolee condemned for killing his two stepdaughters during a strangling spree almost 10 years ago has been executed.

James Jackson thanked his family and expressed love for them Wednesday. "This is not the end but the beginning of a new chapter for you and I together forever," he said.

Jackson told the warden standing over him, "Warden, murder me." He then referred to Harris County, where he was convicted, as Sodom and Gomorrah, the biblical cities destroyed by God for their sins.

"I'm ready to roll. Time to get this party started."

Seven minutes later he was pronounced dead at 6:18 p.m. (0018 GMT)

Jackson, 47, was the fourth convicted killer executed this year in Texas, the nation's busiest capital punishment state.

Jackson, known to fellow death row inmates as "Big Jack" for his height, insisted he was not responsible for the slayings of Sonceria "Sonnie" Mayes, 19, and her sister Ericka, 18, at the apartment they shared with Jackson and his wife, Sharon, 39. Sharon Jackson, the girls' mother, also was murdered.

The U.S. Supreme Court last month turned down Jackson's request to review his case. Jackson's lawyer, Kenneth Williams, said legal efforts to block the execution had been exhausted.

A friend of Sharon Jackson became concerned April 9, 1997, when the normally conscientious woman failed to pick her up for a drive to church. She called the woman's sister, who went to the apartment and found the three bodies.

Jackson was on parole after serving about half of a 10-year sentence for using a shotgun to wound the elderly father of a former girlfriend in Dallas. He was arrested the next morning when he returned to the apartment.

Police found a handwritten note, signed by Jackson, in which he lamented how he had no job and could not care for his wife and stepdaughters.

"I gave them back to God," the note said. "He and they will understand."

Jackson, however, insisted it was a prayer left weeks earlier in a Bible study folder.

"Everybody I talk to that's a Christian, they understand," Jackson said from death row. "You're giving back to God. They just took it out of context."

Prosecutors said the note confirmed a confession Jackson gave to police in which he acknowledged strangling the three.

Jackson was the first of three Texas inmates set to die this month. Newton Anderson, 30, is scheduled to follow Jackson to the death chamber Feb. 22 for the 1999 slayings of a Tyler couple during a burglary of their home.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Government Faces Massive Suit Over New Orleans Canal Breach (FINDLAW/AP)

By Cain Burdeau, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130016

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-The federal government and Army Corps of Engineers are targeted in a new lawsuit that alleges flooding during Hurricane Katrina was the fault of a decision to allow dredging of a main canal, weakening the soil base that supported its levees.

The suit, which seeks class-action status and unspecified damages, was filed Thursday in U.S. District Court representing seven residents of the Lakeview neighborhood, which was hard hit by flooding when a levee on the east side of the 17th Street Canal broke.

If class-action status is granted, tens of thousands of New Orleans residents and claims in the tens of billions of dollars could be affected.

The suit's basic argument was bolstered by a decision last week. In that ruling, U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval allowed a suit to go forward charging the corps with liability for the flooding of eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet. The ship channel, maintained by the corps, connects New Orleans' inner harbor with the Gulf of Mexico.

The corps declined to comment on the suit.

The issue in Thursday's suit is whether the 17th Street Canal should be considered a navigable waterway or a flood control project. The canal is one of three arteries that drain water out of the below sea-level city during heavy rainfall. Levees on two of the canals broke during Katrina and caused massive flooding.

If the court determines the 17th Street Canal was a flood control project, then the 1928 Flood Control Act would shield the corps from liability. However if a judge decides it is a navigable waterway, then the corps, and by extension the federal government, may have to defend their actions at trial.

Though primarily a drainage waterway, fishing boats and other small vessels tied up along the canal near its mouth for years before Katrina.

The plaintiffs argue the corps knew about weak soil under that area, and that maps dating as far back as the mid-1800s and subsequent academic studies showed the ground under the canal walls was made up of sand and other unstable soil.

Oliver Houck, an environmental law scholar at Tulane University, said the case may force Congress to consider broad compensation for Katrina victims.

"Congress may be compelled to find a more generic solution than trying to settle thousands and thousands of individual claims," Houck said.

U.S. Court Cuts Tobacco Verdict By More Than Half, Lawyer For Smokers Still Happy (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-A Louisiana appeals court cut a $591 million (â,¬455 million) verdict against tobacco companies by more than half and limited the kinds of smoking-cessation programs the money can be used for.

Even so, a plaintiffs' attorney called Wednesday's ruling a victory that reaffirmed the original verdict, while a tobacco company said it would appeal to have the entire verdict thrown out.

In another tobacco case, also ruled on Wednesday, a judge in Boston refused to dismiss a lawsuit that claims a tobacco company targeted black children.

The Louisiana ruling by the 4th Circuit Court of Appeal in New Orleans was the first major development since jurors found in 2004 that tobacco firms had conspired for more than 50 years to distort public knowledge about the effects of smoking.

"Even though the court has reduced the award, we are gratified that the court again - for the seventh time - has said this is a legitimate class action and that the jury and judge were correct in finding the tobacco companies were guilty of intentional fault and fraud," attorney Russ Herman said.

In addition to cutting the damages, the court ruled that the plaintiffs cannot collect pretrial interest, which totaled about $400 million (â,¬308 million), said David Howard, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. "The effect basically reduced the award from approximately $1 billion (â,¬770 million) to less than $300 million (â,¬231 million)," he said.

Howard said tobacco companies will ask the Louisiana Supreme Court to overturn the entire verdict against them.

The ruling cut the amount of money for stop-smoking programs to $279 million (â,¬215 million). It also limited the kinds of programs it can pay for to traditional stop-smoking aids and limited the class to people who smoked before Louisiana's products liability law was passed in 1988. The class originally was defined as anyone who started smoking before the lawsuit was filed in 1996.

Howard did not know how many of the original 500,000 plaintiffs that will rule out.

DOJ_NMG_0130017

In the Boston lawsuit, Lorillard Tobacco Co. was sued by Will Evans, the son of Marie Evans, who died in 2002 at age 54 after smoking for about 40 years.

The lawsuit says Marie Evans started receiving free Newport cigarettes in her neighborhood at age 9. At first she traded the cigarettes for candy, then started smoking at 13.

Lawyers for Will Evans allege that the woman was too young to recognize the hazards of smoking and was pulled in by advertising aimed at blacks.

"I would not call it racism, but Lorillard handed out free samples of its cigarettes to a poor minority community in Boston," said Rebecca McIntyre, a lawyer for Will Evans. The cigarette giveaway was a form of "battery" because it tricked Marie Evans into consuming a toxic substance, McIntyre said.

Lawyers for Greensboro, North Carolina-based Lorillard said in court filings the company should not be held liable for any harm to Evans that occurred after 1969, when Congress required cigarettes to carry a warning label. Evans's health problems from cigarettes did not begin until she suffered a heart attack in 1984, according to court documents.

But Superior Court Judge Paul Troy rejected that argument, ruling that the company could still be found negligent for injury to customers despite the warning labels.

No trial date has been scheduled.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

'Till Bill' Expected To Be Filed Today (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, February 9, 2007

U. S. Rep. John Lewis of Georgia and Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut are expected to introduce today in their respective chambers legislation that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down unpunished killers from the civil rights era, said Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City activist pushing for the bill.

The Democrats are picking up where ousted GOP Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri left off. Talent last year introduced the legislation dubbed the “Till Billl” after the 1955 killing of 14-year-old Emmett Till. The African-American Chicago youth visiting relatives in Money was killed after allegedly wolf-whistling at a white woman.

Mississippi’s Republican Sens. Thad Cochran and Trent Lott had signed on as co-sponsors of that bill.

The FBI already is examining 51 killings from those days, and a Montgomery museum lists 127 racial killings between 1954 and 1968, conceding the number could be much higher.

The bill would enable federal authorities to pursue killings from before 1970.

Sykes' determination helped lead to state and federal authorities reopening Till's Aug. 28, 1955, slaying.

In 1955, an all-white jury acquitted Roy Bryant and his half brother, J.W. Milam, of killing Till. They later confessed their involvement to Look magazine.

Both men since have died of cancer.

Editorial: Delayed Four Decades, Justice Is Finally Served (SAEN)

San Antonio Express-News, February 9, 2007

James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner are known to history. Henry Dee and Charles Moore are not.

Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner were murdered during the summer of 1964 while working for civil rights in Mississippi. Their disappearance, the eventual discovery of their bodies and the effort to bring their killers to justice charged the nation.

Dee and Moore were black teenagers, hitchhikers in Mississippi who vanished weeks before the three civil rights workers. During the search for Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner, authorities discovered the bodies of Dee and Moore weighted down in the Mississippi River.

The FBI, overwhelmed with the national significance of the "Freedom Summer" murders, turned the case of the hitchhikers over to local authorities. Two reputed KKK members were arrested, but no charges were ever brought. And, as with many crimes from the civil rights era, justice was never done.

Last month, the Justice Department finally brought kidnapping charges against one of the two original suspects. James Ford Seale is now 71.

In recent years, state and federal prosecutors have obtained convictions in long-dormant cases from the civil rights era. However, some people don't see the point of devoting law enforcement resources to 4-decade-old crimes or of putting old men on trial and behind bars.

Henry Dee and Charles Moore were Americans. The crimes committed against them, though less well-known than others, were also crimes against the nation.

In life, the law of the land in 1964 Mississippi could not guarantee them equal protection. It's a small measure of justice to grant them that protection 43 years after their deaths.

Man Is Convicted Of Forcing Girl, 17, Into Prostitution (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 9, 2007

A Miami man faces possible life in prison after a federal jury convicted him Wednesday of human trafficking for forcing a 17-year-old girl into prostitution, federal prosecutors said.

Demond Levail Osley, 30, who used the street name D-Lo, met the girl in Detroit and brought her to South Florida, authorities said. He held her in a Miami Beach hotel and ordered her to earn for him at least $500 per day before selling her to a second man.

Undercover officers arrested the girl Nov. 8, 2006 in Miami Beach. The police department called federal authorities when they discovered she was a minor. The girl, who testified at Osley's trial, was not charged.

A Miami grand jury charged Osley under a 2000 law that sets stiff penalties for sexual trafficking of minors. He is to be sentenced April 18.

Family Of Police Shooting Victim Protests Prosecutor's Actions (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 8 — A plan by the district attorney to seek murder charges against three narcotics officers involved in the shooting death of an elderly woman during a bungled drug raid may jeopardize a broad, federal investigation into civil rights violations by the Atlanta Police Department, a spokesman for the victim's family said Thursday.

Paul Howard, the district attorney for Fulton County, sent a proposed indictment against the officers, Gregg Junnier, Jason R. Smith and Arthur Tesler to their lawyers on Wednesday. A spokeswoman for Mr. Howard's office said he had informed federal authorities of his intentions.

Mr. Howard's action "stunned and disappointed" family members of the victim, Kathryn Johnston, said the Rev. Markel Hutchins, a spokesman for the family.

Ms. Johnston, whose age has been given as 88 or 92, was shot after she fired a handgun at the narcotics officers, who pried open burglary bars on her home and broke down her door on Nov. 21. The officers have been accused of lying to obtain the search warrant for the home.

Before copies of the proposed indictment were released, Sarah C. Dozier, Ms. Johnston's niece, sent a letter to Mr. Howard asking him to recuse himself from the case. She cited concerns that a federal civil rights investigation into her aunt's death would extend to his office and create a conflict of interest.

Mr. Hutchins said Mr. Howard had not informed the Johnston family or their lawyers, federal investigators or federal prosecutors about his intention to seek murder charges.

"He is acting outside the spirit of cooperation that has made this investigation as successful as it has been today," Mr. Hutchins said.

"These officers did not commit felony murder," he said. "They committed a violation of civil rights that led to her death."

Mr. Hutchins said both he and Ms. Dozier believed strongly that the civil rights division of the federal Department of Justice should be the prosecuting agency. That way, the legal consequences might apply to the entire Atlanta Police Department, not simply to the three officers.

"From that perspective, it is a very, very bitter hour," Mr. Hutchins said.

Lyn Vaughn, a spokeswoman for Mr. Howard's office, challenged the suggestion that Mr. Howard had failed to notify federal agencies about his plan to pursue murder charges.

Ms. Vaughn said Mr. Howard had sent letters at least four times to David Nahmias, the United States attorney for the Northern District of Georgia, and Gregory Jones, the special agent in charge of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Atlanta. The letters, dated Jan. 22, Jan. 26, Jan. 29 and Feb. 6, included copies of the proposed indictment and suggestions that the case be tried jointly by county and federal prosecutors, Ms. Vaughn said.

She said Mr. Howard told the federal authorities he "strongly disagreed" with the direction of the federal investigation.

Patrick Crosby, a spokesman for Mr. Nahmias, said Wednesday that Mr. Howard had not informed his office about his plans. On Thursday, Mr. Crosby said the Justice Department had no comment.

DOJ_NMG_0130019

Stephen Emmett, a spokesman for the F.B.I., has also said that his office had not been informed of Mr. Howard's plans and that they considered the investigation into Ms. Johnston's death to be ongoing, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported.

William J. McKenney, a lawyer defending Mr. Tesler, said his client was "disheartened and his family was devastated" to learn of the proposed charges.

"The indictment is overreaching," Mr. McKenney said. "The actual facts do not support these charges."

He said: "Paul Howard is a good man. I read into this that he apparently feels very strongly that his crime happened on his watch and he feels morally obligated to pursue the prosecution."

Mr. McKenney agreed with arguments that Mr. Howard's action would hinder the federal civil rights investigation.

"The dialogue between the justice department and my office is effectively severed," Mr. McKenney said. "I cannot, in good conscience, help investigators bring federal civil rights charges against my client."

In addition to felony murder, the proposed indictment accuses the three men of aggravated assault, false imprisonment, burglary, making false statements and violation of oath.

A grand jury is scheduled to weigh evidence against the officers on Feb. 26.

Making Democracy Credible (NYT)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

Time is growing short to head off more embarrassing voting machine scandals. The presidential election looms, yet nearly half of the states offer no reassuring paper trail so voters who use electronic voting machines can check that their ballot choices are accurately recorded.

With a proper sense of urgency, Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, who leads the Senate committee in charge of elections, is asking all of the right questions about voting technology. This week, she ordered an investigation of the case of as many as 18,000 electronic votes that turned up missing in a tight Congressional race in Florida last November.

Senator Feinstein called on the Government Accountability Office and the National Institute of Standards and Technology to conduct "top to bottom" federal investigations of the machines used in Sarasota County, where the 18,000 votes may have disappeared. Florida is now moving to toss out electronic voting machines that do not produce a paper trail. But this is no comfort to Christine Jennings, the Democrat in the 13th Congressional District race, which includes Sarasota County. She lost by 369 votes and is now in court trying to find out what went wrong in the election.

Ms. Jennings is right to be skeptical about the election results. In Sarasota County, her strongest county, there were "undervotes" — ballots that did not record a vote in her race — on 14.9 percent of the ballots, five times the undervoting rate on absentee ballots in the same election. With no paper backup, the true touch-screen history is lost in the ether. So far, Florida courts have denied Ms. Jennings's request to have experts examine the "black box" heart of the matter: the computer software code embedded in the suspect machines.

It is good news that Ms. Feinstein has called for the federal investigations — and that she is pushing a bill to require paper trails nationally. As long as there are no paper records, and voting machine manufacturers continue to insist that the software that runs the machines is a "trade secret," voters cannot be expected to trust that votes are being counted correctly. The leadership in Congress needs to focus on making sure that Ms. Feinstein's paper-trail bill becomes law, along with a companion House measure from Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey.

ANTITRUST:

Home Shoppers Do Their Hunting Online (USAT)

By Noelle Knox, Usa Today

USA Today, February 9, 2007

If there's any lingering doubt about how the Internet is transforming the way people buy and sell homes, here's eye-widening proof: Marnie Azadian and her husband just moved from Scottsdale, Ariz., into a $410,000 home in Tulsa that they bought 100% over the Internet.

They never visited Tulsa, where Marnie had accepted a job. They never opened the front door, or a kitchen drawer. Never drove around the neighborhood.

"I did have some moments of 'Oh my gosh, what did we just do?' " says Azadian, 57, but no regrets about the house they'd fallen in love with from a virtual tour. (Though her commute is a bit more of "a pain" than it looked like on mapquest.com.)

Risky? Maybe so. But this is just a glimpse of how rapidly and radically the Internet and other techno-gadgets are reshaping real estate sales. Already, 80% of buyers used the Internet to help find a home, according to the National Association of Realtors. Day by day, new real estate tools are surfacing on the Web.

Technology is shifting knowledge and power to buyers and sellers. In doing so, it's loosening Realtors' long-standing control of vital information and cutting into their sales commissions. For more than 100 years, Realtors have guarded the details of homes for sale via their multiple listing services. At least 900 regional MLS systems exist nationwide. Unless the MLS systems become more open, unified and technologically sophisticated, they risk being replaced by a Web search engine.

"The Internet is a significant threat to Realtors, who in previous decades have had iron-grip control over all necessary information for those seeking to buy or sell a home," says Stuart G,abriel of the University of Southern California's Lusk Center for Real Estate.

Compared with the patchwork of MLS systems, each with its own board of directors, "The Internet search engines may be very competitive and very efficient."

Signs of upheaval in the industry were evident by late 2005, when the Justice Department filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors. Justice wants the Realtors to stop letting brokers withhold for-sale listings from low-cost Internet rivals.

The Realtors' policy is on hold. But Brian McDonald, a deputy assistant attorney general for the antitrust division, says the policy's restrictions still exert "a chilling effect in the market" because some companies won't risk introducing new Internet business strategies if they could be undercut in the future.

But even as the two sides file motions, delaying the trial, the Internet is leveling the playing field and prodding the industry to adapt faster than you can say, "Your honor, we'd like a recess to consider new developments."

In just the past few months:

·Zillow.com, which created a stir last year by posting its estimated values of millions of homes across the country, has started showing homes for sale. In the past two months, nearly 32,000 people have listed their homes for sale.

An additional 16,000 have put "Make Me Move" prices on their homes. That feature lets homeowners who aren't really looking to sell put a kind of dream price tag on their home, just in case someone wants to make a sweet offer. Zillow says the Make Me Move prices tend to be about 17% higher than its "zestimates," which means owners are taking the option seriously.

·Trulia.com is asking real estate agents to post homes for sale and has introduced "heat maps," showing the price and popularity of sales by state, county and neighborhood.

·Google.com is trolling for real estate agent listings for its classified-ads system, known as Google Base. The Houston Association of Realtors, for example, announced in December it would put all of its listings on Google.

·By the end of the month, apartment hunters will be able to use some cellphones with GPS technology to find places to rent. From the national database of apartments.com, customers can see a list of the 70 closest apartments from where they are standing. On cellphone screens, they'll be able to see apartment details, floor plans, area maps and call the manager to see the property. (Gannett, which owns USA TODAY, also owns a stake in the parent company of apartments.com.)

This summer, the inventor of the technology, SmarterAgent.com, says it'll launch a similar service for houses on the market.

·Forget grainy aerial photos of homes. Microsoft's Live Local lets people use their Xbox 360 or other video-game controller to take 3D street tours of 15 cities. The company is busy adding more locations.

"It used to be, five or seven years ago, that our job was about helping clients find the right home," says Pat Lashinsky of ZipRealty, a discount brokerage. Now, "The clients are very involved in finding their own homes; there are so many tools and ways they can do it."

The role of the agent, which for years was mainly to bring together buyers and sellers, increasingly is "to help clients with all of the paperwork," Lashinsky says. Nearly one out of four buyers last year found the home they wanted on the Internet, up from 2% a decade ago, according to the NAR.

There's no hard data on how many people are quite as bold as the Azadians, willing to buy a home with only a high-tech tour from afar. But there's anecdotal evidence that more buyers are willing to make a leap of faith in cyberspace.

Virtual tours

J.R. Crawford, an agent on Vashon Island, Wash., said she had three buyers last year who made offers after taking virtual tours. Though each bid was contingent on a walk-through of the home, Crawford recalls that one buyer from Texas opened the door and said, "I know where I'm going; you don't have to walk me through the house."

That said, buyers should beware: The quality of the information and the tools on websites can vary dramatically. A USA TODAY test of 10 popular sites found very different results for available homes, prices and lenders. (Chart, above.)

DOJ_NMG_0130021

For now, the vast majority of home buyers still use real estate agents, in some way, during the sales process. The Azadians said the good telephone rapport they developed with the seller's agents in Tulsa gave them the confidence they needed to put their trust in technology. They sent all their documents via express mail.

But fewer buyers think they need agents to supply vital information. Last year, 69% of buyers said their agent was a "very useful" source of information, down from 72% the year before, according to the Realtors association.

Sellers, likewise, are doing more work themselves, from scheduling appraisals to holding open houses. As homeowners bear more of the labor, and agents less, many sellers don't want to pay as much for an agent's services. Rather than pay a traditional 6% commission, more sellers are saving money by using agents who provide a la carte services — such as advertising homes on the Realtors' multiple listing service and filling out contracts.

These limited-service brokers are especially popular in high-cost areas, like the Washington, D.C., Northern Virginia and Maryland region, where the typical 6% commission on the average-priced home of about $400,000 could cost the seller $24,000.

Which is why four of the top-10-producing real estate agent teams in that area offer a la carte services, says David Charron, president of the MRIS, the multiple listing service for the Washington area, the largest in the country.

"That shows the business is evolving," Charron says.

Federal regulators, however, say the industry hasn't changed enough. The Federal Trade Commission has made the Realtors' multiple listing services in seven metro areas drop policies that hampered limited-service brokers. The FTC is suing one MLS operator in Michigan for rebuffing listings from limited-service brokers.

"There are more (actions) in the pipeline," says Maureen Ohlhausen, director of the FTC's office for policy planning.

The Justice Department, meantime, is moving forward with its antitrust case against the NAR. The Realtors are fighting back. They argue that the broker should control the information about the seller's home and decide how to share that information and with whom.

Competitive pressures, though, are shrinking the number of brokers who can afford to guard their listings from Internet rivals or a la carte agents. Just ask Re/Max International. It was among the firms singled out in the Justice Department's lawsuit as sounding anti-competitive by expressing fear of the threat from Internet-based brokers. Now, Re/Max displays all available homes for sale on its website — even homes from low-cost Internet companies.

"The consumer is the one we really need to think of, and the exposure for their listing," says Kristi Graning, senior vice president of technology for Re/Max. "We encourage listings to be exposed on as many websites as possible. … The data is already out there. Give consumers the data, and in exchange the consumer will give us trust and believe in our services."

Kerry Joins Fans Upset By The Plan For Extra Innings (NYT)

By Richard Sandomir

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

The pending deal to shift Major League Baseball's Extra Innings package exclusively to DirecTV starting in April is still not ready to be announced, but Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, would like to undo it.

In that desire, he is no different from the many fans enraged that Extra Innings — a 10-channel service that transmits out-of-market games for $179 a year — will disappear from cable TV homes altogether, and will be available only to DirecTV subscribers or, under baseball's banner, on mlb.com.

"Here's what bothers me," Kerry said yesterday in a telephone interview. "You get M.L.B. and DirecTV marshaling their forces to go out and make money while cutting out fans. In my judgment, more fans watching games strengthens baseball."

He added, "There's a whole movement toward fans being screwed by consolidation which raises prices and reduces options."

DirecTV has agreed to pay $700 million over seven years to carry Extra Innings and a new baseball channel (which will begin in 2009).

Kerry isn't sure the deal can be scotched, but last week he wrote to Kevin Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, asking him to investigate it.

"The F.C.C. doesn't have the right to say, 'You can't do this,' but they have levers that affect this business," said Kerry, who sits on the Senate Commerce Committee, which oversees communications.

Kerry's demand to alter the deal aligns with the desire of Dan Asnis, a Mets fan from South Brunswick, N.J., who started an online petition to keep Extra Innings on cable.

"I felt frustrated that this was happening, and that fans like me had no say in it," he said in a telephone interview. Asnis bought Extra Innings last season to watch teams whose games affected the Mets. He said he would not switch to DirecTV, but would buy mlb.tv, which streams games on mlb.com.

DOJ_NMG_0130022

Asnis's plea on the Internet — petitiononline.com/MLBCABLE/petition.html — had gathered 848 signatures by late yesterday afternoon.

"We just feel helpless," he said.

If Asnis feels helpless, Senator Arlen Specter does not. Last year, when he was still the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, fulminated about the antitrust implications of some of the National Football League's TV practices, such as its exclusive deals since 1994 to sell its Sunday Ticket package of out-of-market games to DirecTV.

Now, Specter said by telephone: "Since I found out about the baseball deal, I've asked my antitrust people to do research to confirm my preliminary judgment that it's an antitrust violation. But I don't think I'll be able to stop it."

Baseball has a longstanding, Supreme Court-blessed exemption from antitrust laws, except for its labor dealings, which were removed in 1998.

"You can't charge baseball with an antitrust violation," Specter said, but Congress could continue the exemption on the condition that baseball avoids exclusive deals like the one it will soon announce with DirecTV.

Still, even that exemption, which some say is not fully defined in its scope, may not protect baseball from a serious antitrust challenge to the DirecTV deal. Gabe Feldman, an associate professor at Tulane Law School, said, "A few courts have said the exemption does not apply when baseball makes agreements with third parties."

Unlike baseball, the N.F.L. lacks a broad, if ambiguous, exemption. But it has had a narrow one (as other leagues do) to collectively sell its teams' broadcast rights as permitted by the Sports Broadcasting Act of 1961, an exemption that Specter would like to get rid of. He joked that he was selling rights to his regular squash games to DirecTV.

In 1997, a group of DirecTV subscribers filed a class-action suit against the N.F.L. in Federal District Court in Philadelphia saying that the Sunday Ticket package violated antitrust laws partly because it was sold exclusively. The plaintiffs settled for an undisclosed sum before a definitive judgment. But the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit upheld the lower court's ruling that the 1961 law applied to broadcast deals, not those made with a satellite service.

Disgruntled former cable (or Dish Network) subscribers of Extra Innings may take a similar route to court. But their success is far from guaranteed.

In its defense, baseball may argue that it has not restricted the output of games by selling Extra Innings to DirecTV because the games will also be on mlb.tv (and, besides, there is so much local and national baseball on TV).

"Baseball might say there is a process under way that is merging Internet streaming with TV, and anyone who wants the package can go to mlb.com," said Andrew Zimbalist, an economics professor at Smith College.

But baseball may open itself to a counterargument that because it controls mlb.com, it is offering an option to its DirecTV deal — a type of eyebrow-arching vertical integration — that is not purely competitive, with a price that it sets on its own.

Meanwhile, we wait for baseball to speak.

Regulators In China At Odds Over Carlyle (FT)

By Sundeep Tucker In Hong Kong And Geoff Dyer In Shanghai

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

The attempt by Carlyle to take a big stake in a Chinese construction equipment maker was the subject of "fighting" among regulators in Beijing over whether to approve the deal, according to people familiar with the situation.

The US private equity group agreed in October 2005 to pay $375m for an 85 per cent stake in Xugong Construction Machinery, a listed company whose parent is controlled by the local government of Xuzhou city, after a public auction.

However, the deal got caught up in the backlash over foreign investment, and although Carlyle cut its planned investment to a 50 per cent stake, the deal still awaits regulatory approval.

To break the impasse over Carlyle's investment in Xugong, several government departments held an unprecedented three-day meeting last summer in Beijing to try to agree on a policy for foreign investment in the construction machinery sector.

Last November, the influential State-owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission decided Carlyle could take a 50 per cent stake. Many analysts expected the revised deal to be rubber-stamped quickly by the Ministry of Commerce and State Council.

However, people close to the situation said some officials at the ministry were lobbying for Carlyle to be forced to take a minority stake, deeming the sector to be of "strategic" importance.

"There is a big fight going on at the Ministry of Commerce about this," said one. "One camp is keen to endorse the 50-50 structure. Others want further revisions. The debate could go on for weeks." Carlyle declined to comment.

However, in a sign the government does not consider the sector off-limits, Volvo said last month it had completed the purchase of 70 per cent of Lingong Construction Machinery after getting the go-ahead from all the regulators, including the Shandong province branch of the ministry.

Lawyers say the National Development and Reform Commission, the main planning body, is drawing up a document to clarify which business and technology segments it considers to be core industries in which foreign companies cannot invest.

The initiative will be an attempt to co-ordinate attitudes to foreign investment.

Jobs's Music Proposal Rebuffed (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

The recording industry is beginning to respond to a proposal made this week by Apple chief executive Steve Jobs calling for an open music system that would allow songs to be played on any device.

The answer, so far, is no.

Edgar Bronfman Jr., chief executive of the Warner Music Group, said in a conference call with analysts yesterday that Jobs's stance is "completely without logic or merit."

"We advocate the continued . . . protection of our and our artists' intellectual property," Bronfman said.

Jobs's letter, which was posted on Apple's Web site Tuesday, has sparked a broad conversation about the business of digital music and renewed interest in the measures that have so far limited consumers' options. Today, music purchased on Apple's iTunes store, for example, can be played only on iPod players, while music purchased elsewhere on the Internet is not playable on the iPod, the dominant digital music player on the market.

Jobs argues that without digital rights management, or DRM, software that employs these controls, consumers would be able to buy tracks from any online music store and play them on any digital music device, just as DVDs purchased or rented from any store can be read by any DVD player, regardless of the manufacturer.

"This is clearly the best alternative for consumers," he wrote.

Bronfman attacked the assertion that anti-piracy technology was the reason that iTunes music will not play on anything but an iPod. "The issue is obscured by asserting that DRM and interoperability is the same thing. They are not. To suggest that they cannot co-exist is simply incorrect."

Jobs also suggested that Apple might consider licensing its technology to competitors to help loosen the ties between online music stores and digital players, an idea that the Recording Industry Association of America prefers over the elimination of the protection software.

"We don't think that a wholesale abandonment of DRM is necessary," said Mitch Bainwol, chairman and chief executive of the RIAA. "I think you'll see some experimentation, but that's a lot different from a policy saying 'forget it.' "

Phil Leigh, senior analyst and president of Inside Digital Media, said he believed the two sides needed to come together to compromise on the use of software intended to curb music piracy. Jobs asserted in his letter that the software had not been effective at stopping piracy, which continues on Internet file-sharing sites.

Leigh suggested that music publishers test the waters by stripping tracks that appeal to older audiences, as they are less likely to use file-sharing sites to trade music illegally.

"There's a number of ways to negotiate this transition," he said. "You don't have to flip the switch all at once."

Apple did not return calls seeking comment.

Digital Music Rights Furore Deepens (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Edgar Bronfman, Warner Music's chief executive, on Thursday slapped down Steve Jobs's suggestion that record companies do away with copyright protections for digital music in order to spur the market's growth.

Mr Bronfman, speaking to investors as Warner announced its earnings, called Mr Jobs's argument "completely without logic or merit" and said his company was committed to the continued use of copyright protections, known as digital rights management, in the same way that software makers and film studios safeguard their intellectual property.

Mr Bronfman is the first head of one of the major record companies to publicly reject the Apple chief executive's suggestion, which was published as an open letter on Tuesday. Several, however, have privately fumed about the idea, calling it disingenuous.

The goal of making it easier to play music on different devices, they said, could be easily achieved if Apple would licence its own DRM software, known as FairPlay, to competitors – something that European regulators are pressing it to do.

As the dispute dragged on, Warner's earnings reflected the shaky state of a music industry struggling to offset a continued erosion in the CD business with new digital sales. For the quarter, Warner's revenue fell 11 per cent from $1.04bn to $928m while its net income slid 74 per cent to $18. At midday, its shares had dropped more than 5 per cent to $20.31.

While digital revenues increased 45 per cent to $100m from the same quarter a year ago, they dipped $4m from the previous quarter, underscoring some analysts' concerns that the furious growth in digital music sales was beginning to moderate.

Mr Bronfman acknowledged that it had been "a difficult quarter." Yet he laid most of the blame on the company's release schedule, which included big acts such as Madonna and Greenday during the same period last year.

Michael Fleisher, Warner's chief financial officer, said the changes in the digital business reflected its maturation. "As digital becomes a more meaningful part of our total revenue, it's going to fluctuate," he said.

Warner's performance could play into its bargaining position with Apple as it and other record companies prepare to renegotiate contracts with iTunes that expire in a few months.

The record companies are frustrated that Apple reaps most of the benefits of online music through sales of its iPod while the music they supply is often pirated or discounted. Yet they have been forced so far to accept Mr Jobs' conditions because Apple dominates the online market at a time when they are desperate to demonstrate progress in their digital businesses.

Mr Bronfman expressed hope that the two sides could cooperate, but added: "Frankly, manifestos in advance of those discussions are counter-productive."

EU Says France's Schneider Electric Can Buy U.S. Rival APC, Must Divest Unit

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU regulators said Thursday that French electric equipment maker Schneider Electric SA could buy American Power Conversion Corp. if it sells off its uninterruptible power supply unit.

Schneider offered to sell off its MGE UPS Systems SA subsidiary after the European Commission found that the Schneider-APC deal would "significantly reduce competition" in the market for small power supply devices used to protect personal computers and other electronic equipment against power surges.

The French company had originally planned to combine the two units, saying this would generate annual cost savings of $220 million (173 million euros).

But the EU executive said APC and MGE are the No. 1 and No. 2 suppliers in Europe and their nearest rival has a very limited market share.

"The Commission considered that the proposed transaction as initially notified was likely to weaken competition," it said. "The Commission's clearance is conditional upon the divestiture of Schneider Electric's business related to small UPS devices."

The sell-off would clear up any antitrust problem with the deal, it said.

Schneider will pay $6.1 billion (4.8 billion euros) in cash for APC and said it was confident it could help the U.S. maker of backup power equipment recover from falling profit that led to job cuts.

Schneider said APC's profitability had "dramatically deteriorated" on a series of bad investments in larger power systems. The French company, which is already outsourcing some of its own production to lower-wage countries, said it was "confident" it could turn APC around.

With 7,600 employees, APC generated $1.98 billion revenues (1.56 billion euros) in sales in 2005. Small power systems, such as uninterruptible power supplies and surge protectors, account for about three-quarters of its business.

Is It Time For A New Tax On Energy? (WSJ)

By Phil Izzo

Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Economists Say Government Should Foster Alternatives – But Not How Bush Proposes

The government should encourage development of alternatives to fossil fuels, economists said in a WSJ.com survey. But most say the best way to do that isn't in President Bush's energy proposals: a new tax on fossil fuels.

Forty of 47 economists who answered the question said the government should help champion alternative fuels. Economists generally are in favor of free-market solutions, but there are times when you need to intervene," said David Wyss at Standard & Poor's Corp. "We're already in the danger zone" because of the outlook for oil supplies and concerns about climate change, he said.

A majority of the economists said a tax on fossil fuels would be the most economically sound way to encourage alternatives. A tax would raise the price of fossil fuels and make alternatives, which today often are more costly to produce, more competitive in the consumer market. "A tax puts pressure on the market, rather than forcing an artificial solution on it," said Mr. Wyss.

President Bush has made a strong push on energy initiatives over the past month but he has steered clear of proposals that would raise taxes. In his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush set targets that call for a 20% reduction in gasoline use over the next 10 years. He proposed regulations6 to tighten gas-mileage standards and force fuel suppliers to use more alternative fuels. In addition, his budget proposal7 presented to Congress this week provides substantial funding for biofuel, clean coal and renewable energy programs.

In the survey, which was conducted Feb. 2-7, just two economists recommended regulations that require energy companies use more alternatives, one of the keys of the Bush plan, while six advised subsidies for producers of alternative fuels. "With subsidies, the government chooses the market solution," said Diane Swonk at Mesirow Financial. "I'd favor taxes in this area."

Other economists in the survey, though, said the smartest course for the government is to let market forces determine the future of alternative energies. "The more we mess with things the more problems we create," said Brian S. Wesbury of First Trust Advisors. "Government interference in the marketplace can do damage to long-term development of alternate energies."

Biggest Economic Risks

Although crude-oil prices have eased from levels hit last year, the economists said dependence on fossil fuels remains a threat. When asked to pick the greater geopolitical threat to the economy, by almost an 3-to-1 margin the economists chose a disruption in crude oil supplies caused by tensions in the Mideast over the impact on spending and confidence that could follow a major terrorist attack. "The economy has already proven it can survive terror attacks. It had a harder time with almost $80 per barrel oil," said Ms. Swonk.

The economists generally expect oil to remain below $60 a barrel for the remainder of this year. The average forecast puts crude oil futures at $57.98 a barrel in June and $58.72 in December. That roughly matches the price at which crude futures have traded in New York this week, but is well below the nominal highs set last year at around $77 a barrel.

"Demand for energy is going to grow, and energy likely to come from existing sources isn't going to grow fast enough," said Daniel Laufenberg at Amerprise Financial. "It's not a crisis today, but higher prices are telling us now is the time the start preparing."

Sarbanes-Oxley Fallout

The survey also gauged economists' sentiment on concerns expressed by business leaders that Sarbanes-Oxley rules, other regulatory enforcement and litigation are hurting the competitiveness9 of U.S. financial markets. Twelve of 51 economists who responded to the question said they feel these forces are hurting market competitiveness "a lot and are a serious threat to the economy." Thirty-six of the economists said markets are being hurt some but not enough to be a major economic worry.

Regarding Sarbanes Oxley specifically, a majority – 26 of 50 economists – said they believe the rules have had a "more negative than positive" impact on the economy. Four others said the impact has been entirely negative. In contrast, 19 economists deemed the impact "more positive than negative" and one said it has been an entirely positive influence on the economy.

Among other findings in the survey:

· Economists, on average, increased their forecast for first-quarter gross domestic product growth by three-tenths of a percentage point to 2.5% following the release10 of the government's first estimate of fourth-quarter growth last week. That report put growth for the period at a 3.5% rate. GDP is the broadest measure of economic output. Expectations of modest improvement in growth for the rest of the year were changed little. For the fourth quarter of 2007, the economists forecast growth at a 3% rate.

· The economists are skeptical that the federal budget will be balanced by 2012, a goal that is shared11 by President Bush and Democratic leaders. The economists put the probability of attaining that goal at 32%.

· There is a split on where the Federal Reserve's federal-funds rate is headed this year. Some 69% of respondents expect the next move to be a decrease, while 31% see a rate increase on the horizon. However, most don't see any move until some time in the summer.

· Sentiment improved a bit on the outlook for home prices. On average, economists expect a closely watched index calculated by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight will show that prices rose 3.52% last year, up from an earlier forecast of 2.76%. Ofheo's report on 2006 prices is expected to be released early next month. For 2007, the economists see a price decline of 0.18% compared to an earlier forecast of a 0.49% decline. However, when one outlier, who forecast a 20% drop, is removed, the economists expect a modest gain in home prices this year.

As California Goes . . . (WP)

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

TWO YEARS AGO, Maryland lawmakers narrowly rejected a bill intended to make automobile emissions safer to breathe and to mitigate their contribution to global warming. They acceded to auto industry lobbyists who argued that the legislation would hurt their business while doing little for public health or the environment. Those arguments were wrong then, and they're wrong now, as Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has recognized in throwing his support behind a fresh attempt in Annapolis to enact a "clean car" bill.

The measure would add Maryland to the growing list of states that have embraced a clean-car program modeled on the one implemented by California more than 15 years ago. Together, the populations of "clean car states" now account for about 30 percent of the nation's market for new vehicles. California's clean-car requirements, which Maryland would adopt, are somewhat tougher than federal rules on smog- and cancer-causing pollutants. But the shift would not be huge because nearly all new vehicles sold in Maryland are already in compliance. More significant is that the program would also require that some 40 percent of the new cars and trucks sold annually be hybrids, cleaner-burning conventional cars or other vehicles using advanced technology to cut harmful emissions.

The most important provision of the rules would limit emissions of carbon dioxide, a principal culprit in global climate change. Under the legislation, which would be phased in over five years starting with the 2011 model year, average CO2emissions would have to decline for the entire fleet of new vehicles sold annually in Maryland. Each manufacturer would be required to achieve the average reduction or face a fine.

Automakers and dealers say the effect of that provision would be to limit the ability of Maryland consumers to buy whatever (higher-polluting) vehicle they please, especially larger pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles; those models would probably become scarce. The auto industry also complains that the new standards, particularly on CO2, would raise the sticker price of most cars, prompting some buyers to make their purchases out of state. But the fact that a relatively small number of buyers would have their options limited is outweighed by the urgency of tackling climate change.

Automakers and dealers, seeing the political mood shift against them, are asking for more study before Maryland moves ahead with the legislation. In fact, there have been plenty of studies, and the results, and benefits, are well known. The potential consequences of global warming for a coastal state such as Maryland are clear; so, too, are the arguments for the clean-car measure.

New York Moves Toward Suit Over A 50-Year-Old Oil Spill (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

New York Times, February 9, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 8 — New York State moved to sue Exxon Mobil and four other companies on Thursday to force them to clean up a half-century-old spill of millions of gallons of oil lying under the Greenpoint neighborhood in Brooklyn and to repair environmental damage inflicted on nearby Newtown Creek.

The spill, originally several times the size of the Exxon Valdez oil leak, resulted from an accident in the 1950s and lay undiscovered until 1978. In notices of intent to sue that were sent to the five companies, Andrew M. Cuomo, the state attorney general, said that so much oil had leaked into the creek that some samples of its sediment, when dried and weighed, were nearly one-tenth oil.

The notices also disclosed that an internal study by one of the companies found nearly 100 different pollutants in the creek water or sediment, including benzene, arsenic and lead.

The other companies receiving the notices were BP, Chevron, KeySpan and Phelps Dodge.

The state's action is a sharp turning point in its handling of the spill, which in recent years has occasioned lawsuits by Greenpoint residents, local elected officials and environmental groups. A 1990 agreement between Exxon Mobil and state environmental officials had required the company to recover the spilled oil, but it specified no deadline and required no remediation of either the creek or the polluted soil under Greenpoint.

About eight million gallons of oil and petroleum byproducts are believed to remain underground, and past soil tests have revealed that the spill releases toxic vapors into the neighborhood above. Mr. Cuomo's action will seek a far faster pace for recovering the oil, extensive scientific testing to determine damage to the soil and groundwater, and millions of dollars in fines. Cleanup costs could increase the companies' expense by tens of millions of dollars, Mr. Cuomo's aides said.

"This is one of the worst environmental disasters in the nation, larger than the Exxon Valdez and slower in the cleanup," Mr. Cuomo said in a statement. "Exxon Mobil must and will be held accountable. The toxic footprint of Exxon Mobil is found all over this area. It is Exxon Mobil's oil that remains under the homes and businesses. And it is Exxon Mobil that has dragged its feet and done as little as possible to address the dangers that it created."

According to the notices, Exxon Mobil's current mechanisms for recovering the spilled oil have, as a side effect, discharged yet more pollutants into the creek, a process that the company has been aware of for years, the notices say. A spokesman for Mr. Cuomo said on Thursday that Exxon Mobil had also been reselling some of the recovered oil, even as it allowed the creek to become more polluted.

Barry Wood, a spokesman for Exxon Mobil, said the company had not received the notices. In a statement, he said the company had already helped recover more than 9.3 million gallons of the petroleum products.

"While the cost of remediation at the site is confidential, Exxon Mobil is committed to remediation of the site, and we have been aggressive in our efforts and have made significant progress," Mr. Wood said.

He added that the company remained committed to its 1990 agreement with the state's Department of Environmental Conservation.

"We take our environmental responsibilities very seriously and have committed substantial resources toward cleaning up the site," he said. "Complex remediation projects such as this, where the product to be recovered is under ground and not easily accessible, takes time to complete."

Phelps Dodge operated a copper smelting plant on the creek's north bank, in Queens, where studies have found heavy metals and other pollutants. Companies later acquired by KeySpan owned gas processing facilities along the waterway that contaminated the creek's sediments with some of the same pollutants and other toxic chemicals, according to the notices.

Companies later acquired by Chevron and BP operated storage or refinery facilities along the creek that leaked oil into the ground, according to the notices.

Together, the notices significantly widen the scope of state legal action concerning the creek, a dirty, 3.5-mile-long estuary that marks Brooklyn's northern border and flows into the East River. Local politicians said yesterday that they believed Mr. Cuomo's actions would pave the way for a long-overdue cleanup of the creek and its transformation into a recreational waterway.

"The Brooklyn-Queens waterfront has the potential to be New York's Gold Coast, with sparkling towers, schools, parks and libraries," said Eric Gioia, a City Council member whose Queens district abuts the creek. "Cleaning Newtown Creek is critical to that vision."

Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who took over investigation of the spill from the state's Department of Environmental Conservation last year when he was attorney general, praised Mr. Cuomo's decision.

"This is an important day for the people of Greenpoint, Brooklyn," Mr. Spitzer said. "It is imperative that Exxon Mobil and the other companies responsible for this pollution be held fully accountable."

When first discovered, the spill was estimated at 17 million gallons of oil and oil products spread over 100 acres. Currently, the spill covers about 55 acres.

For years, Greenpoint residents have watched as environmentalists battled state officials and the companies responsible for the oil. In 2004, Riverkeeper, an environmental group, decided to file its own lawsuit against Exxon Mobil. The following summer, soil tests performed by the group showed toxic fumes coming from the ground over the spill. That caused a second lawsuit by about two dozen Greenpoint residents.

Both suits are active, but local officials and environmental groups said Mr. Cuomo's move would put significant new pressure on Exxon Mobil.

"They have managed to manipulate and work with previous administrations and enlist their help in avoiding a serious remediation," said Alex Matthiessen, the president of Riverkeeper. "Attorney General Cuomo's notice letter brings that to a screeching halt."

Federal laws require Mr. Cuomo to give the companies advance notice of his intent to sue them, and to allow the companies to avoid the suits by acting quickly.

BP, Chevron, KeySpan and Phelps Dodge have been cooperating with state officials to clean up their own properties, according to Robert E. Hernan, an assistant attorney general who heads Mr. Cuomo's environmental enforcement unit.

But Exxon Mobil may prove more resistant. According to the notices, the attorney general's office recently approached the company and asked it to take responsibility for stopping continuing leaks at one of two sites it owns. The company declined, the documents state, and Mr. Hernan predicted that it would fight the new action in court.

"Our expectations are not high," he said.

Global Warming Smear (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130028

Mark Twain once complained that a lie can make it half way around the world before the truth gets its boots on. That's been the case of late in the climate change debate, as political and media activists attempt to stigmatize anyone who doesn't pay homage to their "scientific consensus."

Last week the London Guardian published a story headlined, "Scientists Offer Cash to Dispute Climate Study." The story alleges that the American Enterprise Institute (AEI), a conservative-leaning think tank in Washington, collected contributions from ExxonMobil and then offered climate scholars $10,000 so they could lobby against global warming legislation.

Another newspaper, the British Independent, picked up on the story and claimed: "It has come to light that one of the world's largest oil companies, ExxonMobil, is attempting to bribe scientists to pick holes in the IPCC's assessment." (The IPCC is the United Nations climate-change panel.)

It would be easy to dismiss all this as propaganda from British tabloids, except that a few days ago the "news" crossed the Atlantic where more respectable media outlets, including the Washington Post, are reporting the story in what has become all too typical pack fashion. A CNNMoney.com report offered that, "A think tank partly funded by ExxonMobil sent letters to scientists offering them up to $10,000 to critique findings in a major global warming study released Friday which found that global warming was real and likely caused by burning fossil fuels."

Here are the facts as we've been able to collect them. AEI doesn't lobby, didn't offer money to scientists to question global warming, and the money it did pay for climate research didn't come from Exxon.

What AEI did was send a letter to several leading climate scientists asking them to participate in a symposium that would present a "range of policy prescriptions that should be considered for climate change of uncertain dimension." Some of the scholars asked to participate, including Steve Schroeder of Texas A& M, are climatologists who believe that global warming is a major problem.

AEI President Chris DeMuth says, "What the Guardian essentially characterizes as a bribe is the conventional practice of AEI -- and Brookings, Harvard and the University of Manchester -- to pay individuals" for commissioned work. He says that Exxon has contributed less than 1% of AEI's budget over the last decade.

As for Exxon, Lauren Kerr, director of its Washington office, says that "none of us here had ever heard of this AEI climate change project until we read about it in the London newspapers." By the way, commissioning such research is also standard practice at NASA and other government agencies and at liberal groups such as the Pew Charitable Trusts, which have among them spent billions of dollars attempting to link fossil fuels to global warming.

We don't know where the Brits first got this "news," but the leading suspects are the reliable sources at Greenpeace. They have been peddling these allegations for months, and the London newspaper sleuths seem to have swallowed them like pints on a Fleet Street lunch hour.

So, apparently, have several members of the U.S. Senate. Yesterday Senators Bernard Sanders, Patrick Leahy, Dianne Feinstein and John Kerry sent a letter to Mr. DeMuth complaining that "should these reports be accurate," then "it would highlight the extent to which moneyed interests distort honest scientific and public policy discussions. . . . Does your donors' self-interest trump an honest discussion over the well-being of the planet?"

Every member of AEI's board of directors was graciously copied on the missive. We're told the Senators never bothered to contact AEI about the veracity of the reports, and by repeating the distortions, these four Democratic senators, wittingly or not, gave credence to falsehood.

For its part, Exxon appears unwilling to take this smear campaign lying down. Bribery can be a crime, and falsely accusing someone of a crime may well be defamation. A company spokesman says Exxon has written a letter to the Independent demanding a retraction.

One can only conclude from this episode that the environmental left and their political and media supporters now believe it is legitimate to quash debate on climate change and its consequences. This is known as orthodoxy, and, until now, science accepted the legitimacy of challenging it.

Who Pays To Stop A Pandemic? (NYT)

By Ruth R. Faden, Patrick S. Duggan And Ruth Karron

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

Baltimore

BIRD flu has not yet turned into a pandemic, but it is already killing the meager hopes of some of the world's poorest people for a marginally better life.

When poultry become infected with the deadly strain of avian influenza (H5N1), it is essential that all birds nearby be culled to prevent further spread. We all stand to benefit from this important pandemic prevention strategy, recommended by the World Health Organization and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization. Unfortunately, however, the world's poor are unfairly shouldering the burden of the intervention.

Last month officials in Jakarta, Indonesia, announced a ban on household farming of poultry there. The domestic bird population of Jakarta is estimated at 1.3 million. Thousands of families were given until Feb. 1 to consume, sell or kill their birds. Now inspectors are going door to door to destroy any remaining birds.

The Indonesian government pledged to pay about $1.50 for each bird infected with the H5N1 virus, a sum that may approximate the bird's fair market value. But most birds that have been killed under this policy are healthy, so their owners, most reports suggest, will receive nothing.

Moreover, it is not clear how Jakarta's poor will replace the income they once received from chickens and other birds. When officials impose widespread culling, industrial-scale poultry producers — like the company that owns the large British turkey farm where bird flu was found this month — usually have the resources to absorb the losses. But when the birds of small-scale poultry farmers are culled, entrepreneurs who were just beginning to move up the development ladder can be plunged right back into poverty. The most dependent and vulnerable members of the community become even more dependent and vulnerable. "Backyard birds" are the only source of income for many women and children.

Families whose birds are found to be infected with the virus may suffer even more. People in Cambodia, China and India whose poultry have been blamed for avian influenza outbreaks have often been subject to extreme stigma and isolation, and there have even been reports of suicides by desperate farmers.

It is inevitable that the world's poor will suffer most from a pandemic. A recent article in The Lancet predicted that if the next pandemic were to mimic the huge 1918 flu outbreak, 96 percent of an estimated 62 million deaths would occur in developing countries. But specific steps can and should be taken now to prevent or mitigate the injustices that are already occurring.

We are part of a group of 24 government officials, public health experts and scientists from 11 countries who recently met in Bellagio, Italy, with the support of the Rockefeller Foundation to call attention to how pandemic planning affects the world's disadvantaged. We created a checklist for avian influenza control that explicitly calls on the authorities to compensate people who suffer losses from bird-culling programs, regardless of whether the destroyed birds are infected with the avian influenza virus.

Such a program in Jakarta alone would be expensive. Just to compensate families for their culled birds would require nearly $2 million, not including the cost of administering the program. Indonesia's domestic bird population countrywide is estimated at 300 million, so if the culling program were to be expanded beyond Jakarta, the total compensation cost could run as high as $450 million.

Indonesia's avian influenza budget for the coming year is reported to be less than $50 million. Clearly, without donor assistance, the government cannot afford to compensate families and farmers fairly. So the burden of pandemic prevention must also fall on the world's wealthy nations.

Last year, the United States, the European Union and other nations pledged more than $2 billion to the global war chest for avian influenza response. Developing a program to compensate poor families in countries with limited resources is an enormous challenge. But it is time that the money pledged by the donor countries reach the people who are already the first victims of the next pandemic.

LA To Name Thugs In Anti-gang Effort (AP)

By Andrew Glazer, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Abandoning the long-held belief that naming the worst gangs boosts their street image, the mayor and police chief identified 11 of the most violent groups Thursday and promised to confront them with more law enforcement.

Authorities are reversing strategy in response to a surge in gang bloodshed that has defied the city's continuing drop in overall crime. The Police Department says the city has 400 gangs with about 39,000 members, though other agencies estimate there are more than 700 groups.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and police Chief William Bratton were to announce the plans Thursday at a police station in a San Fernando Valley neighborhood where gang crime more than doubled last year.

Gangs selected for the "Most Wanted"-style list have histories of assaulting police officers or targeting victims based on race, said Lt. Paul Vernon, a police spokesman.

Other parts of the initiative involve seeking more gang injunctions that ban members from congregating in certain neighborhoods, training residents on how to recognize gang members and creating a list of the 10 most wanted gang members, Vernon said.

Reaction from neighborhood activists and gang interventionists ranged from skeptical to negative. Posting a list simply will make gangs want to be on it, they said.

"To the gang members it is a badge of honor," said Najee Ali, an activist and former gang member.

Mike Cummings, a former gang member and pastor of the We Care Ministries in Watts, said the city should focus more on programs designed to keep children from joining gangs.

"If you're going to take away gangbangers, you need to replace them with something," said Cummings, who helps broker peace accords between rival gangs. "Job training. Recreation. We're talking about long-term stuff."

In a city-funded study, civil rights attorney Connie Rice last month said efforts to combat gang crime in the city should include $1 billion in a plan that would create economic and social opportunities in gang-infested areas. Rice also recommended focusing law enforcement efforts on the most violent gangs.

Villaraigosa has appealed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for millions of dollars in anti-gang funds and for more federal prosecutors to pursue racketeering and other charges mostly used in the past against organized crime. Gonzales has identified gangs as one of the country's greatest security threats.

The mayor is also working with FBI Director Robert Mueller, who has assigned agents to an anti-gang task force in the San Fernando Valley to work alongside police officers deputized as federal officers.

Another study released Thursday in Washington found that anti-immigrant backlash can marginalize young people from Central America and increase the risk that they will turn to gangs. The yearlong study of Latino gangs in the Washington area and five Central American countries also found no sign of transnational coordination among gang members, undercutting the idea that gangs are engaged in an organized effort to spread their influence.

The report was from the Autonomous Technological Institute of Mexico and the nonprofit advocacy group Washington Office on Latin America.

Heavy Crackdown On Youth Gangs Counter-productive: Study (AFP)

By Mauricio Rabuffetti

AFP, February 9, 2007

Tough police crackdowns on gang violence are counterproductive and lead to better-organized gangs, a new study showed amid talks between US and Latin American police chiefs to hammer out a global strategy to tackle the scourge.

The year-long study, conducted in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico and the US capital, said repressive police actions against youth gangs have actually made the problem worse.

"The research shows that gangs have grown more organized rather than less in response to hard-line police approaches. Public security has not improved as a result of these strategies," said the researchers led by the Instituto Tecnologico Autonomo de Mexico, a private institute of higher education in Mexico City.

The report, released by the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), comes a day after a three-day international summit opened in Los Angeles with the aim of forging a strategy to curb the menace of violent criminal gangs.

Latino gangs that originated in Los Angeles have been blamed for smuggling drugs and weapons as well as murders, rapes and robberies.

The report recommends following "best practices" seen elsewhere in Central America and the United States.

Recommended practices cited by the report included police efforts in Washington to treat the problem comprehensively, "police involvement in prevention programs" in Nicaragua and local efforts in Central America to develop community-based responses.

The report called for such successful methods to be considered in Mexico, "where there is a need of preventive and coordinated responses."

In the case of Mexico, the investigators said they had reached "a surprising conclusion": gangs made up of Central American immigrants -- or linked to Central American youth gangs such as the Mara Salvatrucha or the 18th Street Gang (Mara 18) -- are not widespread.

"Mexican youth gangs exist, and drug-trafficking criminal gangs are a serious security problem. But, despite alarmist rhetoric, research shows that Central American gangs are not a major problem in Mexico," the report said.

The investigators emphasized the nature of gangs varies from country to country.

"Youth gangs are a serious threat to public security in El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala" and represent "a much smaller problem" in Nicaragua, they said.

In the Washington area, gangs made up of Central American immigrants or the children of immigrants are active in certain areas, "but are not at this time a major public security issue," they said.

In San Salvador on Monday, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Central American counterparts weighed proposed cooperation projects to fight youth gangs which have become a criminal transnational problem.

The international summit underway in Los Angeles has drawn police chiefs from Mexico, Belize, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and the United States as well as officials from the FBI and the US Justice Department.

In Central America, according to local police estimates, more than 200,000 marginalized youths, many of them deported from US cities, are members of gangs, including the notorious Mara Salvatruch and Mara 18.

Cuba Sends Key Drug Suspect To Colombia (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Cuba deported reputed drug kingpin Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante to Colombia, which plans to extradite him to the United States to face trafficking and money laundering charges, officials said Thursday.

Gomez, an alleged boss of the Norte del Valle cartel known by his alias "Rasguno," had been held in Cuba since his 2004 arrest at Havana's main airport. He fled Colombia after Washington offered a $5 million reward for the capture of that country's top drug traffickers.

Cuba's government said Gomez was turned over to Colombian authorities Thursday at Havana's international airport. Oscar Galvis, a spokesman for the Colombia's DAS intelligence agency, confirmed to The Associated Press that Gomez arrived in Colombia on an air force flight from Cuba.

The Cuban statement did not mention Colombia's plans for Gomez. Cuba has no extradition treaty with the United States and harbors some suspects wanted in the United States who are considered political refugees here.

But a Colombian official said Wednesday that an order had already been signed to send Gomez to the United States. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to divulge the information.

Gomez is wanted on a U.S. indictment in New York on drug trafficking, racketeering and money-laundering charges.

His extradition appears to be more a result of his desire to get out of Cuban jail than a desire by Havana to improve relations with Washington. Last year, Gomez expressed to Colombian media his desire to leave the Cuban jail even if it meant extradition to the United States.

He would be the most senior reputed drug boss extradited to the United States since Cali cartel chief Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela was handed over in March 2005.

Gomez's Miami-based attorney, Oscar Rodriguez, told the AP on Wednesday he had no information on the deportation and would not answer questions about Gomez's intentions until he has had a chance to speak with his client.

The Norte del Valle cartel, the most powerful traditional drug organization in Colombia, is believed to account for as much as 60 percent of the cocaine consumed in the United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

However, many of its top bosses have been captured in recent years and a campaign by the U.S. Treasury Department had succeeded in freezing many of their assets, including front companies.

In March of 2004, Colombian authorities seized $100 million worth of Gomez's assets including 68 farms, 24 offices and 17 parking lots.

According to prosecutors, Rasguno went from pumping gas at a petrol station in 1991 to declaring property worth more than half a million dollars a year later.

Cuba Deports Suspected Drug Baron (BBC)

BBC, February 9, 2007

The Cuban government has deported to Colombia a suspected narcotics baron wanted in the US on charges of drug trafficking and money laundering.

Colombian officials escorted Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, 49, from Havana to Bogota on a government plane.

Mr Gomez Bustamante, who is also known as "Rasguno", or "Scratch", is an alleged head of Colombia's biggest drug cartel, Norte del Valle.

He was arrested in Cuba in July 2004 after entering on a false passport.

Officials in both Cuba and Colombia confirmed that the deportation had been completed.

The US is seeking his extradition and had offered a $5m (£2.55m) reward for information leading to his arrest.

An unidentified Colombian official told the Associated Press news agency that an order had already been signed to send Mr Gomez Bustamante to the US.

Norte del Valle became Colombia's most powerful drugs organisation after the dismantling of the Medellin and Cali cartels in the 1980s and early 1990s.

According to the US Drug Enforcement Administration, it is believed to be behind as much as 60% of all the cocaine consumed in the US.

Landis Agrees Not To Race In Tour This Year (NYT)

By Graham Bowley

The New York Times, February 8, 2007

The American cyclist Floyd Landis agreed today not to defend his controversial 2006 victory in the Tour de France.

In return, France's anti-doping agency said it would postpone a decision on whether to suspend him from racing for two years after he was accused of using an illegal steroid to help him win the tour.

The agency's president, Pierre Bordry, said the French authority would resume its deliberations on the case no later than June, after the United States Anti-Doping Agency considers its own doping case against Landis.

The cyclist, who also agreed not to participate in any other races in France this year, is facing a two-year ban from cycling and the loss of his Tour title after he tested positive for a performance-enhancing drug the day after he won the Tour last July.

"He understood perfectly that if he didn't act today, we would start the procedure immediately," Bordry said in a statement, according to wire service reports. "We will let Landis defend himself as he wishes before the U.S.A.D.A."

During last year's Tour, Landis tested positive for an unusually high level of testosterone. Landis, 31, has denied any wrongdoing and is appealing against the charges.

Four and a half months ago, Landis underwent hip replacement surgery and has said that he would be unlikely to compete in the Tour de France this July. (He has agreed, however, to ride in the grueling Leadville 100 mountain bike race in Leadville, Colo., in August.)

If he loses his appeal, he would be the first cyclist in the history of the race to be stripped of his title.

In the U.S., Landis and his lawyers are expected to present their case before a three- person arbitration panel on May 14. Landis or the agency could appeal the result to the Court of Arbitration for Sport, and that decision would be final.

Should Landis lose his case, he would be banned from competing in countries that adhere to the World Anti-Doping Agency's code, according to the U.S. anti-doping authority.

Landis was in Brooklyn on Wednesday evening, taking part in a question and answer session where he defended himself against the charges. Landis did not attend the French agency's hearing today before a nine-member panel in Paris but was represented by his lawyer, who read his request for a delay, according to reports.

In his letter to the agency, according to The Associated Press, Landis said the dual cases in France and the United States were complicating matters, and asked the French agency to delay its decision until after the U.S. agency rules.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree to voluntarily not participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," Landis said in the letter, according to The A.P.

Under French law, the French anti-doping agency, the Agence Française de Lutte contre le Dopage, known as the AFLD, can suspend Landis from racing on French soil. Landis and his advisors believe there were inaccuracies and instances of sloppiness by the French laboratory that tested Landis' urine last summer.

The French agency, however, has no authority to suspend Landis from competitions in other countries.

The power to ban a rider in France was last used by the French agency in 2003 against the Spanish rider Igor González de Galdeano.

French Authorities Will Postpone Their Decision On Suspension Of Floyd Landis (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

Cyclist won't compete in Tour or other races there this year, and doping inquiry will be postponed. His appeal of charges is pending.

French authorities agreed Thursday to suspend their investigation of doping charges against Tour de France champion Floyd Landis after Landis agreed not to race in France for the rest of this year.

The decision will allow the California cyclist to focus on his appeal of charges brought under the international sports doping system and prosecuted by the United States Anti-Doping Agency (USADA).

DOJ_NMG_0130033

That appeal hearing is scheduled to open May 14 before a panel of three arbitrators. They are Christopher Campbell, a San Francisco lawyer and former Olympic wrestler, who was selected by Landis; Richard McLaren, a London, Ontario, lawyer selected by USADA, and Patrice Brunet, a Montreal lawyer chosen as the panel's chairman by the other two arbitrators.

If the panel rules against him and he loses a further appeal to the International Court of Arbitration for Sport, Landis would face a two-year suspension from racing and the loss of his 2006 Tour de France title.

The French national anti-doping agency, which is known by its initials AFLD, is empowered only to bar Landis from racing in France. AFLD had been scheduled to open its hearing Thursday in Paris, but Landis and international anti-doping officials had requested that the case be postponed until after the USADA hearing was finished.

Both investigations stem from the same accusation — that Landis illicitly doped with testosterone during one stage of the 2006 Tour de France. Landis denies the contention, alleging that errors and sloppy procedures by the Paris anti-doping lab that tested his samples produced a false positive result.

AFLD said it would defer its investigation until no later than the end of June, as long as Landis complies with his agreement not to race in France.

The agreement will keep him out of the 2007 Tour de France, which is scheduled to begin July 7.

A spokesman for Landis said the cyclist had planned to skip the Tour this year anyway to attend to his doping defense.

Meanwhile, sources confirmed Thursday that Landis had rejected a request by USADA to retest eight of his urine samples, including six from the 2006 Tour, that had previously been ruled negative for doping. A report of the request appeared in L'Equipe, a French sports journal.

The sources say USADA proposed that eight backup samples be subjected to a carbon isotope ratio test at the Paris anti-doping lab that conducted the original tests on Landis' Tour de France samples. Landis' defense, however, has questioned the lab's conduct of the isotope test on those samples and challenged its interpretation of the results.

USADA did not respond to questions Thursday about its rationale for the request.

Landis Won't Defend Tour De France Title (HC)

By Dale Robertson, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 9, 2007

Hearing on win in last year's race postponed until USADA rules

It's official that Floyd Landis will not make an effort to defend his tainted Tour de France yellow jersey this summer. Whether he will be allowed to keep the prized maillot jaune, however, is still undetermined.

A hearing scheduled Thursday in Paris before French anti-doping authorities (AFLD) that was expected to result in Landis' being stripped of his 2006 title and suspended from racing in France for two years was postponed until after the 30-year-old American gets his day in court with the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on May 14.

In return for the stay, Landis promised not to enter any French races in 2007, first and foremost the Tour. His concession was somewhat moot because he had recently conceded delays in getting a hearing before USADA made it improbable he would be able to salvage the current season. He's also coming off major hip surgery.

"Mr. Landis requested that the AFLD allow him to first defend himself in front of the American agency," a statement from AFLD said. "He has agreed not to take part in any cycling competition in France before the end of 2007 and that includes this year's Tour de France.

"On the basis of that commitment, the agency has decided to adjourn the hearing to a later date that will be decided on how the American procedure proceeds — but no later than the end of June."

In addition to Landis' attorneys, France's minister of sport, Jean-François Lamour, speaking in his capacity as World Anti-Doping Agency vice president, had sought the postponement, saying Landis should have his hearing in the U.S. first.

Landis' near-term future in cycling rests in the hands of the USADA because USA Cycling, which controls his professional license, transferred jurisdiction. French authorities only have the right to keep him from competing in France. Ultimately, the decision as to whether he keeps his Tour title rests in the hands of the race organization itself.

Tour director Christian Prudhomme is on the record as saying he no longer considers Landis the champion.

France ratified the World Anti-Doping Code, which gives the final say in these cases to each athlete's national governing body, only following the conclusion of the Tour, so there was some sentiment inside AFLD that it still controlled Landis' fate.

Landis tested positive for an elevated testosterone/epitestosterone ratio after his heroic stage-17 ride through the Alps enabled him to regain control of the Tour one day after he had broken down on a similar rugged mountain stage. News of the failed test broke three days after his triumphant ride into Paris.

Whatever results from Landis' meeting with USADA or AFLD's final say on the matter, the case will wind up before the Court of Arbitration for Sport in Lausanne, Switzerland. The appeals process could drag things out until the end of the year, if not longer.

Landis To Skip Tour As Agency Delays Drug Decision (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Gregory Viscusi

Bloomberg, February 8, 2007

(Bloomberg) -- Floyd Landis will skip the 2007 Tour de France as part of an agreement to delay a disciplinary hearing by France's anti-doping agency over the test he failed while winning last year's race.

The Paris-based agency, known as the AFLD, said in a statement it accepted a written request by Landis to delay any judgment until after U.S. anti-doping authorities have made their decision. In exchange, the U.S. cyclist committed himself not to enter any French races this year.

``In response to this undertaking, the board of the agency decided to delay the examination of the dossier to a date that will be fixed in relation to the outcome of the procedure in front of the American anti-doping agency," the AFLD said.

Landis, who faces being the first Tour de France champion to be stripped of his title, is summoned in front of the USADA on May 14 to face the same doping charges. The AFLD said it expects to hold its own hearing by the end of June.

Landis, who denies taking banned drugs, has said he was unlikely to race this year anyway because he had hip surgery in September. The 31-year-old aims to return for the 2008 Tour de France. This year's edition of cycling's most prestigious competition begins July 7 in London and ends three weeks later in Paris.

Landis beat Spain's Oscar Pereiro by 57 seconds last year to succeed fellow U.S. rider Lance Armstrong, who won the event a record seven times.

Testosterone

Two urine samples taken after the 17th stage found inappropriate levels of testosterone in Landis's body. He won the stage by more than five minutes, riding solo for 130 kilometers (80.8 miles) to get back in contention after falling more than eight minutes behind the leaders the previous day.

The USADA, based in Colorado Springs, Colorado, generally is responsible for deciding whether to impose sanctions on U.S. riders, usually a two-year ban for a first offense. The ultimate decision on whether to strip him of the title would be taken by the sport's ruling body, the International Cycling Union.

Landis and his lawyers contend that his urine sample was mishandled and mislabeled by the French laboratory, that the test is unreliable and that the findings don't meet minimum standards for a drug offense.

French postpone doping decision

PARIS -- Floyd Landis will skip the Tour de France -- and all races in France this year -- as part of an agreement with French doping authorities in a case that could strip him of cycling's most prestigious title.

Last year's Tour champion had hip-replacement surgery 4 1/2 months ago and was unlikely to have competed in this year's Tour. He agreed yesterday not to race again in France until 2008, and in return the French anti-doping agency postponed its decision on whether to suspend him from competing in France for a maximum of two years because of a positive doping test.

"Floyd is pleased that the AFLD has agreed with his counsel's request that they suspend this proceeding," spokesman Michael Henson said.

Earlier, AFLD president Pierre Bordry said Landis "understood perfectly that if he didn't act today, we would start the procedure immediately."

Landis will go before the US Anti-Doping Agency May 14 and, following that, the AFLD will deliver its verdict in June.

"We will let Landis defend himself as he wishes," Bordry said.

The American, who has denied wrongdoing, didn't appear at yesterday's meeting of the AFLD's nine-member panel, but sent a lawyer who read his request.

In the letter, a copy of which was obtained by the Associated Press, Landis said the parallel cases in France and the United States were complicating matters. He asked the French agency to hold off until after the US agency rules.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree to voluntarily not participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," Landis said in the letter.

Bordry said Landis deserves to be heard by the USADA. But Bordry echoed Tour de France president Christian Prudhomme's sentiment that the American agency was dragging out its process.

Landis's urine sample after a 17th-stage win in last year's Tour de France was found to contain elevated testosterone to epitestosterone levels. He risks being the first rider in the 104-year history of the race to be stripped of his title. Prudhomme has said the Tour no longer considers him the winner.

Landis argues the Chatenay-Malabry laboratory that carried out the tests is unreliable.

Landis To Sit Out This Year's Tour (CNN)

CNN, February 8, 2007

PARIS, France -- Tour de France winner Floyd Landis will not take part in this year's race in order to concentrate on fighting doping charges on one front rather than two.

The American was facing disciplinary hearings in France and the U.S. after testing positive for the banned male sex hormone testosterone during the 2006 Tour.

On Thursday, however, the French Anti-Doping Agency (AFLD) agreed to postpone its investigation, due to be held that day, in exchange for a pledge by the Californian not to race in the country in 2007.

"Simultaneous proceedings in the U.S. and France risk the possibility of an inconsistent application of rules, contradictory judgements, and come at a great cost -- both personal and financial -- to Floyd," said Landis' representative Michael Henson.

In a letter read by his lawyer to the AFLD hearing, Landis asked for the chance to first defend himself in front of the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency (USADA).

"He says in this very letter that he promises not to take part in any race in France until the end of 2007, in particular in the 2007 Tour," the AFLD said in a statement.

"The AFLD subsequently decided to postpone the examination of his case to a date that will be set according to the course of the procedure before the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency," added the statement.

In the letter, Landis wrote: "Let me assure you that I fully share the goal of preventing illegal doping."

He added, though, that two disciplinary hearings dealing with the same facts could lead to confusion and asked for the a postponement of the French one.

"In this case, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I agree voluntarily not to participate in any professional or amateur cycling event in France until December 31, 2007, and in particular the Tour de France 2007," the letter read.

Landis, 31, is due to have a separate USADA hearing on May 14.

Speaking about the AFLD's postponement of their inquiry, said World Anti-Doping Agency vice-president Jean-Francois Lamour. "It is a common sense decision, which allows USADA to prepare their hearing in a proper manner.

"AFLD has the obligation to respect the WADA code and in delaying the decision they do so," he added.

The International Cycling Union (UCI) said they did not have any specific comment to make on the AFLD's decision because they only take into account the U.S. federation's actions, which will be based on the USADA recommendations.

If found guilty of doping, Landis, who denies any wrongdoing, faces a two-year suspension from the sport and the possibility of becoming the first Tour winner to be stripped of his title. However, the American could take the matter to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS).

His lawyers say the samples were mislabelled by the French laboratory which conducted the tests, the testing process was unreliable and the rider never in fact tested positive.

Testosterone can speed up recovery after exercise and generally improves stamina and strength.

Corrupt Cop's Taped Conversation Heard (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 9, 2007

Jurors considering a lawsuit filed by a former federal agent against the city of Chicago listened Thursday as the ex-agent's lawyers played a secretly taped conversation between notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski and a police official who had been assigned to investigate him.

It was 1998. And while the internal look at Miedzianowski's activity had been over for years, a federal net was closing in on the corrupt cop and his home phone had been tapped.

On the tape, Raymond Risley, head of the Police Department's internal affairs division when Miedzianowski was being investigated, could be heard discussing the allegations that had been made by Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

The suit filed by Klipfel and her husband, who is still an agent, was progressing.

DOJ_NMG_0130036

"It's so [expletive] muddied up," said Risley, a deputy chief at the time of the call. "I don't think she's going to get anywhere. It's [expletive] crazy."

Risley told Miedzianowski he had kept "all kinds of stuff" related to the internal investigation, which began in early 1993, about a year after Klipfel first contends she tried to report Miedzianowski for stealing from drug dealers.

In her federal civil suit seeking damages, Klipfel contends that Miedzianowski flipped internal investigations onto her as the city failed to root out a corrupt cop. She also says she left the ATF about a year before Miedzianowski was charged with leading a drug conspiracy. He was labeled the most corrupt cop in the history of Chicago by federal prosecutors and was convicted in 2001.

Risley could be heard on the recorded conversation telling Miedzianowski, "I got the prison tapes." The tapes were recordings of a call between Klipfel and the drug dealer at the center of her allegations, made while the dealer was in prison.

The plaintiffs' lawyers argue the tapes would have corroborated Klipfel's account, but they were missing in the case until just this week.

Risley and Miedzianowski could be heard trading opinions of Klipfel.

"If you scratch the surface on her you realize she's a [expletive] wacko," Risley could be heard saying.

"This lady is maniacal," Miedzianowski said. "She's not stupid by any means."

Risley questioned how Klipfel had come across some of her information used to make the allegations in her suit that Miedzianowski was at the center of a plot to destroy her with the help of friends throughout law enforcement.

Miedzianowski joked about it.

"If you're gonna lie, lie big," Miedzianowski said on the recorded call. "That's what it comes down to."

In his questioning of Risley, the plaintiffs' lawyer, Steven Fine, asked about how the internal investigation had been conducted. Risley testified that the investigation did not include interviews of the officers or Klipfel.

On cross-examination, a lawyer for the city, Sara Ellis, asked Risley to explain some of his decisions. Risley said the result of the probe was that investigators under him were simply unable to determine whether Miedzianowski and other officers were innocent or guilty of the accusations.

He said he did not interview Klipfel because the ATF did not allow it. The investigation showed the officers had a search warrant for a safe-deposit box Miedzianowski had allegedly stolen from and learned that the officers actually had inventoried more cash than the drug dealer had said was being stored there.

Bill To Eliminate 'gun Show Loophole' Draws Heated Debate (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) - Supporters and opponents showed up by the hundreds Thursday to hear testimony on a measure designed to prevent the unregulated sale of handguns at gun shows in Washington.

Backers said the bill would help prevent criminals from getting firearms; those against said it would only put further restrictions on gun ownership.

The crowd filled at least two hearing rooms and formed lines that nearly reached out of the John A. Cherberg Building near the Capitol.

"It's great to see this kind of crowd," said Sen. Rodney Tom D-Medina, the bill's primary sponsor. "I wish we could get this kind of attention at our Education Committee."

The bill has failed in past sessions, and doesn't appear to have much of a shot at passing this year. Leaders in both the House and Senate have said they don't see enough support for it.

But that didn't prevent partisans from turning out en masse. Members of the crowd had buttons identifying themselves as for or against the bill, but other than some heated debate and clapping and jeering during testimony, things stayed civil at the hearing in front of the Senate Labor, Commerce, Research and Development Committee.

Federally licensed firearms dealers - including those who operate at gun shows - must perform background checks on anyone who purchases a firearm and keep records of buyers' names and addresses. For handgun buyers, state law also requires a five-day waiting period.

But people who only make occasional sales at gun shows - such as collectors - aren't considered dealers, and can sell handguns without a background check or waiting period.

The measure would require all dealers at gun shows to be licensed and perform background checks.

Opponents say criminals do not obtain their guns at gun shows and that the bill would further restrict gun ownership rights. Supporters say the exemption is a dangerous opportunity for criminals to evade the background checks.

California and Oregon have passed similar measures.

DOJ_NMG_0130037

Oregon state Sen. Ginny Burdick, D-Portland, who spearheaded the initiative movement to pass the measure in her state, told the hearing that many gun owners came around to supporting the idea once they understood it.

"This is all about crime prevention to me," Burdick said. "It's a no brainer; it's common sense."

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske also testified in favor of the bill. He said background checks required by licensed firearms dealers have prevented many criminals from obtaining guns. It's only fair to extend that requirement to unlicensed dealers at gun shows, he said.

"It just makes sense to level the playing field," Kerlikowske said.

Sen. Pam Roach, R-Auburn - who is not a member of the committee but was allowed to ask questions - said the only big gun shows held in the Seattle area are sponsored by the Washington Arms Collectors organization. To buy a gun at one of those shows, she said, you have to undergo a background check.

"There is no problem here," Roach said. "I really object with using words like loophole, because there isn't one."

National Rifle Association lobbyist Brian Judy said he was concerned the bill was just a starting point and soon all private firearms transactions would be regulated.

"The NRA is vehemently opposed to this bill," Judy said.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Raid Leaves Texas Town A Skeleton (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

CACTUS, Tex. -- The streets of this small, isolated city in the Texas Panhandle are virtually empty nowadays, and "For Rent" signs decorate dilapidated trailers and shabby 1940s-era military barracks that just weeks ago were full of tenants.

Sales of tortillas and other staples are down. Money wire transactions to Central America have mostly dried up. The "Guatemalas," as local residents call them, are almost all gone, and so are a significant number of Mexican nationals. An estimated 12 to 18 children are now living with only one parent since the other was arrested in a massive immigration raid at the biggest employer in town.

On Dec. 12, hundreds of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents clad in riot gear and armed with assault rifles descended on the Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in a coordinated raid of six of the company's facilities nationwide. The operation was the government's largest single work-site enforcement operation ever. The plant in little Cactus -- a town better known in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico, and in the department of QuichÃ©, Guatemala, where workers came from, than in Texas -- was the largest one raided. Almost a quarter of the 1,282 suspected illegal immigrants arrested in the raids were removed from the Cactus plant.

That an obscure town 600 miles north of the border and in the middle of High Plains country once owned by Anglo ranchers and farmers was a haven for illegal Mexican and Central American immigrants was no surprise to anyone here. The draw to Cactus has existed since American Beef Packers opened the meat-processing plant in 1974. Swift's predecessor company bought the plant in 1975, and it became known as Swift & Co.'s Cactus Beef Plant in 2002.

Although opened with local hires, Vietnamese and Laotian refugees became the dominant workforce by the late-1970s. By the mid-'80s the workforce was overwhelmingly Mexican immigrants, and by 2000 the Guatemalans, speaking the Mayan language of QuichÃ©, had started to arrive. Before the Dec. 12 raid, Swift employed 3,050 workers in Cactus at a starting wage of $11.50 an hour to slaughter, process and package several thousand head of cattle daily.

Work inside the plant is hard, dirty, stinky and dangerous, and it is where Cactus's biggest business owner and mayor, Luis Aguilar, and Cactus's largest landlord, Thanh Nguyen, got their starts in the United States. Aguilar, a native of Chihuahua, began working at the plant in 1976 using false identity papers, he admits. In 1986, he was able to legalize his status in the United States, along with 2.7 million illegal workers, under the amnesty program authorized by the federal Immigration Reform and Control Act.

Previously criticized by some local officials who thought he aided and even encouraged illegal immigrants to settle in Cactus, Aguilar took the raids almost personally. He canceled the annual city Christmas party because so many residents, including City Council members, had spouses or other relatives who had been arrested by immigration authorities. Aguilar subsequently lent one of his buildings to be used as a food and used-clothing pantry for residents whose relatives were caught in the raid.

"These are my people," said Aguilar, 50, who today owns the largest house in Cactus, a nearby 575-acre ranch, a laundromat and the town's only full-fledged grocery store. About half of his 26 rental units are empty now.

Nguyen and his family, part of the mass exodus of "boat people" who left Vietnam after the fall of Saigon, arrived as legal refugees in nearby Dumas, Tex., in 1979 under the sponsorship of a restaurant owner who wanted cheap labor. Within six months, Nguyen and his wife left for the better-paying meatpacking plant in Cactus, said Nguyen's son Phuong, 37, who is also known as Ben.

Except for the Nguyens, Asian immigrants moved out of Cactus, which is now 99.5 percent Hispanic. Some local officials recently said that 75 percent of the city's estimated 5,000 residents before the raid were illegal immigrants. Aguilar disputes that, saying it was only 15 percent.

To Ben Nguyen, that number is not important. His father usually offered a few weeks of free rent to immigrants until they got a job at the meat plant and their first paycheck and provided thrift store mattresses and clothes, if necessary, Nguyen said. Now only eight of his father's 60 rental units are occupied. Some were vacated the day of the raid, but the majority were abandoned within weeks, when frightened immigrants moved away. Since then, vandals have been kicking in the doors of the empty apartments, looking for any items of value that might have been left behind.

"I do believe in punishment for the crime, but this is too much," Ben Nguyen said. "You scare kids; you push people so far away that you destroy the economy of the town. . . . This town is built by immigrants. They were just like me when they come over here. They didn't have anything. They came over here just to work and start their lives."

But authorities charge that these immigrants had false identity documents, enabling them to get driver's licenses and jobs illegally, victimizing U.S. citizens and fueling the fraudulent document industry. Traffic stops or crime reports became confusing events in Cactus in recent years. Immigrants would offer two names, said former Cactus Police Chief Tim Turley. The had "el verdadero," as they called it -- the true name -- and their work name.

Mario Lux, 26, from the town of Canilla in QuichÃ©, said the piece of paper that gave him his work name cost him $1,400 and was obtained for him by a friend in Cactus. With that document, Lux said he got an identification card in nearby New Mexico and then a job at the Swift plant in March 2006, cutting fat and gristle off meat for $11.90 an hour. He was not working the day of the raid but now will not return for fear of being discovered and arrested. He says that he still owes $3,200 to the smuggling network that got him to Cactus and that he has been unable to send money to his wife and three children back home. He is also three weeks behind in his rent. He and his three roommates pay $120 a week for their small apartment.

"I have no idea how I will pay that now," Lux said as he stood in the food and clothes pantry established in the Cactus town center.

Illegal Immigrants Slain In An Attack In Arizona (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 8 — Three illegal immigrants were shot to death, three were wounded and others were missing Thursday near Tucson after gunmen accosted them as they traveled north from the Mexican border, the authorities said.

The shootings came a day after gunmen in ski masks and carrying assault-style rifles robbed 18 people who had illegally crossed the border 70 miles to the south, near Sasabe. On Jan. 28 a man driving illegal immigrants from the border several miles from the scene of Thursday's killings was ambushed and shot to death as the immigrants fled.

The federal and local authorities were investigating whether the spate of shootings was related.

Illegal immigrants crossing the Mexican border often encounter bandits, armed civilian patrols and rival smugglers bent on robbing or stopping them.

The violence has been particularly acute in Arizona, which in recent years has become the busiest crossing area for illegal immigrants.

The latest shooting appeared to be the work of bandits, law enforcement officials said, though they said they had not ruled anything out.

Investigators were still piecing together what had happened, but they said they believed that the gunmen had opened fire on the travelers, apparently all from Guatemala, about 7 a.m. along a known smuggling route in a remote area near a mine 20 miles northwest of Tucson.

Their pickup truck crashed, and two of the immigrants, a young man and a teen-age girl, were found inside, dead from gunshot wounds, said Alonzo Peña, the agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Arizona.

The gunmen forced the other immigrants into another vehicle and left, dropping off the wounded, including one person found dead later, along their way, Mr. Peña said. The others who were left were a woman with a gunshot wound in the neck, a 15-year-old girl and a man shot in the fingers.

The man with the hand wound hiked to a nearby mine, and workers there helped him call the police.

Mr. Peña said the authorities were trying to determine how many had been in the group of immigrants and how many were still missing. He said it appeared the smuggler driving the illegal immigrants and a guide had either escaped or were among the group taken captive.

The Associated Press, quoting officials of the Pima County Sheriff's Department, said six or seven immigrants had left with the gunmen.

"There have been similar cases where undocumented migrants have been taken to a location and relatives in Mexico contacted and extortion took place," Rick Kastigar, the criminal investigations chief for the sheriff's department, told The A.P.

Mr. Peña said the increase in border security in the past year, including scores of additional Border Patrol agents assisted by National Guard troops, had prompted more immigrants to employ smugglers commanding ever higher prices.

The going rate is about $3,000, or higher for trips from Central America, for a guide to lead immigrants by foot across the Mexican border or in a vehicle, usually through treacherous terrain.

Some smuggling rings, rather than risk capture at the border, have chosen to rob rivals, leading to violence.

"Smugglers look at them as a commodity, a product, and in some cases they would rather rip off a load and try to extort money instead of taking the risk to smuggle," Mr. Peña said.

The Border Patrol's Tucson sector has reported that arrests of illegal aliens dropped 11 percent last year and is down 9 percent since October compared with the previous year. Officials at the agency have attributed the decline to additional manpower and newly installed fencing, cameras and sensors deterring crossers, though advocates for immigrants suggest that traffic may have shifted elsewhere.

3 Illegal Immigrants Killed By Gunmen In Southern Arizona, Follows Similar Attack (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

TUCSON (AP) — Gunmen stopped a pickup full of illegal immigrants, shot some and took the rest captive Thursday in an attack that left at least three people dead and two wounded, authorities said.

Officials have not determined who the gunmen were but believe at least two of the immigrants were Guatemalan. They believe that the driver, who was probably a smuggler, escaped along with a guide.

The men are believed to have shot five people, three fatally, along a known smuggling corridor near Tucson, and forced several others in the group of nine or 10 immigrants to leave with them, Pima County sheriff's officials said. The victims are believed to be two men and a 15-year-old girl.

The bodies of one man and the teenager were found in the rear seat of the pickup that had been carrying the group.

Another 15-year-old girl was later found with slight injuries, and another apparently uninjured person was found in the afternoon, officials said.

Two men who were not injured were in custody and telling authorities what happened. It was not clear whether anyone remained missing.

Investigators did not immediately know a motive for Thursday's attack, but gangs of bandits are known to roam border areas preying on illegal immigrants as they cross into the country. Feuding among smuggling organizations also is not uncommon, sometimes involving demands for ransoms from the immigrants relatives to gain their freedom.

The attack occurred on a dirt road near the Silverbell Mine, about 20 miles northwest of Tucson, said Rick Kastigar, the Pima County sheriff's criminal investigations chief.

The immigrants were heading north when four men armed with assault rifles in another vehicle forced the truck to stop, Kastigar said. During the confrontation, one man suffered a fatal wound, another was shot in the hand — losing several fingers — and a woman was shot in the chest and suffered a neck injury.

The two wounded immigrants were taken to a hospital with "very, very serious injuries," said sheriff's Sgt. James Ogden.

Authorities were trying to determine any link to a Jan. 27 confrontation about 40 miles to the north, possibly between human smugglers, that left one man dead and another wounded. In that incident, four men wearing camouflage uniforms and berets stopped a vehicle carrying illegal immigrants.

Three Illegal Immigrants Shot Dead Crossing US Border: Police (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

Three illegal immigrants were shot dead and two more were wounded after falling prey to suspected bandits as they crossed into the United States from Mexico, police said.

Sergeant James Ogden of Pima County Sheriff's Department said the bodies of three men were discovered early Thursday after ranchers found a group of immigrants stumbling through the desert in southwest Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0130040

One body was found by a roadside and two more bodies were found in a pick-up truck after police conducted aerial searches of the area outside Tucson, around 60 miles north of the border with Mexico.

Two of the immigrants were taken to hospital for treatment to injuries while two more were being questioned by police trying to piece together events leading to the killings.

Ogden told AFP police were working on the theory that the group had been ambushed by bandits lying in wait for them as they crossed the border.

"We're looking at the possibility of bandits," Ogden said. "They are normally armed, and stop vehicles that are being used for human trafficking. "Sometimes they take the vehicle -- and a lot times immigrants can be taken to another area and (bandits) will call family members in Mexico, and hold them for ransom."

Ogden said it was not known if there were other immigrants travelling in the group who had yet to be accounted for. "We just don't know that yet. We're trying to piece together the puzzle," he said.

The southern US-Mexico border is often used by people-smugglers and drug traffickers seeking to slip into the country unseen across stretches of isolated desert.

Latinos Lob A Few Words At Governor (LAT)

By Anna Gorman

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's off-the-cuff comments in recently released audio recordings about illegal immigration and the unwillingness of Mexicans to assimilate into American society have drawn angry responses this week from Latino community and political leaders.

"I made an effort," the Austrian-born Schwarzenegger told aides last April in conversations that touched on assimilation. "But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

The governor also used an expletive to disparage the 1986 federal law that granted asylum to more than 2 million illegal immigrants.

"His comments were highly offensive and outrageous," said Assembly Assistant Majority Leader Kevin de Leon (D-Los Angeles). "It's just mind-blowing that he continues to put his foot in his mouth."

If Spanish-language newspapers and radio are any guide, others were angered as well. The headline on one La Opinion piece this week: "Governor attacks Mexicans."

Even a former campaign aide weighed in. "Those comments are disturbing to many of us," said Arnoldo Torres, who worked for the governor during last year's reelection campaign and is a former political advisor to the League of United Latin American Citizens.

The controversy is the latest flap for the governor involving casual conversations that were not intended to become public.

The recordings were made by a speechwriter and temporarily stored on the governor's website.

A six-minute excerpt was first made public by The Times in September. The remaining 3 1/2 hours of recordings were recently obtained by The Times.

In the recordings released last fall, Schwarzenegger referred to a Latina lawmaker as "hot," casually saying that her fiery personality was the result of mixing "black blood" with "Latino blood."

The more recently released recordings provide the governor's most candid statements yet on illegal immigration.

The conversations were brainstorming sessions designed to help the governor talk out ideas, his communications director, Adam Mendelsohn, said Thursday.

"I think everyone in this state struggles with how to manage an issue as large as the immigration issue," Mendelsohn said. "The governor is working through that issue as anyone else, and he is trying to come up with a responsible position."

Mendelsohn said the recordings, however, fail "to reflect his deep respect for the Mexican culture…. He has a strong belief and understanding of what immigrants have contributed to this state in terms of economic growth."

Some immigration control advocates were pleased by his more hard-line positions.

Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said the governor "hit the truth" in his comments about the 1986 amnesty and the government's failure to enforce the law against employers who hired illegal immigrants.

"He was absolutely right," Mehlman said. "People who broke the law got rewarded, and the American people got a bunch of broken promises."

But the discussions suggest that the governor's views on immigration are mixed and sometimes difficult to categorize.

He denigrated, for instance, the idea of sending hundreds of thousands of immigrant workers back to Mexico and called the 700-mile border fence recently approved by Congress "ridiculous."

DOJ_NMG_0130041

"We all know a 12-foot fence has never stopped anybody, because you can build tunnels," he said.

He compared the fence with the Berlin Wall, saying that the United States should not be looking at Mexico as an enemy.

"These are our trading partners," he said. "All of a sudden you're building a wall for a specific group of people, which are the people that are wanting to come over here. Are those necessarily criminals? No."

Schwarzenegger also critiqued guest-worker proposals and said he supported a path to earned legalization for undocumented immigrants.

"The governor seemed to be trying to work out a position for himself" in his taped conversation, said Harry Pachon, president of USC's Tomas Rivera Policy Institute.

Pachon said the governor's opinions are shared by many Californians.

"He reflects a segment of the California electorate that is really frustrated and puzzled with the immigration issue," Pachon said. "The answers aren't easy."

The governor's frankness is what worries immigrant rights groups, which say they now have a much clearer view of his true beliefs.

At one point, to illustrate immigrants' lack of assimilation, he described a shopping mall in Lynwood called Plaza Mexico.

"Literally I felt I was in Mexico City," he said. "Everyone only spoke Spanish, every shop was in Spanish, every sign was in Spanish. They create a Mexico within California."

And he compared the United States with a home where some guests help out and others don't.

"Look, you want to come in here as a guest … then behave as if you are a guest," he said. "But what do we see in return? We see protesters carrying the Mexican flag…. And stepping on the American flag and speaking in Spanish and talking about, 'We are here, and we're going to stay.' "

Immigrant rights groups said the governor was simply wrong about the lack of integration.

"Integration is in the eye of the beholder," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. "Somebody might say that because of his accent, the governor hasn't integrated fully."

Salas added that the governor should be "more careful about what he says about the very people who are sustaining the economy."

"He needs to be much more appreciative of all the opportunities he himself has had as an immigrant," Salas said, adding that not everyone becomes a movie star or marries a Kennedy.

Eddie "El Piolin" Sotelo, a popular Spanish-language radio personality, said the governor's remarks made him want to work harder to prove that immigrants play a key role in U.S. society.

"We love this country, and we want to be a part of it," said Sotelo, who helped mobilize immigrants to march for their rights last year. "We are working every day to integrate."

State Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) called Schwarzenegger's remarks "abhorrent" and said he should visit her district in East Los Angeles.

"He would find Mexican Americans proud of their Mexican roots, but who call themselves American, speak English and aspire to the American dream, just like him and his family," she said.

Romero, however, praised Schwarzenegger for having compassion for undocumented immigrants with U.S.-born children. The governor said in the conversations that it would be "almost impossible" to send millions of illegal immigrants back home.

"Some have families," he said. "The children that were born here are American citizens. So how do you split that family up? So it doesn't make sense."

Torres, the former advisor, said the governor needed to learn more about the Latino community.

"We take solace in this one thing — that those comments were made in April and that they will not be made again, in public or in private," he said.

Immigration Becomes KKK Rallying Point (USAT)

By Theodore Kim And Emily Bazar

USA Today, February 9, 2007

The Ku Klux Klan is stepping up its activities in some parts of the country, a trend that its leaders and opponents tie to anti-immigrant sentiment.

In the past year, the Klan has rallied or distributed fliers in Bloomington, Ind.; Amarillo, Texas; Denison, Iowa; and elsewhere. In each case, the white-supremacist group denounced illegal immigration or targeted communities with growing immigrant populations.

DOJ_NMG_0130042

"It surprised me they came," says police Sgt. Randy TenBrink in Amarillo, site of a rally in August by the Texas chapter of the Empire Knights of the KKK. It is the only local KKK rally he knows of in 30 years. "The content of their message surprised me. It was so disjointed."

The Anti-Defamation League, a group that fights anti-Semitism and racism, released a report this week citing "a surprising and troubling resurgence" of KKK activity by long-standing and new groups. "They use this immigration issue to bring in others who feel like America is under siege," says Deborah Lauter, the ADL's national civil rights director. "It's easy for hate to spread."

The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate groups, also has charted an overall increase in KKK activity and says anti-immigrant sentiment is a primary driver, says Mark Potok, director of the center's tracking operation. The number of KKK groups rose from 110 in 2000 to 179 in 2005 but fell to about 150 last year, Potok says.

The behavior parallels the periods after Sept. 11, 2001, and the launch of the Iraq war in 2003. Extremist groups recruited new members by targeting Muslims, says William Aponte, the FBI's supervisory special agent for civil rights.

Phil Lawson, who says his title is "imperial wizard" of the United Northern and Southern Knights of the KKK, would not give membership numbers but says his group is growing.

He says last year it distributed 6,000 anti-immigrant newsletters in Bloomington and other Indiana communities calling for a rally and blaming illegal workers for taking jobs.

"Everyday that our government allows this Illegal Mexican Invasion to continue, our membership numbers continue to grow in the KKK," he says in an e-mail responding to questions.

In Denison, KKK members put recruitment fliers on parked cars in August, Police Chief Rod Bradley says. Storm Lake, Iowa, also was targeted.

Bradley says, "The two communities they targeted in western Iowa are both communities that have seen an influx of immigrants in the last 10 years."

Anti-immigrant Sentiments Fuel Ku Klux Klan Resurgence (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

The Ku Klux Klan appears to be on the rise again after years of irrelevance and splintered obscurity.

"Due to the successful exploitation of hot-button issues," the Klan has seen "a surprising and troubling resurgence," states a new report by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

Gay marriage and urban crime are part of the picture. But, in particular, it is the debate over what to do about the nation's nearly 35 million immigrants, of whom about 11 million are in the US illegally, that has become the Klan's main recruiting tool.

"If any one single issue or trend can be credited with reenergizing the Klan, it is the debate over immigration in America," says Deborah Lauter, the ADL's civil rights director. "New groups [are] sprouting in parts of the country that have not seen much activity."

In addition to the South, where the Ku Klux Klan was founded by Confederate Civil War veterans in 1866, this now includes active or growing Klan chapters in Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Iowa, Nebraska, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

There is no centralized organization, and membership numbers are estimates at best – 5,000 to 8,000 in as many as 179 Klan groups, according to the ADL, a group that fights bigotry, especially anti-Semitism, and the Southern Poverty Law Center, a civil rights law firm and education center.

But it is the increase in activity, including rallies, recruitment drives, and distribution of racist literature, and the partnering with skinheads, neo-Nazis, and other kinds of hate groups, that civil rights groups find troubling.

As it did from its founding, the KKK views itself has having a religious dimension. Members see "lighting" a cross as a symbol of faith. Today, Christian Evangelicals are much more likely than mainstream Protestants or Roman Catholics to believe that "newcomers threaten traditional American customs and values," according to the Pew Research Center.

It is this trend in attitudes that the Klan hopes to use in recruiting new supporters among those opposed to US immigration policies and practices, according to Klan leaders and expert observers.

In a way, it's a reversion to the Klan's nativist origins.

"While we generally think of it as a white supremacist organization, the Klan at its peak was virulently anti-immigrant, particularly with regard to Catholic immigrants, Irish, and southern European," says Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University, San Bernardino.

That was in the 1920s, when the Klan numbered about 4.5 million. The KKK had dropped to an estimated 60,000 members during the civil rights era (1954-65) and had bottomed out at fewer than 2,000 members by the mid-1970s, says Mr. Levin, a civil rights attorney who teaches criminal justice.

Levin notes that any rise in KKK activity and membership today comes off a near-historic low, and "some of the chapters are rather slim pickings."

"I'm more worried about the exploitation of the immigration issue generally than I am about the Klan exploiting it," says Levin. "I think the Klan is going to hit a ceiling because of the negative symbolism, the negative baggage."

But, he adds, "The whole nature of hate group membership has changed with the advent of the Internet. You can take bits and pieces from whatever group you like without necessarily becoming a card- carrying member."

Although some KKK adherents still don robes and pointed hoods to hold rallies and burn crosses, younger followers are more likely to look like skinheads or neo-Nazis, decorated with racist tattoos and listening to white power rock bands such as Skrewdriver and Brutal Attack.

During the first half of this decade the number of hate groups in the US increased 33 percent to 803, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center. The Ku Klux Klan was an important part of that increase.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Defends Request For Jet (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi yesterday defended her bid for a large U.S. Air Force jet to take her home and back to Washington nonstop -- and the White House backed her up.

Mrs. Pelosi suggested that former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be involved in leaking information about her request.

"It still raises the question, why would the Department of Defense not be denying this information that has been conveyed?" the California Democrat told reporters. "Why are they feeding the flames? Of course I have been a constant critic -- for nearly three years, I've called for the resignation of Donald Rumsfeld, who still has a desk at the Department of Defense, and I guess any chance they have ..."

Larry Di Rita, Mr. Rumsfeld's spokesman while defense secretary, responded, "Secretary Rumsfeld's priorities while in office did not allow for time to get too involved in member travel issues, and I doubt that has changed since he left."

The Washington Times first reported last week on Mrs. Pelosi's request, saying she wanted a larger plane and more passengers than afforded her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican. The Air Force allotted Mr. Hastert a small, 12-seat commuter jet to ferry him to his Illinois district.

As her office pressed the Pentagon for a large plane, and a staunch ally, Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, called defense officials on her behalf, Mrs. Pelosi said she does not particularly want a military jet and would be happy to fly commercially.

"I don't even like having the security," Mrs. Pelosi said. "I would rather travel on the plane with my friends to get some work done. I like my freedom, but there are certain sacrifices you have to make when you are speaker of the House."

The Pentagon told Mrs. Pelosi in a letter on Wednesday that it cannot guarantee her a plane capable of flying to California nonstop -- as she requested.

White House press secretary Tony Snow defended Mrs. Pelosi against Republican criticism and labeled as "silly" press coverage of her request for a plane and the flexibility of transporting aides, lawmakers and family members. President Bush has reached out to Mrs. Pelosi in a bid to reach agreement on major legislation, such as immigration reform.

"This is a silly story, and I think it's been unfair to the speaker," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Snow's defense put him at odds with the Republican Party, and also Republicans on Capitol Hill who have blasted Mrs. Pelosi for demanding a perk reserved for the president and vice president and a few Cabinet members.

Mrs. Pelosi also asked the Air Force to fly her and her colleagues to a Democratic Party retreat in Williamsburg, where Mr. Bush appeared. The Air Force declined the request, saying it was not allowed under Defense Department directives.

Mrs. Pelosi said, "I'm not saying that I am being discriminated against because I am a woman, I'm just saying as the first woman speaker, I have no intention of having less respect for the office I hold than all of the other speakers that have come before me."

Mrs. Pelosi stayed quiet after The Times first reported the story. But as criticism grew and the story was picked up by media outlets such as Fox News and CNN, she began making TV appearances to defend her request.

Asked later in the day if the White House differed with its own party, Mr. Snow said:

DOJ_NMG_0130044

"And I'll just repeat our position, which is as speaker of the House, she is entitled to military transport and that the ... the proper arrangements are being made between the sergeant of arms office in the House of Representatives and the U.S. Department of Defense. We think it's appropriate, and so I -- again, I think this is much ado about not a whole lot. It is important for the speaker to have this kind of protection and travel. It was certainly appropriate for Speaker Hastert. And so we trust that all sides will get this worked out."

Republicans did not see it that way.

Members quickly drafted an amendment to an environmental bill on the House floor, forcing Democrats to debate Mrs. Pelosi and military planes for two hours.

"The Congress also finds that in order to lessen United States dependence on foreign sources of petroleum, and decrease demand for petroleum in aircraft, such as passenger planes with 42 business-class seats capable of transcontinental flights, the nation must diversify its fuel supply for aircraft to include domestically produced alternative fuels," says the amendment, a clear reference to the large jet requested by Mrs. Pelosi's office.

The Washington Times reported yesterday that the Defense Department sent a letter to Mrs. Pelosi that limits her choice of aircraft to commuter-sized planes that would have to be refueled. The letter said the Pentagon could not guarantee access to larger jets, and it stated rules for carrying family members and lawmakers.

The 89th Airlift Wing at Andrews Air Force base operates three jets that can make the nonstop flight year-round: the C-32 (Boeing 757); a C-40 (Boeing 737) and the C-20, a Gulfstream jet.

Mr. Murtha is playing hardball.

"I don't need to pressure them," he told reporters, when asked about his calls to the Pentagon. "I just tell them what they need to do."

Mr. Murtha warned the Pentagon against leaking information that makes Mrs. Pelosi look bad.

"They're making a mistake when they leak it because she decides on allocations for them," he said, referring to the Pentagon budget.

Rep. Tom Cole, Oklahoma Republican and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, responded:

"It is irresponsible and reckless for Congressman Murtha to use funding needed for the protection of our country and for our men and women in uniform as leverage in order for Nancy Pelosi to travel from coast to coast like a movie star. We are a country at war, and I think it is time for the Democrat majority to get their priorities straight."

In a statement yesterday, House Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood assumed responsibility for the decision to request a larger plane for Mrs. Pelosi.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security reasons, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," he said. "Such an aircraft will ensure communications capabilities and also enhance security."

He also said he regrets "that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

Speaker's Plane Becomes A Point Of Criticism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — It is quite a way from Washington to San Francisco, but evidently nothing like the distance separating House Democrats and Republicans when it comes to the air travel arrangements of Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Republicans, accusing Ms. Pelosi of putting on royal airs, on Thursday stepped up their campaign to portray her as a luxury-loving San Franciscan because her cross-country travel could require a larger military jet than the one used since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to ferry Speaker J. Dennis Hastert home to Illinois.

Ms. Pelosi and fellow Democrats said that House security officials insisted that she travel in a government plane and that if she had her way she would fly on commercial craft. They suggested that Republicans were hypocritical, scheming sexists trying to deny the speaker the same protection afforded her male predecessor.

The House debate poked fun at the speaker's love of chocolate, lamented the torment of missed connections and middle seats and speculated about whether Senator John McCain of Arizona or Senator Barack Obama of Illinois would draw bigger crowds in an airport than Ms. Pelosi.

The White House weighed in, as well. "This is a silly story," its spokesman, Tony Snow, said.

Mr. Snow said that the Republican criticism was unfair and that the Bush administration essentially sided with Ms. Pelosi.

The attention to the dispute illustrates that politicians are acutely aware that a jet-setting image can be dangerous, particularly given the travails of modern travel for average Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0130045

President Bill Clinton spent a long time living down the tale of his haircut on Air Force One as flights were delayed at Los Angeles International Airport, even though there is dispute over whether other planes were affected.

The image of Newt Gingrich complaining about his forced rear-exit departure from Air Force One earned him a reputation as a petulant pol. And John H. Sununu, a former White House chief of staff, was ridiculed for using government jets to visit the dentist and the ski slopes.

When Republicans learned that Ms. Pelosi was trying to upgrade at taxpayer expense, they caricatured her as an imperial speaker even though no one uttered a peep about Mr. Hastert's reliance on military jets. Cornered by reporters on Thursday, Ms. Pelosi suggested that what she called a misinformation effort emanated from the Pentagon.

"Look, when I became speaker, the sergeant at arms said the speaker has transportation because of security," said Ms. Pelosi. "As a woman speaker of the House, I don't want any less opportunity than male speakers have had."

In a statement released on Thursday, the House sergeant-at-arms, Wilson Livingood, said he had been behind the call for the long-distance airplane. "The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security reasons," Mr. Livingood said, adding he regretted that the security concerns had become a political issue.

In a letter from the Pentagon that she received on Wednesday, Ms. Pelosi was assured that she would receive courtesy military shuttle service between Washington and San Francisco but that it might not always be nonstop. The letter said that she could not be given a plane to take her to political events and that family members would have to make some reimbursement.

House Republicans lined up on the floor to attack Ms. Pelosi and submitted a pointed amendment to a renewable energy bill that said the nation should decrease demand for jet fuel for aircraft "such as passenger planes with 42 business class seats capable of transcontinental fights."

Republicans said one plane that might be available for the speaker had a game room, stateroom, entertainment center and bedroom and seated 42 to 50 people.

"I hardly think these amenities help with security, and I personally would describe them as inappropriate and unnecessary extravagances," said Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, chief deputy Republican whip and sponsor of the amendment.

Some Republicans were put off by the flight fight. "This is a bunch of baloney," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, who said he had flown on Mr. Hastert's military plane.

"Next week," Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, said, "we are going to steal their mascot and short-sheet their beds."

White House Defends Pelosi's Access To Air Force Transport Plane (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrat Nancy Pelosi received some rare help Thursday from the White House against a barrage of Republican criticism over how the new House speaker intends to get back home.

For security reasons, Pelosi is entitled to fly to her San Francisco district on military planes.

The House sergeant-at-arms, who helps oversee security for the House, suggested that flying non-stop would be the safest way home for Pelosi, next after the vice president in the line of presidential succession.

Republicans, led by aggressive junior lawmakers, seized on the most extreme possibility: Pelosi's flying on the military equivalent of a Boeing 757 with the latest in travel comforts.

Too expensive, some critics said. Too polluting, others said. Too much ado about nothing, the White House weighed in.

"I have never asked for any larger plane," Pelosi said. "I have said that I am happy to ride commercial if the plane they have doesn't go coast to coast."

To presidential spokesman Tony Snow, "This is a silly story and I think it's been unfair to the speaker."

During debate on a bill that encouraged research on advanced fuels, Republicans proposed an amendment urging planes diversify their fuel load to include "domestically produced alternative fuels."

The amendment singled out "passenger planes with 42 business class seats capable of transcontinental flights" — exactly the specifications of an Air Force C-32 jet.

"The jet that Pelosi has produces 10,000 pounds of carbon dioxide an hour, far more than the previous speaker used," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. Pelosi's predecessor was Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Flying in a large Air Force plane, Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., said, "appears to remove any spending controls from our operations and dramatically increases our impact on the environment especially climate change."

Snow, too, came under criticism.

"He does not have a duty, as I do, to come to this floor and to discuss the consequences for our taxpayers," said Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration agreed to provide Hastert with a military plane for added security during trips back home. Hastert flew in a commuter-sized Air Force jet.

House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood said in a statement he recommended the Pentagon continue the practice, begun with Hastert, of flying the speaker back home.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making non-stop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," he said.

The Pentagon this week told Pelosi's staff she would be provided with a plane but the size would be based on availability and non-stop service could not be guaranteed.

The Defense Department's guidelines say Pelosi could be accompanied by family members, provided they pay the government coach fare. The plane could not be used for travel to political events. Members of Congress could join her if the House ethics committee clears the travel.

Pelosi speculated that Pentagon officials were distorting the story as retribution for her stance against the war and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"Why would the Department of Defense be not denying this information that has been conveyed?" she asked. "Why are they feeding the flames?"

Snow called Pelosi's office to make sure she knew the White House supported her use of a military plane.

He also distanced the White House from the GOP's take on the matter. The Republican National Committee said Pelosi was on a "power trip." Snow, asked whether the RNC is free to go after Pelosi on its own, said, "Well, apparently they did this time."

Sensenbrenner Stuns Pelosi, White House Defends Her (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 9, 2007

A new split has emerged between House Republicans and President Bush in dealing with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.): House GOPers have chosen to keep her close; Bush has chosen to keep her closer.

Pelosi experienced the effect of the new strategy yesterday when Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) stunned her by using a procedural tactic to force her to answer questions from members of the Science Committee and White House spokesman Tony Snow defended her right to travel nonstop across the country aboard a military jet.

After Pelosi finished making an opening statement on global warming before the Science panel, Sensenbrenner employed House Rule XI, which allows lawmakers to question witnesses for five minutes.

The move flustered Science Committee Chairman Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) and committee aides. Gordon asked for unanimous consent to waive the rules, but Sensenbrenner did not agree.

It is rare that the House Speaker, who does not vote on or sponsor legislation, would testify before a committee; it is rarer still that lawmakers would force one of their own to submit to questioning. Lawmakers testify in committees all the time, but their colleagues routinely dispense with all but the friendliest questions.

Pelosi delivered an opening statement at a hearing where scientists from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) testified about a report issued last week that said humans “very likely” have caused global warming.

“It’s tough being in the minority, but the American people are looking for cooperation on this very serious issue and the Speaker showed today she’s willing to talk about the issue with anyone anywhere,” said a spokesman for Pelosi.

Sensenbrenner responded in a statement to Pelosi’s allegation that “for 12 years, the [GOP] leadership stifled all discussion and debate of global warming. The long rejection of reality is over, to the relief of members on both sides of the aisle.”

Sensenbrenner, chairman of the Science Committee from 1997 to 2001, said he held hearings on global warming. He then asked Pelosi to explain the economic impact of policies that would slow global warming.

“He’s a rules kind of guy and he felt he had a right to question her,” said Sensenbrenner’s spokesman, Raj Bharwani. Whether Sensenbrenner’s plan was premeditated or extemporaneous is unclear. Sensenbrenner rarely talks to reporters without an appointment.

Rep. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) asked Pelosi whether her views on the use of nuclear energy had changed since she arrived in Congress 20 years ago. Pelosi said she believed that all options to reduce global warming should be open for discussion.

Gordon then jumped in and asked Pelosi to talk about the proposed global-warming select committee.

“The hearing may have gotten off to a rocky start, but it ended up being one of Congress’s most productive hearings on climate change to date,” Gordon said.

Rep. Jerry Costello (D-Ill.) rescued Pelosi from further questioning. He noted that most lawmakers are extended the courtesy of not being subjected to questions and suggested that, in the interest of time and busy schedules, the panel should move forward.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) agreed and the questioning ceased.

It was an inauspicious start to a day when Sensenbrenner's younger GOP colleagues subjected Pelosi to withering criticism over whether she should be allowed to use a military jet to fly to and from her San Francisco congressional district and Washington, D.C.

On the House floor, Republicans sought to attach an amendment to legislation promoting alternative-fuels research — the first debate under an open rule in three years — barring Pelosi from using the plane.

But their move backfired when White House spokesman Tony Snow defended the Speaker.

"I think this is much ado about not a whole lot. It is important for the speaker to have this kind of protection and travel," he told reporters yesterday. "It was certainly appropriate for Speaker Hastert. And so we trust that all sides will get this worked out."

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally, said, "It's a silly issue. These guys [Republicans] tend to forget they lost."

After the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, Rep. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who was then the Speaker, began using a 12-seat Air Force jet to fly between D.C. and his district, close to Chicago.

The House sergeant at arms defended Pelosi, stating that it is his responsibility to ensure members' safety and that he made the recommendation to use military aircraft with the ability to travel cross-country nonstop.

"The Speaker requires additional precautions due to her responsibilities as the leader of the House and her Constitutional position as second in the line of succession to the presidency," he said in a statement. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

Pelosi Strikes Back At Plane Critics (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) struck back at her Republican foes who continued to blast her Thursday on the use of military transport to travel regularly back to her California district.

Pelosi released a rare statement from House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood on Thursday afternoon in which he took responsibility for requesting an aircraft that would enable the Speaker to fly coast-to-coast without stopping and expressed "regret" that the issue was being used for political purposes.

"In a post-9/11 threat environment, it is reasonable and prudent to provide military aircraft to the Speaker for official travel between Washington and her district," Livingood said. "The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable."

"I made the recommendation to use military aircraft based upon the need to provide necessary levels of security for ranking national leaders, such as the Speaker," Livingood added. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

At the same time, Appropriations subcommittee on Defense Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.), who lobbied the Pentagon for a larger plane, announced that he planned to hold hearings on the use of military aircraft for executive branch and Congressional travel over the past two fiscal years. Murtha predicted that despite the flap, Pelosi would end up with a plane capable of making the coast-to-coast trip.

"I would predict she would" get a larger plane, he said Thursday. "I'm seldom wrong on these kinds of things."

Meanwhile, Republicans continued to have a political field day with the Speaker's travel arrangements, expounding on the issue for much of Thursday afternoon on the House floor. In a direct jab at Pelosi, an amendment authored by House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) passed overwhelmingly, 385-23. The amendment called on the nation to "diversify its fuel supply" for passenger planes, especially those with "42 business class seats capable of transcontinental flights."

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill called the move a "ridiculous distraction from the real issues."

"It just shows just how desperate and devoid of ideas the minority party has become," he said.

After remaining relatively mum on the burgeoning public relations disaster, Pelosi addressed the issue publicly on Thursday. The new Speaker told reporters that she would be "happy" to fly commercially, but that the Sergeant-at-Arms had requested that she not do so for security reasons.

"I have never asked for any larger plane. I have said that I am happy to ride commercial if the plane they have doesn't go coast-to-coast," Pelosi said. "This is a myth that [the Republicans] are talking about on the floor. They have nothing to say to the American people about the war, the economy, global warming and the rest. So they have this game they're playing."

But Pelosi questioned the motives behind the “misinformation” flowing from the Pentagon on the issue, while pointedly noting that President Bush was “insistent” that she be provided a certain level of security.

And White House spokesman Tony Snow bolstered that view Thursday, saying of the plane controversy, “This is a silly story and I think it’s been unfair to the Speaker.”

Unnamed administration sources and Congressional Republicans have pounced on the issue of how Pelosi will travel between Washington, D.C., and her home district. They say the new Speaker has demanded a luxury aircraft used only by the vice president and first lady, top Cabinet officials and generals. But Pelosi insists she has not requested a specific plane, but has been told by the Sergeant-at-Arms and Air Force that it would be safer and more efficient for her to travel nonstop to California from Washington.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the policy was changed so that then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) would be granted military transport to his Illinois district for official business.

While Republicans claim Pelosi is asking for more than what Hastert was given, the problem actually lies in aircraft availability. The fleet used is from the 89th Airlift Wing located at Andrews Air Force Base and includes the small, Lear-type jet used by Hastert to fly to Illinois, as well as two Gulfstream jets, a C-20 and C-37, which could potentially make it nonstop to California under the right weather and weight conditions.

But if the weather does not cooperate, the only other options may be larger, more deluxe planes typically used by top government officials. For example, the 89th Airlift Wing contains a C-32A, the military equivalent of a Boeing 757 that often flies the vice president as “Air Force Two.” That plane seats 45 and has 16 crew members. The Wing also counts in its fleet a C-40B, a refurbished Boeing 737 that can hold up to 32 passengers and 10 crew. The wing’s Web site states that the C-40B is designed as an “office in the sky” and is equipped with a crew rest area, distinguished visitor compartment with sleep accommodations and business-class seating with worktables.

But in a statement on Wednesday, the Defense Department said that while it would provide Pelosi with a plane, it could not guarantee nonstop flights to California. Thus, it is unclear what kind of plane Pelosi ultimately will fly on, or even whether she will be able to consistently use the same plane in her trips home.

The Pelosi Non-story (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

IN CASE YOU WERE worried that the 110th Congress was producing debate of too much substance, this week House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) stands accused of everything from hypocrisy on global warming to wrongheadedness about Iraq — all based on a request she never exactly made for a jumbo-sized military jet that she has never actually flown aboard as speaker.

The fuss started last week, but conservatives waited until Wednesday to really let loose the dogs of warp. At issue is the appropriate mode of transport between Washington and Pelosi's home in the Bay Area. In the old days, the speaker of the House would have just taken a commercial flight, but after 9/11 it was decided that the No. 2 in line for the presidency should travel with more security, so the military began providing jets and Air Force crews.

Inconveniently for Pelosi, the small jets that were used to shuttle former Speaker J. Dennis Hastert between the Beltway and Illinois can't make it to the West Coast in bad weather without stopping to refuel. So her office asked if the rules allowed her to take a larger jet capable of flying nonstop, such as a C-40, which contains beds and business-class seating. Then a firestorm erupted.

The right-leaning Washington Times wrote a blistering editorial accusing Pelosi of being an elitist and wasting taxpayer money. Prominent Republicans in Congress followed suit, and CNN's Lou Dobbs groused that "Nancy Pelosi … can now fly in style at your expense."

At least 21 government officials can request transport via C-40, including those as far down on the presidential succession list as the secretary of education; to do so is hardly an abuse of power. Even the Bush administration, rarely shy about slinging partisan mud, seems disgusted by the attacks on Pelosi. "This is a silly story, and I think it's been unfair to the speaker," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Thursday.

By then, the crazy train had long left the station. The New York Post, under an editorial headlined "Nancy Pelosi, Carbon Criminal," accused the speaker of being insincere about fighting global climate change. The Republican Study Committee, a coalition of conservative members of Congress, issued a statement equating Pelosi's inquiry with Democratic opposition to President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq; it seems the jet proves that Democrats have skewed judgment about what's in the national interest.

Hopefully, the federal government can figure out how senior political officials can fly coast to coast both in safety and nonstop. Until then, buckle up — the hot air ahead is likely to be turbulent.

Senate Weighs Spending Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Stalled on Iraq, the Senate turned to domestic business, hoping to send a giant spending bill to President Bush next week to fill the gap left by the collapse of the budget process under Republican rule last year.

The $463.5 billion measure keeps to the limits set by the White House, but imposes a strong Democratic imprint on funding for the rest of the fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

Veterans medical services, education, transit and health care will see spending increases. There are more subtle changes as well: $460 million in low-income housing assistance will be redistributed nationally, with cities such as New York and Los Angeles among the losers. And despite a self-imposed moratorium on spending earmarks for lawmakers' districts, oil and research programs at the National Energy Technology Laboratory, or NETL, in West Virginia could benefit, thanks to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.).

Most of the government has operated under a stopgap funding resolution that has become untenable and is due to expire Feb. 15. The budget package calls for keeping agencies at the same spending levels as in fiscal 2006, but with exceptions granted to meet targeted needs over the last eight months of this fiscal year.

In the case of NETL, Congress in 2006 provided more than $62 million, but had expected to cut back this year because a second source of funds came into play as a result of the 2005 energy act. That measure designated $50 million from royalty receipts go to this research, of which NETL would get $12.5 million.

But under the bill, both the 2006 appropriations and the extra money authorized by the energy bill look available. Sen. Byrd isn't alone among NETL's champions; it also has a big campus in Pennsylvania and smaller offices in three other states. But Sen. Byrd resisted House suggestions that offsetting cuts be made, in light of the new money.

Mr. Byrd's office said the energy secretary has complete discretion over how to distribute the funds within the total of $581 million provided for fossil-energy research in the bill.

This poses a test for the Bush administration, which has proposed to eliminate the oil and gas research programs and repeal the $50 million mandated by the energy act. "We're going to obey the law," a Department of Energy official said yesterday. He conceded that the administration has been slow in releasing the $50 million this year, and said it is an open question if the oil and gas research programs constituted an earmark.

In the case of allocating rental vouchers under the Section 8 low-income housing program, the updated distribution formula has been championed by public-housing groups, but also creates its own set of winners and losers at the local level.

The Los Angeles city housing authority could lose as much as $22 million, even as Oakland gains $15.4 million, for example. "We are concerned about the significant loss of the Section 8 funds," said Lourdes Castro-Ramirez, who oversees the program in Los Angeles.

On the House floor, another issue loomed larger: the cost of flying Speaker Nancy Pelosi to her home in California. Since the September 2001 terrorist attacks, a military plane has been available for the security of the speaker. But since Ms. Pelosi must travel across the country to return home, a dispute has flared about how big a plane should be provided to cover the distance without refueling.

Ms. Pelosi said she was happy to fly commercial, but Republicans took to the floor, saying the plane could cost as much as $22,000 an hour and was excessive.

Rep. Ralph Hall (R., Texas), upset he missed his own flight home amid the uproar, gently chastised his colleagues for "throwing things at one another when there's better work to do."

"It might be a little cheaper on my government for me to ride the bus from here to Dallas every week," Mr. Hall said. "Maybe we could talk about that some afternoon. Why doesn't Ralph Hall ride the bus to Texas and back every week."

Wartime Budgeting (WP)

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

IN AN OTHERWISE lean budget, President Bush's defense spending request has produced some sticker shock. The $481 billion proposal for fiscal 2008 reflects an 11 percent increase over this year; including funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the $623 billion total is 60 percent larger than the defense budget that Mr. Bush inherited in 2001. Some analysts argue that the spending is historically outsized, pointing out that the total spent or requested for the two ongoing wars is greater than the cost incurred in Vietnam.

In fact there is some excess in the Pentagon's spending plan -- but many of the comparisons being drawn are deceiving. As a share of the U.S. economy, defense spending was at a near-historic low before Sept. 11, 2001, and even if Mr. Bush's new budget is fully funded, it will still be well below the average over the past century. Defense spending is now just under 4 percent of gross domestic product, compared with 9.5 percent during Vietnam; the Reagan-era buildup took a 50 percent larger piece of national output.

A big part of the new spending meets demands that Democrats in Congress have been making for some time. There is $12 billion for a first installment in the long-overdue increase in the size of the regular Army and Marine Corps; more than $50 billion has been aimed at restocking equipment, including $21 billion for the National Guard. For the first time the administration has included a realistic cost figure for war expenses -- $142 billion -- in the regular budget.

The reality that the budget reflects is that U.S. defense spending will have to return in the years ahead to its historic level of 5 percent of GDP -- at least -- and remain there for some time. That's because the American role in heading off threats in an increasingly disorderly world will not change soon, and because the military faces the need to replace aging tanks, planes and ships with 21st-century systems. If anything, the new budget low-balls the numbers. Nothing has been budgeted to pay for the current "surge" of Iraq forces beyond the end of September, and only $50 billion is in the budget projections for war spending in 2009.

Acknowledging that defense spending must rise doesn't mean there is nothing to trim in the new budget. Tucked in the $170 billion of procurement spending is money for Cold War weapons systems that the Pentagon has tenaciously clung to: Among them are another nuclear-powered aircraft carrier and 20 more F-22 tactical fighter planes. There is another $10 billion for missile defense, even though the intercontinental defense system still needs considerably more testing.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) had a point this week in saying that, in view of the squeeze defense spending is placing on the rest of the budget, Congress ought to consider an exceptional means of funding it, such as a "war on terrorism tax." It remains the case that Mr. Bush has not asked citizens to make any wartime sacrifice to accompany those of military personnel and their families. If the United States is involved in a "long war" that will be the defining conflict of the 21st century, as Mr. Bush believes, then higher defense spending is certainly appropriate -- but so is some means to pay for it.

Budget Games That Hurt Children (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

It was one of those moments when a public official gives away a larger truth by offering what seems to be a throwaway line.

Testifying this week on President Bush's budget, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. suggested he would not mind a bit if the Democratic Congress added money to prevent cutbacks in coverage under the federal government's children's health insurance program.

"It just may be," Paulson said mildly, "that the Congress believes that that's something that should be funded at a higher level."

In other words, Bush's budget is a collection of artificial numbers -- including cuts in domestic programs that Congress will inevitably reverse -- that allow the president to claim fiscal responsibility while demanding that his tax cuts for the wealthy be made permanent.

The cutbacks in health coverage for lower-income working families are among the most egregious of the president's fiscal choices. And it's not just Democrats who are saying so.

"These cuts interfere with the fundamental responsibility of government: to safeguard the lives of its citizens," said Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell, a member of that small, hardy group of Northeastern Republicans to survive November's Democratic tide.

"Whether we are helping struggling families stay warm through the harsh winter months or protecting homes and residents against terrorism and natural disasters, we expect our federal partners to carry their fair share," she said. "The cuts to these programs place extraordinary burdens on the states."

Or consider the response of the Rev. Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA. "The president's new budget," he said, "hurts those living in poverty at a time when we should be doing even more to help the most vulnerable among us."

You'd think Bush would understand this since he regularly praises faith-based groups and long ago touted himself as a compassionate conservative. After all, the president made big news last week when he finally acknowledged what has been close to unmentionable in his administration. "The fact is," he said, "that income inequality is real." Facts, as Ronald Reagan observed, are stubborn things.

But this is a budget destined to make income inequality much worse. The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities has created a chart that should be a centerpiece of discussions concerning Bush's accounting.

The center examined what the White House's proposals would mean in 2012, the magical year in which Bush -- with much flimflammery -- claims his plan will produce a surplus. It found that, if enacted, the president's budget would lead that year to $73 billion in tax cuts for households with annual incomes of over $1 million and $34 billion in cuts to domestic discretionary programs, many of them benefiting Americans of low and middle incomes.

So here is a president who believes passionately in redistributing income -- upward.

As Rell suggested, there are plenty of problems with Bush's budget, and with Republican governors complaining (Rell is not alone), even members of Congress from the president's own party will quietly turn their backs on parts of his plan.

But the most shameful move may be the poorly disguised reduction in SCHIP, the program for working families with kids whose households earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but too little to afford private coverage -- exactly the sorts of hardworking citizens welfare reformers claim to love.

At a time when so many Americans are losing private medical insurance, the SCHIP program -- passed in 1997 with strong bipartisan support -- is one of the few government efforts working against that dangerous trend.

The program now covers about 6 million children over the course of a year. A president who cared about inequality would presumably be proposing to expand the program to cover the remaining 6 million lower-income children who still lack health coverage. At modest cost and in a rather simple way, Bush could get credit for taking a measured but significant step toward universal coverage.

Instead, Bush proposes what's called an increase in SCHIP funding of $4.2 billion over five years that has the practical effect of cutting into the number of children who are covered. Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the Finance Committee chairman and no flaming liberal, has estimated it would take $15 billion over that period just to maintain current coverage levels.

The president is far more committed to cutting taxes for Paulson's old Wall Street pals than to getting health coverage to kids with low-wage working parents. It's to Paulson's credit that, judging by his words at least, he appeared to be embarrassed. Clearly Bush isn't.

Potomac Watch It's A Trough Life (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

This budget week, there was one thing on which Democrats and Republicans agreed: It's time to do something about earmarks. And in a nod to voter disapproval with these special-interest projects, this year Congress will do its pork spending in secret.

Welcome to Congress's new and dirtier earmark game, in which the big spenders are setting all the rules. In front of the cameras, both parties claim to have found earmark religion, and are talking up a bill that would reform the way Congress asks for billions in goodies for lawmakers' home districts. Behind the scenes, they're working feverishly to keep the earmarks rolling, this time using a technique outside of the legislative process and hidden from public view.

The gears on this new underground earmarking machine started whirring late last year, when Republicans failed in a lame-duck session to pass the 2007 spending bills. The GOP pork crowd wanted to use its last weeks in power to push through 12,000 more bridges to nowhere. Saner heads noted that the party had just lost an election in part due to these corrupting payoffs and urged restraint. The standoff resulted in Republicans punting the 2007 spending responsibility to the Democrats.

That put the new House appropriations chief, Wisconsin's David Obey -- a spender for our time -- in the distasteful position of having to live up to his party's election promises to fix the earmark boondoggle. He begrudgingly promised a "moratorium." And last week, when Mr. Obey celebrated the passage of his $464 billion 2007 spending bill, he bragged that Democrats had fulfilled their promise and "stripped all earmarks from the measure."

"This decision doesn't come without pain," intoned Mr. Obey. "Many worthwhile earmarks are not funded in this measure, but we had to take this step to clear the decks, clean up the process and start over."

The key language here is "not funded in this measure," and it explains why Mr. Obey is still smiling through his pain. Congressional members, led by appropriators and an army of staff, have already figured out a new way to keep their favors in the money, and it might as well be called 1-800-EARMARKS (which unfortunately is already taken). All across Washington, members are at this moment phoning budget officers at federal agencies -- Interior, Defense, HUD, you name it -- privately demanding that earmarks in previous legislation be fully renewed again this year. There might not be a single official earmark in the 2007 spending bill, but thousands are in the works all the same.

And getting far less scrutiny than before -- if that's even possible. Under this new regime, members don't even have to go to the trouble of slipping an earmark into a committee report, where it might later (once the voting is over) come in for criticism. All the profligates need now to keep the money flowing is a quiet office and a cellphone.

Despite a congressional desire to keep this quiet, the evidence of marathon dialing is mounting. Lobbyists, thrilled their clients are still getting earmark handouts, are now publicly crowing about this underground program. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn -- anti-earmark warriors -- sent a letter to the Department of Energy last week wanting to know how that agency was handling the demands. On the same day, DOE chief of staff Jeffrey Kupfer delivered an internal memo to agency officers acknowledging that "offices have begun to receive requests from some Congressional offices, asking that the Department continue to fund programs or activities that received earmarked funds in prior years," and laying out a procedure for handling such orders.

The big question now is how aggressively the Bush administration intends to respond to this latest earmark insult. The president has made earmarks a priority, calling in his State of the Union for Congress to cut these special projects in half, and also for a more transparent process in which all earmarks are analyzed and debated. In a Manassas, Va., speech this week, President Bush complained again about how shady earmarks are, and referred to a stack of congressional committee reports (a favorite place for legislators to hide their pork) to make his point.

But by today's secret telephone standards, even conference reports look fulsome. This new practice also brings the added complication that the administration's own agencies could be complicit in this underground funding. Agency staffs understand they are dependent on Congress for funding, and that the 2008 budget process is now underway. Thumbing their noses at appropriators is an invitation for retribution. Which is why one appropriations lobbyist was gleefully quoted this week as noting that congressional calls were so far being answered by agencies wholly in "the affirmative."

The administration has taken some steps to follow up on its earmark demands. In January, Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman sent a memo to every department and agency announcing new earmark requirements. From now on, the government will be required to identify and catalog earmarks in most spending bills, including earmarks hidden in committee reports. The memo also provided agencies with a tight definition of just what counts as an earmark, to make it harder for Congress to disguise its pork under another name.

That's useful for upcoming spending debates, but it doesn't shut down the current dial-a-thon. In last week's Energy Department memo, Mr. Kupfer noted that Mr. Obey's 2007 spending bill does not include earmarks, and that the agency is also not legally bound to honor prior projects. He directs the staff to carefully review any requests to renew earmarks and then decrees that "only those with meritorious proposals or programs that effectively support and advance the Department's missions and objectives . . . should receive FY 2007 funding." This is probably easier said than done, but it's a start. No word yet if other agencies are following suit.

If President Bush is serious about earmark reform, it would seem clear he's going to have to shame legislators into better behavior. This latest escapade shows how determined some in Congress are to keep their pork in place, regardless of what they tell the public. It's time to blow the whistle on those who would preach an earmark "moratorium" on the one hand, while reaching for the speed-dial with the other.

Proposed Lobbying Limits Apply To Only One Senator (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ethics legislation designed to prevent senators' spouses from lobbying the Senate seems to have a limited reach, allowing some husbands and wives to go about their business.

In fact, the legislation appears to affect the spouse of only one lawmaker: Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat.

Mr. Conrad's wife, Lucy Calautti, is a top lobbyist for Major League Baseball and is affiliated with the firm Baker Hostetler. She became a lobbyist after her 1987 marriage to Mr. Conrad, disqualifying her from an exception in the bill that would allow some Senate spouses to continue lobbying.

The provision, added by amendment into a larger ethics overhaul bill passed by the Senate last month, aims to prevent Senate spouses from lobbying the Senate. But it has an exception allowing those who became lobbyists at least one year before their marriage or their spouse's election to still lobby the chamber.

That exception applied to several Senate spouses, including the wife of Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat. Kimberly Dorgan is executive vice president of federal relations at the American Council of Life Insurers and has in the past registered to lobby the Senate along with others at her organization.

Mrs. Dorgan first became a lobbyist in the early 1980s, a few years before she and Mr. Dorgan were married.

Also exempt is Bob Dole, former Senate majority leader and husband of Sen. Elizabeth Dole, North Carolina Republican. He became a lobbyist before his wife was elected in 2002.

Two groups that follow lobbying as a family business said they think that Mrs. Calautti is the only spouse who will be affected by the Senate legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0130053

"Kent Conrad is the only person, according to my records, who is going to be affected," said Craig Holman, campaign-finance lobbyist at Public Citizen.

"From what we can tell right now, it looks like this would apply to just one lawmaker, and that's Senator Kent Conrad," said Bill Allison of the Sunlight Foundation. "It's a little bit strange."

Mrs. Calautti declined to comment on the bill, which will force her to scale back her activities if it becomes law.

Mr. Conrad also declined to comment until the bill moves through Congress.

The amendment's sponsor, Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, has maintained that he did not keep track of who would be affected by the legislation. During debate on the bill, he said on the Senate floor that he could see an argument for getting rid of all exceptions, but he "tried to bend over backward for what I considered any legitimate argument."

Mr. Holman said the amendment is a good one because it would prevent future spouses from becoming lobbyists after their husbands or wives are elected. It would be unfair to ask spouses who already are lobbying to close up shop, he said.

Rep. Miller Helped Pursuit (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 9, 2007

For over two years, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) helped members of a southern California city council in their pursuit of federal and state funds for a wilderness preserve project that included the purchase of 165 acres that he owned.

The FBI is looking into whether Miller violated tax laws. He failed to pay capital gains taxes on the sale of his land to the City of Monrovia, claiming that the city imposed eminent domain, which allows a government agency to force a sale if it is deemed to be in the public interest. City of Monrovia officials deny that they invoked eminent domain.

Miller has said he has done nothing wrong. He describes himself as a victim of a media smear campaign and has since threatened to sue local officials for their public statements on the matter. Several calls to his office were not returned.

But relations with members of the Monrovia City Council were much friendlier some five to six years ago, when the city was trying to preserve 700 acres of foothills from development and was looking for money to buy land from Miller and others who owned property in the area.

According to minutes of Monrovia City Council meetings and interviews with several southern California city officials and former Miller staffers, Miller and his office were actively involved in trying to help the city locate federal and state money for the massive open-space project.

Miller had planned to build 60 multi-million-dollar homes on the land, and he repeatedly told the city of Monrovia that he didn't believe the city could come up with enough money to purchase that acreage — given that his ambitious development plans elevated its worth.

The city then passed an initiative to increase local taxes to raise money for the wilderness preserve project, which was designed to produce $10 million over its 30-year lifespan. The city wanted to drum up another $10 million in grants.

Miller stepped in to help, and early talks floated the possibility of inserting an earmark into an undetermined bill to provide the funds to the city, several sources said. But those talks were quickly abandoned when Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) resisted, according to city council minutes.

"Members of the City Council concurred, that after talking to Congressman Dreier individually recently, there was not money readily available to purchase the properties," read the minutes of a February 29, 2000, Monrovia City Council meeting.

Then-Monrovia City Council member Lara Larramendi Blakely recalled in an interview last year that Dreier had refused to help secure an earmark to purchase land that included Miller's because he thought it raised obvious conflict-of-interest issues.

Congressman Dreier said that he really could not support going after federal funds because Gary Miller's property was involved," said Larramendi Blakely, a Democratic politician who later became mayor and now works for Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.) "He didn't think it was right to try to get federal money that would benefit a sitting congressman."

In the same interview, Larramendi Blakely said she was not involved in detailed discussions with Miller other than their face-to-face meetings because other Republican members of the council were closer to him.

When she would visit Washington during lobbying trips, she said, Miller would ask her about the city's progress in obtaining the funds for the wilderness preserve.

"He would always ask, 'How's it going?'" she said.

After abandoning the earmark route, Miller continued trying to help the city locate public funds, the sources said, and in early 2001 he identified California Wildlife Conservation Board (WCB) grants for land acquisition as the best source. The WCB is underwritten in part by federal funds. The city of Monrovia applied for the grant and eventually received $8.6 million.

"Early on, the Wildlife Conservation Board (WCB) was pinpointed as the best location to seek matching grants," read the minutes of a May 28, 2002 Monrovia City Council meeting. "By June 2001, the City had entered an agreement with the WCB for as much as $9 million in matching grants, pending certification of property appraisals by the state Department of General Services (DGS)."

One of the city's initial assessments of the value of Miller's land was $6.6 million, but Miller balked at that amount. City officials then commissioned another appraisal, which came in at $12.2 million. Recognizing the sensitive nature of the deal, they commissioned a review of that appraisal, which backed up the $12.2 million figure, according to the May 28, 2002 council minutes.

Ultimately, however, the DGS certified a lower appraisal of $11.77 million, the final price of the land.

"Recognizing that a great deal of scrutiny would be placed on the purchase, City officials requested that DGS staff come to Monrovia to tour the property for themselves," the minutes state. "DGS ultimately certified a value of $11.77 million on the Miller property."

Miller, who had held the land since the 1980s, netted $10 million on the deal, but the purchase consumed a large portion of the funds the city had amassed for the wilderness project from both the tax and the WCB grant, leaving little for the 150 acres the city still wanted to attain.

Again, Miller agreed to help and was more open about doing so because the city had already purchased his land, according to Sept. 24, 2002 council minutes. That month, city officials traveled to Washington to meet with Miller and the office of Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) to discuss efforts to secure federal money for the project.

After the trip, Rob Hammond, who was serving as Monrovia's mayor pro tem at the time, reported that the trip had been worthwhile.

"[Hammond] also met with Senator Boxer's office and presented acquisition needs for open space in Monrovia," the minutes state. "Councilmember [Joe] Garcia and [Tom] Adams met with Congressman Gary Miller who does want to assist Monrovia now that he no longer owns property in Monrovia."

Then-Assistant City Manager Scott Ochoa reported that Boxer and Miller provided the city with an "account number" for the Environmental Protection Agency that would help them apply for grants for the wilderness project.

"Assistant City Manager Scott Ochoa reported that an EPA account number to apply for funds had been received from both Senator Boxer's and Congressman Miller's offices in response to the Council members [sic] trip," the Sept. 24 minutes continue. "Mayor Pro Tem Hammond stated that it was a worthwhile trip [sic] thanked the City's lobbyists and announced that he would go again in January."

At the same meeting, councilmember Adams concurred that the trip to Washington was "fruitful," adding that Hammond and fellow councilman Garcia had met with Miller, "who called yesterday to say that he had identified some federal funding and was hopeful there would be good news next month."

The city of Monrovia is not located in Miller's district, and it is rare for a member of Congress to help a local municipality outside his district obtain funding, especially when the lawmaker stands to benefit financially from it.

The House ethics manual warns members to avoid conflicts of interest, referring to the definition under federal law and regulation: "it denotes a situation in which an official's conduct of his office conflicts with his private economic affairs" with the ultimate concern being "risk of impairment of impartial judgment, a risk which arises whenever there is temptation to serve personal interests."

As an example of a conflict of interest, the manual refers to a case in which a member sponsored legislation to remove restrictions on the development of property in which he had a personal financial interest. "Thus, the Member was found to have wrongly used his official position for personal benefit," the manual states.

In an interview last year, Miller denied having anything to do with trying to secure federal money to help purchase his land.

"I had nothing to do with anything [involved in the effort]," he said, refusing to acknowledge that there was an effort to secure federal funds to help purchase his property.

If there was an effort to attain an earmark or any kind of federal money for the project, he said, "it was on the part of the City of Monrovia."

Pelosi Names Ethics Panel Members (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, February 9, 2007

More than a month after the start of the 110th Congress, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Thursday filled out the Democratic roster on the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

DOJ_NMG_0130055

Pelosi named Reps. Gene Green (Texas), Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.), Mike Doyle (Pa.) and Bill Delahunt (Mass.) to serve under ethics Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio.).

Pelosi's choices were approved by the full Democratic Caucus Thursday morning. House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) named the panel's GOP Members earlier this week.

Delahunt Named To Ethics Panel (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) will join the House ethics committee, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced yesterday.

Delahunt will fill the spot left open by the departure of Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) from the panel.

The other members selected for the committee are the Democrats who had already been on the panel in the 109th Congress. They are Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio), Rep. Gene Green (Texas), Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.) and Rep. Mike Doyle (Pa.).

Delahunt, even though he was not a member of the ethics panel, served on an investigative subcommittee in 2004 that looked into allegations related to the 2003 vote on the bill that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare.

"With their commitment to the highest ethical standard, this group of members will serve with integrity, building on our bipartisan efforts to restore accountability, honesty, and openness to the House of Representatives," Pelosi said.

Senators Try To Recoup $3.1 Billion For BRAC (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) yesterday moved to shorten debate on the continuing resolution (CR) that must pass next week or risk a government shutdown, but he signaled willingness to negotiate with Republicans on opening the spending measure to amendments.

Republicans are amplifying their calls for votes on several changes to the $463 billion CR, reiterating their concerns about minority rights that also have stalled a bipartisan nonbinding resolution on Iraq. Restoring $3.1 billion that was sliced from funding for the military's base realignment and closure (BRAC) program tops the GOP's agenda, which also includes more funding for infant AIDS treatment and payments to victims of crime.

Reid told reporters yesterday that he is discussing with Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) whether to allow votes on a limited number of amendments, including some from Democrats. Yet Reid warned Republicans not to resort to obstruction.

"I would hope Republicans don't march to the well, as they did on this Iraq thing, because this well has no bottom," Reid said.

In the battle to restore BRAC funds, Republicans have snagged at least one Democratic ally in Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Finance Committee. Baucus joined 25 Republicans on a letter to Senate leaders sent late Wednesday that noted the BRAC cut would obstruct troop movements and hurt local economies in military communities.

"Democrats have once again robbed from military funds and spread it to other areas," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), GOP Policy Committee chairwoman, said yesterday.

Hutchison added that environmental cleanup of former military base sites also is jeopardized by the BRAC cuts in the CR, which would keep the government funded at 2006 levels from Feb. 16 to the start of the next appropriations cycle. Reid began debate on the CR yesterday by "filling the tree," blocking Republican amendments for the time being.

The lost BRAC funds would have benefited a transition program for the Montana National Guard, but Hutchison said Baucus is not the only Democrat whose home state would be hit; bases in Virginia and Florida are also at risk. Hutchison's plan would offset the restored funds by imposing a 0.73 percent across-the-board cut on domestic accounts, excepting veterans' affairs.

Reid asserted that Republicans would not shy away from filibustering the CR, which several GOP senators already have threatened. But Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who is proposing a new 15-day CR to allow time for full debate, tamped down such talk.

"Nobody's going to shut down the government," said Coburn, part of a conservative cadre that urged last year's departing GOP leadership to halt the appropriations process and extend earlier funding levels until Democrats took control.

Democratic appropriators have said they will attach the trimmed BRAC funds to the war supplemental, a prospect that Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), another leading fiscal conservative, decried on the floor as budgetary trickery.

Leahy, Bond Fight Bush's Control Over National Guard (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Leaders of the Senate National Guard Caucus are fighting to repeal legislation slipped into the latest defense authorization bill that would make it easier for the president to declare martial law and assume control of the National Guard.

The law, which President Bush signed last fall, revised the 200-year-old Insurrection Act, which empowered the president to use the military as a police force during a rebellion.

The new provision crafted by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and John Warner (R-Va.), former chairman and now ranking member, says the president can call up troops to deal with natural disasters, epidemics and terrorist attacks, among other events.

Governors across the country were angered by last year's legislation, and have mounted an intense campaign to keep the National Guard under their control during natural disasters and emergencies.

Backed by the National Governors Association (NGA) and the National Guard community, Sens. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Kit Bond (R-Mo.), co-chairmen of the National Guard Caucus, introduced a bill this week to revive the previous authority on the domestic use of the military.

The legislation has been referred to the Armed Services Committee, where it will probably face some opposition from Warner and Levin, who said that the provision clarifies existing law and does not give the president powers at the expense of the governors.

Leahy disagrees. "Expanding the president's powers under the Insurrection Act was a sweeping, ill-considered and little-noticed grant of authority to the executive branch, at the expense of the National Guard and the governors," he said. "That change in longstanding law treads heavily across basic constitutional issues relating to the rights of the people, the separation of powers, and state and local sovereignty."

Even though the bill has been referred to the Armed Services panel, the issue is of interest to the Judiciary Committee, which Leahy chairs, according to his spokesman.

The change to the Insurrection Act went unnoticed among lawmakers, but governors were alarmed and united.

"NGA does very few letters where … all governors sign on because it is very difficult, but it did twice last year," said a source close to the matter. "Governors do not need to look over their shoulders to see when Washington, D.C., is going to drop in."

Bond, a former governor, said he was very concerned with "this imprudent change in law," which would give the president "unnecessary and unprecedented power to invoke martial law."

The change was prompted by a conflict between Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) over who should control Guard units in the days after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Bush sought to federalize the Guard, but Blanco refused to give up command, leading to a feud, which hampered the response to the disaster.

The National Guard Bureau is leaving the fight to the governors, according to a Pentagon source, who added that the bureau did not know about the changes and was surprised to see the language in the defense authorization bill. Some in the Guard are concerned that the new law is a slippery slope; others view the issue as political rather than legal.

"It makes it much easier, more politically palatable for the president to declare an insurrection," said the source.

Because the change in law was instituted without consulting the governors, they are calling for an open debate. In a letter to the Senate National Guard Caucus, North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley and South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, the NGA's lead governors on the National Guard, insisted that the citizen soldiers should remain under the control of the governors.

The changes are likely to "confuse the issue of who commands the Guard during a domestic emergency," they wrote.

Waxman Sees Potential Coverup In Ship Contract (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Faulting Program Managers, He Says Warnings About Design Deficiencies Were Hidden

Managers of the U.S. Coast Guard's $24 billion fleet-overhaul program appeared to cover up a Navy engineering report that highlighted design flaws in a new flagship cutter under scrutiny by government investigators, a senior House Democrat said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0130057

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said the December 2005 report included "bottom-line" warnings in red ink on a pair of briefing slides that concluded the national security cutter, as it is known, would not last the required 30 years.

But the warnings were deleted in a copy of the report given by Coast Guard officials to Department of Homeland Security auditors and altered in an edited version included in a wider briefing on the $1 billion-a-year fleet-replacement program, known as Deepwater, to the Coast Guard's commanding officer at the time, Waxman said.

"Sugarcoating of the situation may have made life easier for the program management, but it certainly is a disservice to you, to the Coast Guard community and to the taxpayers of this country," Waxman told DHS Inspector General Richard L. Skinner in a hearing.

The accusations, under investigation but partly disputed by the Coast Guard commandant, Adm. Thad Allen, came as Waxman's oversight panel focused on two giant DHS contracts that give unusual leeway to private firms. The companies have been given the authority to plan, design and deliver an overhaul of the Coast Guard's ships, aircraft and systems, and, separately, to build a "virtual fence" at U.S. borders using a blend of surveillance technology and physical barriers.

Waxman challenged the deals, saying they gave contractors too much power and taxpayers too little oversight. As of December, he said, 65 of 98 people hired by DHS to oversee the border project, known as SBInet, were themselves contract employees. So were 76 of the 135 tracking Deepwater, reflecting a dearth of government specialists, he said.

"There seems to be no task too important to be outsourced to private contractors," Waxman said. Federal agencies "outsource thinking through what they even want, then they outsource doing it, then they outsource oversight."

Gregory L. Giddens, director of SBInet, acknowledged difficulty hiring federal contract managers but said contract staff members are support personnel who only gather and relay data. "Support contractors do not provide oversight for prime contracts. That is a government responsibility," he said.

On the Deepwater project, Skinner's office reported last month that the Coast Guard's failure to properly oversee contract team Northrop Grumman and Lockheed Martin led to problems with the new cutter. The flaws may reduce the cutter's operating days by as much as 20 percent and could help to potentially double the cost of completing the first two of eight planned vessels, Skinner said.

Skinner called Coast Guard officials' handling of the Navy report "highly troubling" and a sign that they wanted to conceal flaws because they had committed to construction.

Allen vowed to investigate, but he noted that information about a hull-fatigue problem came from an interim Navy report, and its data were included elsewhere in the later briefing to his predecessor.

He said the Coast Guard this week changed the contract to lower the cutter's required operating days by 20 percent, blaming the gap cited by Skinner on confusing terms in the original contract.

Allen said lead ships in new vessel programs typically experience problems. He said the Coast Guard needs to quickly replace aging vessels.

Housing Worries Trim Dow (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Warning signs from the housing sector, courtesy of HSBC Holdings and Toll Brothers, weighed on the market Thursday, pushing aside more-positive news from retailers on January same-store sales.

A day after setting a new intraday high just above 12700 points, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell all the way back below the 12600 mark. But the Dow industrials rebounded to finish the day down 29.24 points at 12637.63.

Financial components weighed on the blue-chip average, with Citigroup down 0.9% and J.P. Morgan Chase off 0.6% on the HSBC news. Also, Boeing lost 0.9% after Northrop Grumman said it would compete against1 the aerospace giant for a bid on a $40 billion Air Force refueling-plane contract.

Higher oil prices also weighed on stocks, with the exception of energy companies such as Exxon Mobil, up nearly 1%. Crude futures made a late surge Thursday, finishing up $2, or 3.5%, to $59.71, their highest closing price of the year. The gains came amid more cold weather in the U.S., a big draw in U.S. natural gas storage and after Occidental Petroleum shut in 95% of production at its Elk Hills crude field in California.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 1.71 to 1448.31. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 1.83 to 2488.67, coming off strong gains in the previous session led by Cisco Systems and TiVo. Shares of Cisco continued to rise, but TiVo gave up some gains, falling 1.2%.

In recent days, stocks have vacillated in tight ranges, making today's pullback more notable. Many analysts have been saying the market is overextended and that a correction is overdue. "It's just normal to have this type of pullback," said Chris Murray, president of Murray Financial Group. "It would be healthy for the market to pull back, get smacked down, regroup and plod along higher as the year goes on."

The key housing and financial sectors were in focus after HSBC warned14 that bad debt provisions would be 20% higher than analysts had forecast for 2006, blaming a weak U.S. sub-prime lending market, which the bank had aggressively entered. The American-traded shares of HSBC declined 2.7%. Other mortgage lenders also slumped, with Countrywide Financial down 2.6% and Washington Mutual off 2.6%.

Subprime lending is "one of those issues that had been lingering in the shadows for some time during the housing slowdown, where a lot of questions were asked of companies like HSBC and Countrywide that overexposed themselves to this more-unattractive type of mortgage program," Mr. Murray said.

"On balance, what you're starting to see, as housing values come down, is that banks realize they are on the hook for some of these mortgages," explained Michael Strauss, chief economist at Commonfund, who expects more such announcements to follow. "It's a hint that there will be more stringent lending standards -- and not just for banks, but for mortgage companies as well."

Adding to the woes in the housing sector, Toll Brothers said quarterly home-building revenue dropped15 19%, though it added that the pace of cancellations is starting to abate. But the news was still troubling, as it shows even luxury home builders such as Toll are not insulated from the slowdown in housing. Shares of Toll sank 3%, and other home builders fell in sympathy, with D.R. Horton off 3.3%, Lennar down 2.8%, and KB Home sliding 2.4%.

The housing sector has seen a significant slowdown in the past year, but for the most part has failed to drag down the larger economy, which has continued to show steady growth. However, today's news could cause some to reassess housing's impact on the economy.

"In general, housing is having an impact on lowering or keeping GDP in a low-growth mode as opposed to a modest-growth mode," said Mr. Strauss. "In the first quarter, we'll still get a pretty good drag from housing in GDP." One firm, Macroeconomic Advisors, came out today with a forecast of a 2.5% growth rate for gross domestic product in the first quarter, down a full percentage point from 3.5% in the fourth quarter of 2006.

In other economic news Thursday, wholesale inventories dropped unexpectedly16 in December, the Commerce Department said. Inventories fell 0.5%, the biggest decline since May 2003. Sales at wholesalers increased 1.8% in the month, the largest increase since May. Earlier, the Labor Department said claims for unemployment insurance rose 3,000 to 311,000 last week.

Retail stocks were mixed after companies posted17 mostly stronger post-holiday sales results, as shoppers took advantage of their gift cards. Gap, a long-time underperformer, reported flat same-store sales for January, much better than the 7.7% decline analysts expected. The company also boosted its earnings estimate. Shares of Gap jumped 2.6%.

Wal-Mart Stores affirmed Saturday's announcement that it had a higher-than-expected 2.2% rise in sales at stores open at least a year for the five-week period ended Friday, a five-month high. Costco Wholesale fell short of analysts' estimates, posting a 2% increase in same-store sales. Wal-Mart's shares slipped 0.6%%, while Costco was off 0.9%.

Retailers Ring Up A Solid Start To Year (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Shoppers armed with gift cards went on a belated holiday shopping spree last month, but many in the industry fear retail sales will soften in the coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0130059

Overall, the nation's retailers reported solid sales for January, putting a rosier glow on the Christmas selling season. Luxury stores like Saks Inc. rang up big increases from a year earlier as the stock market's advance helped to fuel stepped-up spending by their clientele.

Midprice department stores and specialty chains also shared in the postholiday bonanza, selling inventories of winter clothing that had languished through an unusually balmy December. A notable bright spot was Gap Inc., which held successful clearance events and raised its full-year profit forecast.

Still, a late cold snap has disrupted the start of the spring selling season at many stores, contributing to the uncertainty about whether strong sales will last. Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, said wage growth and low unemployment will support solid consumer spending this year. But rising consumer debt and a cooling housing market could begin to damp momentum this spring, said Bill Hampel, chief economist at the Credit Union National Association.

"The consumer began 2007 on a fairly strong note," Mr. Hampel said. "But that doesn't change the fact that the consumer is facing some issues for the rest of the year."

Of particular concern to analysts is the effect of gift cards on sales figures. Industrywide, consumer purchases of gift cards over the holidays soared 50% to $27.8 billion, according to the National Retail Federation. Retailers don't record gift cards as sales until they are redeemed. Because 40% of holiday gift cards are redeemed in January, they inflate sales figures for January at the expense of December sales. The effect is especially pronounced for retailers like Gap that cater to teens, said Dan Horne, a marketing professor at Providence College in Rhode Island.

A tally of 55 major chains by Thomson Financial showed retailers' same-store sales -- or sales at stores open at least a year -- rose 3.9% last month, exceeding analysts' expectations of a 3.1% increase. However, it fell short of the 4.9% gain posted a year earlier, when a brisk Christmas was followed by a warm January that spurred early, full-priced sales of spring fashions.

Same-store sales are considered indicators of the industry's health and trends in consumer spending, one of the main drivers of the economy. But the monthly figures don't provide a complete picture. They don't include many online purchases, and some large retailers, such as Home Depot Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp., don't report monthly sales.

Last month's same-store sales at Gap were flat with a year earlier. It was only the fourth month since June 2004 that Gap has managed to avoid a decline. The San Francisco company expects full-year earnings per share of 89 cents to 91 cents, up from a previous forecast of 83 cents to 87 cents.

Gap said "initial reaction to spring deliveries has been mixed." The company, which ousted former Chief Executive Paul Pressler last month amid a strategic review, said Charlotte Neuville, head designer for its North American Gap stores, has stepped down, and the company will search for a successor.

"I worry what they would have done without the gift cards," Providence College's Mr. Horne said of Gap, noting that gift cards also boost profits since they tend to coax shoppers into buying more goods at full price.

Likewise, a 17% same-store sales increase at American Eagle Outfitters Inc. may not herald continued strength this spring. Abercrombie & Fitch Co. had a 6% same-store sales decline.

Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said same-store sales jumped 8.6%, beating its forecast for 1.5% to 3% growth. The Cincinnati retailer boosted its fiscal fourth-quarter earnings forecast to $1.55 to $1.60 a share from $1.40 to $1.50.

In addition to benefiting from gift cards, department stores are improving their holiday results with better inventory management. "Retailers are absolutely getting better at getting the right quantity in the store for the holiday and getting out at the right price point for the time," said Janet Hoffman, managing partner of Accenture Ltd.'s North American retail practice.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Bentonville, Ark., confirmed an estimate given on Saturday for a 2.2% same-store sales gain, outstripping an earlier forecast for a 1% to 2% increase. The world's biggest retailer still is experiencing problems at its Wal-Mart stores in the U.S., where sales growth is running well below historical levels.

Target Corp., Wal-Mart's smaller, trendier discount rival, posted a 5.1% increase, in line with its expectation for a 3.5% to 5.5% gain. But Costco Wholesale Corp. posted a 2% increase -- its lowest monthly gain since November 2002, according to Thomson Financial. The Issaquah, Wash., warehouse-club chain blamed the weakness on a calendar shift.

Spending by wealthy shoppers isn't significantly boosted by the gift-card phenomenon, but luxury sales were brisk nonetheless. Saks reported an 11% increase, and Nordstrom Inc.'s same-store sales rose 11%.

Modestly, Stores Beat January Sales Outlook (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

The nation's retailers rebounded in January from their disappointing holiday season as shoppers redeemed gift cards to buy winter and spring merchandise. The arrival of frigid temperatures in much of the country helped sales of cold-weather items.

DOJ_NMG_0130060

Winners included Limited Brands, Nordstrom and Federated Department Stores. Wal-Mart Stores beat Wall Street estimates, though its monthly gain was modest. Even the long-struggling Gap beat analysts' expectations, though sales languished at its namesake chain.

Among the losers were the Abercrombie & Fitch Company, the Ann Taylor Stores Corporation and Chico's FAS.

"Across the board, the numbers are decent," said Ken Perkins, president of RetailMetrics, a research company in Swampscott, Mass. The one area of weakness was women's apparel stores, which he said were hurt by the late arrival of winter weather.

Separately, Goldman Sachs said its index, which tracks about 30 retailers, rose 3.2 percent for January sales.

The solid performance in January follows a largely disappointing November-December period, which averaged a gain of 2.9 percent in same-store sales, according to Thomson Financial.

While January is the least important month of the retail calendar, its significance has grown over the last five years because of gift cards. Retailers do not include gift card sales in their monthly tallies until the cards are redeemed, and the bulk of cards given for the holidays are used in January.

The delayed arrival of winter weather helped stores that sell snow blowers and shovels or that still had plenty of heavy boots and coats to clear out, but hurt those that were heavily stocked with spring merchandise.

Merchants also benefited from a steady job market, which helped send consumer confidence slightly higher last month.

Wal-Mart, the world's largest retailer, reported a 2.2 percent rise in same-store sales, beating the 1.8 percent estimate from Wall Street analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial. The Costco Wholesale Corporation reported a same-store sales gain of 2 percent, below the 3 percent forecast.

Federated had an 8.6 percent gain in same-store sales, well above the 4.6 percent analysts predicted. The same-store results include only the Macy's and Bloomingdale's stores that existed before September, when the company transformed most of the former May Department Stores branches to Macy's units.

Gap, whose chief executive resigned last month after a string of disappointing quarters, said same-store sales were unchanged from the year ago, better than the Wall Street estimate for a 7.7 percent decline. The business was helped by strong sales at its Banana Republic stores, and the retailer raised its earnings outlook.

Dad Wasn't Dad After All, But Still Owes Child Support (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.

Sixteen months after his divorce, Richard Parker made a devastating discovery. A DNA test revealed that his 3-year-old son had been fathered by someone else.

Mr. Parker immediately filed a lawsuit claiming fraud by his apparently unfaithful ex-wife. He took his case all the way to the Florida Supreme Court.

Last week, the Florida justices ruled 7-0 against him. They said that Parker must continue to pay $1,200 a month in child support because he had missed the one-year postdivorce deadline for filing his lawsuit. His court-ordered payments would total more than $200,000 over 15 years to support another man's child.

"We find that the balance of policy considerations favors protecting the best interests of the child over protecting the interests of one parent defrauded by the other parent in the midst of a divorce proceeding," writes Justice Kenneth Bell for the court.

"We recognize that the former husband in this case may feel victimized," he writes. He then quotes a scholar to explain the ruling: "While some individuals are innocent victims of deceptive partners, adults are aware of the high incidence of infidelity and only they, not the children, are able to act to ensure that the biological ties they may deem essential are present."

In effect, the high court is saying it's partly Parker's fault for trusting his wife.

The Parker case illustrates an increasingly contentious debate over the rights and responsibilities of divorced fathers who have been duped and don't challenge paternity at or near the time of divorce. But it also raises fundamental questions about the nature of fatherhood and the legal responsibilities that can attach to a father-child relationship – even when that relationship is the result of fraud and deception by a wife and mother.

Most states have laws that permit courts to order men who have been deceived to continue to make child- support payments even when they have no biological connection to the child. The idea is to minimize any disruption in the life of the child. In recent years, some states have begun passing laws that give deceived dads some ways to fight back.

There are no reliable estimates of how often "paternity fraud" takes place. Some findings suggest 4 to 10 percent of fathers, but no definitive study has been completed.

DOJ_NMG_0130061

Unlike most duped ex-husbands in the US, Parker may still prevail in court. Last summer the Florida legislature passed a law that allows men to use newly discovered paternity evidence (like Parker's DNA test results) to overturn a court order to pay child support for someone else's child.

The June 2006 law is aimed at preventing the kind of outcome ordered by the Florida Supreme Court. The policy approach taken by the Florida Legislature stands in sharp contrast to the "policy considerations" cited by the state supreme court justices.

Supporters of the Florida law see it as a major step toward justice for deceived ex-husbands. Critics see it as a potential danger to the well-being of mothers and their vulnerable children.

In addition to Florida, Ohio, Georgia, Maryland, Alabama, Indiana, Virginia, Arizona, and Wyoming have laws allowing ex-husbands to overturn a child-support order when deception or fraud by an ex-wife is discovered, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. By contrast, most other states set a one- to four-year deadline for fathers to file lawsuits challenging paternity determinations.

The idea behind the deadline is that any action taken in a marriage breakup should be completed while the child is as young as possible to avoid a major disruption during the most formative years.

"We don't want a system where a child is 10 years old and you have people who come in and undo what has been put in place many years before," says Susan Paikin of the Center for the Support of Families in Silver Spring, Md.

Ms. Paikin says that it is up to the adults in the relationship to thoroughly investigate any paternity issues at the time of the divorce.

But fathers' rights advocates say that few husbands are aware of a paternity deadline and its legal implications. And many have no idea that their wives have been unfaithful.

In generations past such infidelity might have gone undetected. But the advent of DNA testing is changing that. It is giving new momentum to a debate over how best to provide for broken families.

"There is no perfect answer," says Paikin. "There are a lot of people who will argue that it is always in the child's best interest to have a relationship with the biological parent and that should override everything else. There are others who believe just as fervently that being a parent has more to do with being caring and nurturing, and that is what makes you a father."

Part of the difficulty in paternity disestablishment cases is that once the financial contribution of the nonbiological father is terminated, the courts do not recognize a legal right to continued contact between the child and the man.

"It is the ultimate Catch-22 for my client," says Parker's lawyer, Scott Lazar of Miami. "On the one hand he has a relationship with this child and cares about this child and would probably be willing to provide money for this child, but he doesn't want to provide it to the mother to use as she wishes."

Family court judges aren't interested in fostering a continuing relationship between men and the children of their ex-wives, says Carnell Smith, who runs a DNA-testing company and is founder of Atlanta-based US Citizens Against Paternity Fraud. "The court is only concerned about financial payments."

Judges generally view the man in a divorce proceeding as nothing more than a "walking checkbook," he says.

Smith says that instead of targeting deceived ex-husbands, the legal system should investigate the conduct of the wife and hold the mother and biological father responsible for the child they produced.

"In no other area of the law do we punish the victim for the conduct of two other people," Smith says. "For me it is disingenuous for the Florida justices to turn around and say [to Parker] 'Well, it is your fault that you didn't find out sooner.' "

The Florida legislature tried to balance the law to avoid forcing children onto welfare rolls, says Tom Sasser, chairman of the family-law section of the Florida Bar. It rejected a proposal to allow ex-husbands to recover prior child-support payments. It also rejected a proposal to allow triple damages against deceptive mothers. Instead, the law allows ex-husbands to be released from future payments.

And that, advocates say, opens the door for some ex-husbands to attempt to build a trusting relationship with someone new and perhaps start a family without the burden of a court-imposed financial debt hanging over his new wife and children.

White House On Sidelines In 2008 Contest (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

No one in the West Wing is booking tickets to Iowa. No one is scouring matchup poll numbers or hiring campaign managers or dialing for dollars. As candidate after candidate jumps into the race for president, the White House sits unaccustomedly on the sidelines.

This is the first White House in 80 years without someone running for president, a twist of history that will shape not just the campaign but also the remainder of the Bush administration. With neither a president seeking reelection nor a vice president positioned as the heir presumptive, the Bush team will increasingly turn into a spectator in the nation's political debate.

Its absence in the contest will spare the White House the trials of a campaign, easing the tensions between governing priorities and election imperatives that traditionally tear at the institution. Yet, at the same time, it means that no one will be making the case for the Bush legacy as 2008 nears. To one degree or another, all of the candidates, including the Republicans, will distance themselves from the president, particularly if he remains as unpopular as he is today.

"It creates a fundamentally different situation than we've known in the past," said Craig Fuller, chief of staff to then-Vice President George H.W. Bush as he prepared for his 1988 presidential run. "What's so starkly different about this situation is that not only is the president, by virtue of the calendar, a lame duck, but there's no champion out there on the field for him."

The early and especially intense start of the 2008 race, marked by a rush of announcements in recent weeks, has foreshadowed the changing dynamics. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), the Republican most closely identified with Bush's Iraq policy, made a point of assailing the administration's performance as a "train wreck." And the focus is turning to the future. Voters dislodged Bush's Republican majorities in Congress in November, and a Newsweek poll last month found that 58 percent would like the Bush presidency to be over; 21 percent of Republicans agreed.

For Bush, the challenge will be to assert his leadership anyway. As a wartime commander in chief sending more troops to Iraq, he is more relevant than most lame-duck presidents. But he seems eager not to let the election debate pass him by. When Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in Iowa criticized Bush's actions as "the height of irresponsibility," the White House called reporters to denounce her "partisan attack that sends the wrong message to our troops."

Still, Bush's advisers see advantages in not having a candidate in the race. Bush can push energy, immigration and Iraq plans without gauging electoral consequences. When he proposed a dramatic increase in ethanol production, no one linked that to Iowa caucus politics. "I actually think it is liberating in some ways, and it keeps them from being distracted," said former Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman. "The fact that you have a White House that isn't thinking at all about politics . . . is good for the nation and good for the president."

Other advisers said the White House will still think about politics but will be free to focus on broader goals, such as party building. And they take solace that top Republican candidates -- McCain, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney -- have backed Bush's troop increase. But they recognize that the support will not last if the situation in Iraq does not improve in six months.

The situation for Bush defies modern tradition. The last time neither president nor vice president actively ran was in 1928, when Calvin Coolidge did not seek reelection and hated Vice President Charles G. Dawes so much that he made it clear that fellow Republicans should not consider him. Even so, Coolidge had a stake in the election, with his commerce secretary, Herbert Hoover, carrying the banner. The only election since then without a president or vice president on a major-party ballot was in 1952, when Vice President Alben W. Barkley, at 74 and with no support from Harry S. Truman, lost the Democratic nomination to Adlai Stevenson.

Friction typifies relations when vice presidents step forward to seek the Oval Office. Even George H.W. Bush, who vowed not to disrespect Ronald Reagan during his own presidential bid, began to distinguish himself in the summer of 1988, first by publicly disagreeing with administration talks with drug-running Panamanian leader Manuel Noriega and later by promising a "kinder, gentler" presidency.

This can fracture a White House, with the president's staff focused on polishing his legacy and the vice president's on winning votes. The schism between Bill Clinton and Al Gore after the Monica Lewinsky scandal grew so pronounced that, at one point in 2000, Tipper Gore refused to go into a reception with the president. Gore chose a Clinton critic as his running mate and kept the president off the campaign trail.

"There are always tensions," said Roy Neel, a longtime Gore adviser who also served as Clinton's deputy chief of staff. "In the Clinton-Gore years, the tensions were minimal until Gore's campaign had to begin. And then what happened was all of the expected tensions . . . [were] exacerbated substantially by the problems that Clinton was having and the backlash onto Gore."

George W. Bush avoided that in 2000 by tapping Dick Cheney, who swore off interest in the Oval Office from the start. "My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa will look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses," Cheney told CBS News last year. "And when I speak out on an issue, it's because somebody needs to speak out on the issue, and I can do it without fear, in a sense that I'm not here trying to burnish my image."

With no campaign at stake, Cheney's influence within the White House, though still potent, has clearly diminished. The rise of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the fall of ousted defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld signaled a shift. Cheney's handling of a hunting accident last year, in which he shot a friend in the face and kept quiet about it for a day, drove a wedge between him and Bush aides who blamed him for needlessly exacerbating the president's political problems.

Since then, according to some in the administration, the Cheney mystique within the White House has faded. Presidential aides are no longer as intimidated by Cheney's staff as they once were, and some who have seen the vice president in private lately said he seems personally down. His combative tone in a CNN interview last month, even as Bush was trying to reach out to Democrats, surprised presidential aides and hinted at his frustration over the turn of events.

Advisers played down reports of tension and noted that Cheney's decision not to run makes him the most loyal vice president in modern times. "Contrary to popular belief, he doesn't freelance," said Mary Matalin, a former aide. "You don't have to work parallel agendas -- the president's and your own."

Bush plans to remain neutral in the GOP primaries -- "helpful to all, partial to none," in the words of one aide. His political guru, Karl Rove, is likewise staying out of the race and refuses to handicap it even among friends for fear of showing favoritism. Some Bush advisers, such as media strategist Mark McKinnon, have signed on with McCain, while the candidates compete for the president's fundraisers.

Within the White House, there is no sentimental favorite, no candidate in the Bush mold who excites his loyalists. McCain's long rivalry with Bush makes him anathema to many, but some top aides appreciate that he has always supported the president on the issue that matters most, the Iraq war. On domestic matters, many in the White House are attracted to Romney, seeing him as the most electable conservative. Giuliani has admirers for his performance on Sept. 11, 2001, but many consider him too liberal on social issues.

As the campaign begins to heat up without him, Bush may find it irritating not to have a role. As Timothy Walch, a historian and director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library, put it: "It's very hard, I think, psychologically and politically, for somebody who has been the most powerful person in the world to begin gradually to detach themselves from power."

'08 Slate Without Standout For GOP (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Many conservatives say they pick "none of the above" when faced with a choice of Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani as the 2008 Republican presidential nominee.

"When I look at these top three guys, I think of Shania Twain singing 'That don't impress me much,' " said former House Majority Leader Dick Armey, referring to the popular country singer.

Such dissatisfaction with the leading Republican presidential candidates is widespread among the party's conservative stalwarts, including many of the 150 alumni of the Reagan administration who attended an annual reunion at the Heritage Foundation on Tuesday night.

"We are without a viable candidate for 2008 at this point," said Mary Ann Meloy, who was an official in the Reagan White House.

Eagle Forum President Phyllis Schlafly counts herself in the "none of the above" category because, she said, the top three candidates are wrong, ambiguous or suspect on "limiting court jurisdiction, the loss of U.S. jobs from globalism and the immigration-amnesty-guest-worker, pro-life and same-sex marriage issues."

Similar discontent has been expressed by conservatives as prominent as radio host Rush Limbaugh -- who said last month that "there's nobody out there that revs me up" in the 2008 Republican presidential field -- and from many other longtime activists who are influential, if not quite household names.

"No one of the three top-tier individuals is a conservative," said Tom Carney, a Florida lawyer and Republican fundraiser. "But even more importantly, none of them have original thoughts. They are all ultimate pragmatists. They want to be president without the necessary vision in this time of international crisis."

Faith Whittlesey, who headed the Reagan White House liaison office and was ambassador to Switzerland, said she is trying to find hope in the situation. "I hear the three choices are all we got, so I would like to see their positions evolve on the core issues that face the nation -- and I am, let's say, hoping for the best," she said.

Christian Josi, senior vice president of Dezenhall Resources, a Washington-based public relations firm, said, "I am a conservative. I have had all I can stomach of Republicans."

"To put it very simply, it is very clear that McCain and Giuliani both have demonstrated that they have significant problems with key elements of the Bill of Rights," Mr. Josi said. "And that is frightening. Don't get me started on Romney. Suffice to say, I find his ideological commitment to the core conservative principles to be highly suspect."

At the Reagan reunion, there were some warm words here and there for former House Speaker Newt Gingrich for his breadth of public-policy knowledge, for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee for his sticking to his conservative social views, for former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III for his nuanced foreign policy and homeland security views, and for Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, whose criticism of the Iraq war resonates with many conservatives disaffected with the Bush administration.

But these men are part of a long list of Republican contenders who are trailing far behind the three leading candidates in opinion polls.

"I say 'none of the above' because none of them fits the model of what I think we need as president," said conservative campaign adviser Eddie Mahe. "Some have philosophical flaws. From 2009 to 2017, international affairs is where we will have to focus -- China, Africa, India Russia, the Middle East. I don't see McCain, Romney or Giuliani or any of the others understanding this changing world, how some of those societies function and how we can best relate to them."

Mr. Armey said none of the top three Republican contenders "dwells very much on the big issues of our time," including the direction of foreign policy since September 11, 2001, especially in Iraq.

"I'm not sure what their views are on America exporting democracy by force," the Texas Republican said. "The only thing that could endear one of these candidates to voters is saying, 'I know how to get us out of there.' I'm not sure voters want to hear any more argument about how or why we got in there in the first place."

Despite such discontent, the Republican Party's habits may prove hard to break, said one campaign strategist.

"Some conservatives are saying 'none of the above,' but history says it will be one of the Big Three -- McCain, Romney or Giuliani," said Republican operative Charlie Gerow, chief executive officer of Harrisburg, Pa.-based Quantum Communications. "It's part of Republican culture that we nominate front-runners."

The 2008 Ad Blitz Begins (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Presidential campaign advertising will start hitting the airwaves in the coming months, far earlier in the election cycle than during the 2004 race, and the ads will barrage the American public for much longer, delivering a windfall to television and radio stations, industry experts say.

In the age of television, there never has been a presidential race so wide-open.

“In the history of modern broadcasting, we haven’t had an election where we haven’t had a White House incumbent,” said George Reed-Dellinger, who tracks the industry for Washington Analysis, a political intelligence consultancy. “The broadcasters are licking their chops.”

For the first time since 1972, both Republican and Democratic presidential nominees are expected to forego public financing entirely, allowing them to raise and spend unlimited sums on the largest item of any campaign budget: television spots.

Moreover, the nominees may be decided by February if four large states — Florida, California, New Jersey and Illinois — succeed in moving up their presidential primaries. Such a shift would push candidates to market themselves earlier in these states that are not traditional battlegrounds, but are home to some of the most expensive media markets in the country.

“The 2008 election will begin in earnest in terms of ad buys in late spring,” predicted Evan Tracey, the head of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, which tracks political ad spending for TNS Media Intelligence.

The scramble has already begun. White House hopeful Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) hit the airwaves on Dec. 19 with a television ad in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. Funded by his PAC, Peace Through Strength, it touted his tough stance on border control.

By contrast, Howard Dean went on the air first on June 17, 2003. “It’s a full seven months earlier than 2004,” Tracey said.

Moveon.org has run ads on local stations in Des Moines, Iowa and in Manchester, N.H., as well as nationally on CNN, that attack Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the frontrunner for the Republican nomination. The spot criticizes President Bush’s plan to raise troop levels in Iraq and asserts the idea came from the senator.

The rush to run ads will no doubt serve as fodder for groups that push for campaign finance reform.

“Do you realize how much pain these ads are going to cause the American public?” the president of the group Democracy 21, Fred Wertheimer, asked. “They just got done bombarding them and here we go again.”

Tracey predicted that the 2008 cycle will be roughly in line with the record-breaking $2 billion spent on all political advertising in the 2006 midterm elections, and should easily top the $1.7 billion spent in 2004. More has been spent in midterm years than in presidential years because of the higher number of gubernatorial races.

“We’ve never seen the money that we’re going to see spent on this campaign,” said Pat Roberts, the head of the Florida Association of Broadcasters, which represents both television and radio stations in the state.

If Florida shifts its primary date, political ads will start hitting the airwaves in November, he predicted.

The national sales manager for KCRG-TV in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Steve Lake, said he already has received calls about running issue ads from some outside groups. In recent presidential races, such ads weren’t aired until late summer.

But earlier primaries in some big states, especially in the battleground of Florida, may siphon money from Iowa and New Hampshire.

"It may split the candidates' attention, time and money and negate a tidal wave of money in New Hampshire," the general manager of WMUR in Manchester, Jeff Bartlett, said.

Tracey estimates it will cost $3-5 million a week to reach the bulk of voters in California. That could be prohibitively expensive for some candidates, and it could prompt those with bigger war chests to buy ads on the national cable networks. Within 60 days of the election, federal candidates are guaranteed airtime and cut rates for their ads.

"If you're talking about having all these states frontloaded, it might be more efficient to buy the whole country," he said.

The cable industry is predicting that it will get a bigger slice of campaign dollars.

"I think they're going to ramp up their cable advertising as a whole, on a national and local basis," said Chuck Thompson of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau.

Celebrity Candidates Look To Adjust To Retail Politics In N.H. (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Former New Hampshire Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D) remembers former Vice President Al Gore's early trips to the site of the first-in-the-nation primary as he tried to transition from vice president to presidential candidate.

The sitting vice president, accompanied by a traveling circus of media, supporters, and Secret Service, suddenly had to grapple with the tiny diners, the house parties and the town halls. These venues were often bursting at the seams with voters used to interviewing candidates as if they were applying to work in the local factory or restaurant.

"The campaign figured they needed to lose a lot of the entourage and really engage the people," Shaheen said. "And when he started doing that, he started doing well."

And now that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is making her first trip to the Granite State in more than 10 years this weekend, the campaign and the state are bracing for crowd turnouts and a media reception that would make the Pope blush.

But in a state considered to be the Super Bowl of retail politics, a number of strategists who have worked in New Hampshire say the campaigns of both Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) would do well to focus on the voters, not the cameras. According to reports, Obama had more than 150 reporters in tow when he visited in mid-December.

Peter Greenberger, who served as the New Hampshire political director for Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) in 2004, said the celebrity candidates will have to come out of "their bubbles" if they want to do well on primary day.

"I think the star power of Hillary and Obama will have to bend to people-power," Greenberger said.

Greenberger cited then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush's initial strategy in 2000, when he "tried to run a star-power campaign of inevitability … and he was thumped in New Hampshire."

"I think the strategists working for the tier-one candidates are wise to learn that lesson early," he said.

Former Ambassador George Bruno, Gen. Wesley Clark's top political adviser in the state in 2004, agreed along those lines, adding that the unique flavor of the early contest always withstands the early hype surrounding famous candidates' first trips to the state.

"Retail politics in New Hampshire is still alive and well," Bruno said. "Once some of the celebrity candidates … take their first official dips into the New Hampshire snow, it will still go back to retail politics. There's always that phenomenon of here today, gone tomorrow."

Bruno said Granite State voters also have their own filters to get beyond the media coverage, and he cited as one example the reports painting Sen. Joseph Biden's (D-Del.) recent trip to the state as a nonstarter with voters.

Bruno, who has spoken with many of the candidates but not yet declared his support for any of them, said that Biden is in fact "a man of tremendous substance … and I think that will come out in the retail process."

This weekend, Clinton is scheduled for three town halls, which are open to press, and two house parties, which are open to local press but allow only pool coverage for national media.

Clinton campaign staffers said they are mindful of the traditional demands that voters there have of their candidates.

"We're going to do everything we can to protect that interaction," said Clinton campaign spokesman Mo Elleithee, who worked in New Hampshire for Clark in 2004.

Elleithee said the Clinton campaign feels it is striking the right balance between media needs and voter demands, citing its efforts in Iowa last month. It plans to continue that strategy in the Granite State this weekend despite the crushing amount of media requests it has received.

"We're going to make sure the media circus doesn't interfere with her ability to connect to the voters," Elleithee said.

He added that despite the expectation of a tremendous entourage around Clinton, the candidate will still make the rounds at traditional stops like the Merrimack Diner and the Puritan Backroom, both in Manchester.

DOJ_NMG_0130066

The Puritan Backroom's owner and manager, Chris Pappas, said that despite the larger crowds, both he and voters in the diner still expect the contenders to "go booth to booth."

"I think that essential conversation still happens," Pappas said.

Pappas said he has already had visits from White House hopefuls like New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) and Biden. He added that given the size of the fields in both parties, the crowds will eventually divide themselves up among the different candidates.

Shaheen, who now works as director of Harvard's Institute of Politics at the John F. Kennedy School of Government, said the Granite State voters she knows are not easily star-struck and generally keep an open mind until they see each of the candidates in action.

"They're keeping their powder dry," Shaheen said.

For her part, the former gubernatorial and Senate candidate said she will probably not endorse anyone, at least publicly, because her current position at Harvard implies neutrality.

Obama Touts Non-political Résumé (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

CHICAGO — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who will announce Saturday that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination, says the brevity of his political résumé is his "greatest strength."

His work as a community organizer, civil rights attorney, constitutional law professor and state legislator "provides me with insights into solving problems at the federal level and at the local level and at the neighborhood level," Obama said in an interview with USA TODAY. That experience "is what's needed right now," he said.

Obama, 45, has been in the U.S. Senate for two years and served seven years in the Illinois Senate.

Only New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had more support for the nomination in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken last month. Among respondents, 18% of Democrats and independents who lean Democrat supported Obama; 29% backed Clinton.

A year ago, Obama said, he didn't plan to run for president. But as he traveled across the USA campaigning for Democrats and signing his best-selling book The Audacity of Hope, he discovered "an enormous hunger for a new kind of politics — an enormous desire to end business as usual and to focus on a politics that brings us together."

That won't preclude "vigorous debates and serious differences" with rivals, Obama said. The Iraq war, which he opposed when other Democrats voted to authorize it, will be a "dominant issue," he said. "I'm proud that … I stood clearly and forthrightly in opposition." He supports a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops by March 31, 2008.

Obama also said:

·He and his wife, Michelle, worry about losing privacy. "We tend to be pretty private people, we don't like a lot of fuss," he said. "What I dread most is being away from my kids" — daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5.

He'll make that sacrifice, he said, because he believes he can bring "people together to find common-sense, practical solutions" to economic, health care, education, energy and security problems.

·Although he would be the first African-American president, race is not "the main focus" of his campaign. If there are "symbolic benefits from it, that's great," he said.

·He hopes to generate "the kind of enthusiasm and interest" that motivates many people to make $5 or $10 donations online.

·He doesn't wake up every day certain he'll win. "I am absolutely convinced that …we've got a message that I think will appeal to the American people."

Dem Cites "Unique" Skills As Key To His Campaign (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama talked with USA TODAY's Judy Keen as he prepared to announce Saturday in Springfield, Ill., that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination. Excerpts:

Q: What will you say about why you want to be president?

A: We face enormous challenges, challenges that are going to set the course of this country for the next generation. … The only way we're going to make progress is if we can build a strong consensus in this country to bring people across divisions of race or religion or region or ideological predisposition.

Q: How did you decide you're the best person to lead the nation toward the solutions?

DOJ_NMG_0130067

A: (I asked) myself, is there something unique about my potential candidacy that might allow us to advance as a country in a way that wouldn't happen if I didn't run. And I decided that I might have the kind of skills and life experience that were unique and it would be worthwhile for me to take the plunge.

Q: How can you sustain that new approach in a campaign?

A: We try to get past some of the simplistic, ideological arguments that have characterized Washington over the last several years and that we focus on bringing new people into the process that, frankly, over the last several years have felt completely left out.

Q: Will Iraq be the dominant issue in the campaign, and does it work to your advantage if it is because of your long-standing opposition to the war?

A: I think the voters are going to be looking for someone who has a good grasp of the issues facing us in the Middle East, recognizes that we've got very real national security interests there and we can't act foolishly or based on politics at this point, but that we have to change course in a fundamental way.

Q: You talk often about restoring hope to America. Will you be more specific about domestic policy proposals that will accomplish that goal?

A: Absolutely. Look, I think that the press and folks in Washington have created an accelerated timeline. I read a column the other day talking about the various midcourse corrections the campaigns have to make, and I haven't even announced yet. The truth of the matter is I probably have a more detailed and specific record of what I think and where I stand than any candidate in this race. I mean, I've written two very detailed books that give people a pretty good window into my heart and soul. I've given major policy speeches on just about every important issue.

Q: You have said that you worry about forfeiting your privacy. How big a factor was that in your decision, and is your wife 100% in favor of this idea?

A: My wife is 100% behind the race. She was a partner in making the decision, but obviously there are sacrifices. … I'm not somebody who enjoys a big entourage. The difficulty in just going out and taking a walk or taking my kids to the zoo — the inability to do that is a major sacrifice, but we think the sacrifice is worth it.

Q: Are you making your announcement in Springfield, Ill., because of the connection you feel to Abraham Lincoln?

A: Not only is Lincoln one of my political heroes, but like Lincoln, I served for seven years in Springfield in the state Senate, and it's there that I learned how to legislate. It's there that I developed many of my political ideas. … I've got a lot of friends from all throughout Illinois coming down, and I can't think of a better place from which to embark on this journey.

Q: What are you most looking forward to in the campaign?

A: I'm most looking forward to retail politics: sitting in folks' living rooms and talking to them in small groups or one-on-one and hearing their stories and what their hopes and dreams and aspirations are and figuring out ways that we can create a government that helps them achieve it.

Q: Who will your toughest opponent be?

A: Cynicism.

Race In Background Of Run (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten, Judy Keen

USA Today, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama said his campaign for the presidency "will send a wonderful message to young people of color and to immigrants around the country" if successful.

He makes clear, though, that he hopes to make race irrelevant in his bid to become the first black to occupy the White House.

"If I'm talking about the issues that matter to people, if we do a good job in letting people know who I am and what I stand for … they'll make their judgment not based on my race but based on how well they think I can lead this country," Obama told USA TODAY.

As he begins campaigning in earnest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Obama cannot assume that he will be the favorite of black voters, who are crucial to the success of Democratic candidates in states such as South Carolina, which holds one of the earliest primaries. Blacks accounted for nearly half of the state's Democratic primary voters in 2004.

Obama's background doesn't fit the mold of previous black presidential candidates or that of traditional civil rights leaders. He is the son of a black Kenyan father and a white American mother. He grew up in Hawaii and spent some of his childhood in Indonesia. He was the first black president of the prestigious Harvard Law Review and spent some time as a community organizer on Chicago's South Side.

Obama "has demonstrated a great deal of popularity with white people," said David Bositis, an expert on black voter opinion at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "There is almost always, on the part of some African-Americans, a thing in their back of their minds that says, 'What's the catch?' "

Wilbur Rich, a political scientist at Wellesley College, said: "This is the kind of thing people talk about in black barbershops: Is he really a brother?" With his résumé, Rich said, Obama "has earned the right to call himself whatever he wants."

The debate is playing out not just in barbershops, but in blogs, magazines and newspapers. In the New York Daily News recently, columnist Stanley Crouch, a prominent black social critic, said that when "black Americans refer to Obama as 'one of us,' I do not know what they are talking about."

Other blacks dismiss such criticism. The real test will be whether "he is the best qualified person for the job," said Bruce Gordon, president and chief executive officer of the NAACP. "Black folks will not vote for Barack simply because he's black. Not all women will vote for Hillary," he said, referring to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, another Democratic contender.

Clinton leads Obama in polls of black voters. Recent ABC News/Washington Post polling, for instance, found that 60% of black, Democratic-leaning voters supported Clinton, and 20% backed Obama.

Cornell Belcher, a Democratic activist and pollster for Obama, said the story behind those numbers is simple: "African-Americans know the Clintons. They don't know Barack Obama. Those are numbers that are going to move."

Evan Brunson is among the black voters Obama will have to win over.

Brunson, president of the College Democrats chapter at Howard University in Washington, said he felt a surge of excitement as he watched Obama speak at a recent event.

Still, the 22-year-old senior from Dallas said he's more interested right now in a fellow Southerner, former North Carolina senator John Edwards. "I like that someone is picking up the mantle of social justice," he said about Edwards.

Obama's race will be a factor in his choice, Brunson said, but not the only one. "You don't give your vote away; they have to earn it."

Obama Forged Political Mettle In Illinois Capitol (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 8 -- When Sen. Barack Obama heads downstate to Springfield on Saturday to announce his candidacy for president, he will speak in lofty tones of America and Abraham Lincoln, but also of a more prosaic topic: his own eight years in the Illinois Senate.

The heart of Obama's political rÃ©sumÃ© lies in Springfield, where he arrived in January 1997. He was a newcomer to elective politics after time as a community organizer and University of Chicago law professor operating largely outside the city's Democratic machine.

From a district on the South Side of Chicago, he reached Republican-dominated Springfield as a committed liberal, later writing that he understood politics in the capital "as a full-contact sport, and minded neither the sharp elbows nor the occasional blind-side hit."

Yet he emerged as a leader while still in his 30s by developing a style former colleagues describe as methodical, inclusive and pragmatic. He cobbled together legislation with Republicans and conservative Democrats, making overtures other progressive politicians might consider distasteful.

Along the way, he played an important role in drafting bipartisan ethics legislation and health-care reform. He overcame law enforcement objections to codify changes designed to curb racial profiling and to make capital punishment, which he favors, more equitable.

"When you come in, especially as a freshman, and work on something like ethics reform, it's not necessarily a way to endear yourself to some of the veteran members of the Illinois General Assembly," said state Sen. Kirk W. Dillard, a Republican who became a friend. "And working on issues like racial profiling was contentious, but Barack had a way both intellectually and in demeanor that defused skeptics."

"He wasn't a maverick," said Cynthia Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform. "There were other legislators I would turn to if I just wanted to make a lot of noise. That wasn't his style."

Obama was a persistent foe of social conservatives on issues of reproductive rights. He was also a reliable vote for gun control and backed a ban on assault weapons, although he took a political hit from Democrats for missing an important gun vote while in Hawaii for the Christmas holidays.

In 1997, Obama was not instantly embraced, Dillard said: "The fact that he was a law professor -- and a constitutional-law professor -- and he was a Harvard graduate made many members of the General Assembly roll their eyes."

Obama went to work. Afterward, he played golf and pickup basketball. He made the social rounds at Springfield cocktail parties. He joined a weekly poker game with legislators and lobbyists in which the ante was a dollar or two.

One regular, former Democratic state senator Larry Walsh, said Obama was competitive yet careful -- and always hard to read.

"One night, we were playing and things weren't going very well for me," Walsh said. "I had a real good hand and Barack beat me out with another one. I slammed down my cards and said, 'Doggone it, Barack, if you were a little more liberal in your card playing and a little more conservative in your politics, you and I would get along a lot better.' "

The campaign finance effort came at the initiative of former U.S. senator Paul Simon (D-Ill.). A Republican and a Democrat in each legislative body were tapped to tighten a system that, among other things, allowed politicians to use campaign accounts for personal expenses.

Obama was given the job of representing Senate Democrats by state Sen. Emil Jones Jr., who chose him on the recommendation of Abner J. Mikva, a former judge and Democratic congressman.

"He was very aggressive when he first came to the Senate," said Jones, now president of the state Senate. "We were in the minority, but he said, 'I'd like to work hard. Any tough assignments or things you'd like me to be involved in, don't hesitate to give it to me.' "

Obama favored more ambitious changes in campaign law, including limits on contributions, but nipped and tucked in search of consensus.

"What impressed me about him was his ability in working with people of the opposite party," said Mike Lawrence, director of the Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University. "He had definite ideas about what ought to be contained in a campaign finance reform measure, but he also was willing to recognize that he was probably not going to get everything he wanted."

The result, according to good-government groups, was the most ambitious campaign reform in nearly 25 years, making Illinois one of the best in the nation on campaign finance disclosure.

Five years later, Obama waded into a complex capital-punishment debate after a number of exonerations persuaded then-Gov. George Ryan (R) to empty death row.

Obama wrote in his recent memoir that he thinks the death penalty "does little to deter crime." But he supports capital punishment in cases "so heinous, so beyond the pale, that the community is justified in expressing the full measure of its outrage by meting out the ultimate punishment."

In proposing changes, Obama met repeatedly with officials and advocates on all sides. He nudged and cajoled colleagues fearful of being branded soft on crime, as well as death-penalty opponents worried that any reform would weaken efforts to abolish capital punishment.

Obama's signature effort was a push for mandatory taping of interrogations and confessions. It was opposed by prosecutors, police organizations and Ryan's successor, Democrat Rod Blagojevich, who said it would impede investigators.

Working under the belief that no innocent defendant should end up on death row and no guilty one should go free, Obama helped get the bill approved by the Senate on a 58 to 0 vote. When Blagojevich reversed his position and signed it, Illinois became the first state to require taping by statute.

"Obviously, we didn't agree all the time, but he would always take suggestions when they were logical, and he was willing to listen to our point of view. And he offered his opinions in a lawyerly way," said Carl Hawkinson, the retired Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee. "When he spoke on the floor of the Senate, he spoke out of conviction. You knew that, whether you agreed with him or disagreed with him."

Obama paid a political price for missing an important vote on a crime package. That was during the 1999 Christmas holidays, as Obama -- who describes himself as suffering from "chronic restlessness" -- embarked on an ill-fated attempt to unseat Rep. Bobby Rush, a popular Chicago Democrat.

When the legislature was called into special session to vote on gun control, Obama and his family were visiting his grandmother in Hawaii. His 18-month-old daughter, Malia, was sick and unable to fly. The measure was narrowly defeated, and Rush criticized him. Obama lost by 31 points, his only electoral defeat.

"I take my legislative responsibilities extremely seriously," Obama said after the measure fell five votes short. "In the midst of a congressional race, I'm well aware of the potential risk of missing a vote, even if that vote doesn't wind up making the difference on a particular piece of legislation. But at some point, family has to come first."

Obama was a steady supporter of abortion rights, said Pam Sutherland, Planned Parenthood's chief lobbyist in Springfield, although he caught flak from the political left in 2004 as he ran for the U.S. Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0130070

The reason was a series of votes on such issues as late-term abortion and parental notification when Obama voted "present" instead of yea or nay. He said he was not tacking toward the center, but an opponent in the Democratic primary sent mailers portraying a rubber duck and proclaiming, "He ducked!"

Obama said his votes helped provide cover for other legislators. Sutherland said the votes were part of a strategy designed with Obama's help to deny Republicans easy campaign sound bites.

"The Republicans loved to put out legislation all the time that would put their opponents in a trick box during the elections," Sutherland said. "It was a strong statement to those who promoted bad legislation that we're not going to take this; you can't use this against us."

Obama To Skip Nevada Presidential Forum (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

AP, February 9, 2007

Democratic Presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., talks to reporters on Capitol Hill in Washington, Tuesday, Feb. 6, 2007, at the conclusion of a news conference on Iraq.

Wyoming Republican Party

Sen. Barack Obama is skipping a forum for Democratic presidential candidates in Nevada this month - his first opportunity to share a platform with his rivals for the 2008 nomination.

Seven other announced or expected Democratic candidates, including front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, have told organizers they will participate in the Feb. 21 forum in Carson City, Nev. It's the first such candidates forum of the 2008 presidential campaign.

Obama, who is scheduled to be in southern Nevada the same week, couldn't work the Nevada forum into his itinerary, campaign spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said.

"It was a difficult decision. He very much wants to spend time getting to know the people of Nevada, talking about how we move the country forward, but there are only so many days in the calendar," Pfeiffer said. "He has a vigorous Senate schedule, it makes it very difficult to do all things he wants to do."

Pfeiffer said Obama will campaign in the Las Vegas area on Feb. 18, but did not release details on the senator's schedule. Obama is scheduled to formally announce his candidacy Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

The Senate is not in session the week of the Carson City forum, which is sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and the Nevada Democratic Party.

"We're disappointed that Senator Obama chose not to attend the AFSCME forum, it will be a great opportunity for candidates to begin a dialogue with Nevada voters," said party spokeswoman Kirsten Searer.

Besides Clinton, a senator from New York, other Democrats who have confirmed their participation are: Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards, Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

WASHINGTON (AP) - The federal government will test and certify voting systems for the first time after the U.S. Election Assistance Commission approves the labs to conduct the tests.

The commission expects to approve two labs - Ibeta Quality Assurance and SysTest Labs - by the end of February. The federal testing and certification program would start by early March, elections officials said Thursday.

Up to four more labs could be considered later to help with the equipment testing.

The commission voted Thursday to end an interim program that was used for testing modifications to some voting systems.

"We will put our own stamp of approval on any voting equipment," commission chair Donetta Davidson said Thursday. "We're not grandfathering in equipment."

Voting machine companies and the counties that buy their hardware and software aren't required to participate, but many states require national certification.

A 2002 law, the Help America Vote Act, created the commission and said it should establish a testing and certification program for voting systems. Voting problems in the disputed 2000 election prompted the law.

Security of the voting equipment - both hardware and software - and access for the disabled will be top goals of the certification program, Davidson said.

Edwards Learns Campaign Blogs Can Cut 2 Ways (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130071

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8 — John Edwards learned the hard way this week of the perils of grafting the raucous culture of the Internet to the decidedly staider world of a presidential campaign.

Mr. Edwards announced on Thursday, after 36 hours of deliberation, that he would keep on his campaign staff two liberal feminist bloggers with long cybertrails of incendiary comments on sex, religion and politics.

Deliberations over the fate of the two bloggers, Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, created a crisis in Mr. Edwards's nascent campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 and illuminated the treacherous road ahead as candidates of both parties try to harness the growing power of the online world. The case of the two women had left Mr. Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, with difficult choices.

Mr. Edwards could keep the women on his staff and have to answer for the sometimes vulgar and intemperate writings posted on their personal blogs before he hired them late last month. He could dismiss them and face a revolt in the liberal blogosphere, which is playing an increasingly influential role in Democratic politics and could be especially important to his populist campaign. Some bloggers saw the controversy as manufactured by conservative groups.

Or, as Mr. Edwards did Thursday, he could keep the two bloggers on staff, but distance himself from their views.

In deciding to retain Ms. Marcotte and Ms. McEwan, he extracted public apologies from them for some of their work and a promise from them to maintain a civil tone while in his employ. Mr. Edwards stumbled into this minefield ahead of his rivals for the presidency, but many of the other candidates could face similar problems as they try to integrate the passionate, provocative and freewheeling political discourse that flourishes on the Internet into more tightly controlled means of traditional campaigning.

"This is all being made up as we go along," said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democrat Network, a political action organization that tries to serve as a bridge between traditional politics and the Wild West world of the Internet. "It is difficult to apply the old ways campaigns were run in the late 20th century to this new wide-open, citizen-led politics."

All the major presidential candidates in both parties have hired people with Internet experience to try to mine money and political support from the online community.

In a statement Thursday, Mr. Edwards distanced himself from the two bloggers' most inflammatory statements, which, he said, "personally offended me." He said that no one on his campaign would be allowed to use such intolerant language, even if intended as satire.

"But I also believe in giving everyone a fair shake," Mr. Edwards said in a statement. "I've talked to Amanda and Melissa; they have both assured me that it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

He also said he would not allow his campaign to be "hijacked" by religious conservatives who had pointed out the bloggers' most provocative comments and demanded their dismissal.

In some of their online writings, Ms. Marcotte and Ms. McEwan used vulgar language to characterize religious conservatives and Roman Catholic teachings on birth control, homosexuality and the virgin birth.

On her personal blog, Shakespeare's Sister, Ms. McEwan had referred to conservative Christians as "Christofascists." On the Pandagon blog site, Ms. Marcotte had said that the Catholic Church's prohibition on the use of birth control forced women to bear "more tithing Catholics."

This week, William A. Donohue, the president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, had called for Mr. Edwards to dismiss the women. Stunned to learn that he did not, Mr. Donohue said in an interview Thursday, "The bloggers are no longer the issue. Edwards is the issue."

The Edwards campaign released statements from the two women Thursday afternoon.

"My intention is never to offend anyone for his or her personal beliefs," Ms. Marcotte wrote, "and I am sorry if anyone was personally offended by writings meant only as criticisms of public politics."

Ms. McEwan said she did not expect Mr. Edwards to agree with everything she had ever written.

"It has never been my intention to disparage people's individual faith," Ms. McEwan said, "and I'm sorry if my words were taken in that way."

In a brief note on her personal blog on Wednesday, Ms. McEwan said that in the 2004 presidential election she had voted for Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who is a Roman Catholic, which she said was evidence that she was not anti-Catholic.

Ms. McEwan will serve as the Edwards campaign's so-called Netroots coordinator, in charge of outreach to the online community.

Neither woman responded to e-mail messages requesting further comment.

Jennifer Palmieri, a spokeswoman for Mr. Edwards, said he had not wanted to decide the women's fate without first speaking to them personally.

Asked whether the campaign had sufficiently screened the two women before they were hired, Ms. Palmieri said it was difficult to find and read every word a prolific blogger had written over a period of years.

Problems with bloggers have already bedeviled other campaigns. In last year's Democratic senatorial primary in Connecticut, some bloggers who supported Ned Lamont attacked his opponent, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, and one posted a picture of Mr. Lieberman in blackface.

Last summer, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, hired Patrick J. Hynes, a conservative blogger and political consultant, to be his campaign's blog liaison. Mr. Hynes quickly ran afoul of fellow bloggers by initially concealing his relationship to the McCain campaign while he was writing critically about other Republicans.

He then came under fire for declaring that the United States was a "Christian nation" in a book and television appearances that predated his work for Mr. McCain. Last November, while employed by Mr. McCain's campaign, Mr. Hynes posted on his personal blog a picture of Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, and invited readers to submit nicknames, some of which were anti-Semitic.

In an interview, Mr. Hynes said the Internet was a place where overheated language and vicious personal attacks were often tolerated, even encouraged. But, he said, "I would caution against holding candidates responsible for what their bloggers and blog consultants have said in the past."

"The blogosphere is a conversation; it's not reportage," Mr. Hynes said. "We're all trying to figure out, what does this mean for the convergence of all these media? It's a Pandora's box and no one knows where it's going to end up."

Mr. Hynes remained on the McCain campaign staff and maintained his personal blog.

Edwards To Retain Embattled Bloggers (WP/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards said Thursday he was personally offended by the provocative messages two of his campaign bloggers wrote criticizing the Catholic Church, but he's not going to fire them.

Edwards issued a statement and answered questions about the fate of Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, two days after the head of the conservative Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights demanded they be fired for messages they wrote before working on the campaign.

"I talked personally to the two women who were involved. They gave me their word they, under no circumstances, intended to denigrate any church or anybody's religion and offered their apologies for anything that indicated otherwise. I took them at their word," Edwards told reporters during a campaign stop in Charleston, S.C.

An angry Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, which counts 350,000 members, criticized Edwards for not firing the two bloggers. Donohue also promised a nationwide public relations campaign in newspapers, magazines and Catholic publications to tell voters what the candidate had done.

"When Mel Gibson got drunk and made anti-Semitic remarks, he paid a price for doing so. When Michael Richards got angry and made racist remarks, he paid a price for doing so. ... But John Edwards thinks the same rules don't apply to him, which is why he has chosen to embrace foul-mouthed, anti-Catholic bigots on his payroll," Donohue said.

Edwards has never met the two bloggers and his first conversation with them came when he called to discuss the uproar. The 2004 vice presidential nominee told reporters in South Carolina: "It will not happen again. That you can be sure of."

The campaign distributed written regrets from the two women, who stressed they were writing on personal blogs. Edwards said in the statement he believes in giving everyone a "fair shake."

On Tuesday, Donohue called for Edwards to fire the bloggers, citing posts that the women made in the past several months in which they criticized the church's opposition to homosexuality, abortion and contraception, sometimes using profanity.

"The tone and the sentiment of some of Amanda Marcotte's and Melissa McEwan's posts personally offended me," Edwards said in the statement. "Everyone is entitled to their opinion, but that kind of intolerant language will not be permitted from anyone on my campaign, whether it's intended as satire, humor or anything else."

The two were hired last week as part of Edwards' outreach to liberal voters and online activists.

Edwards spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said the campaign was aware that Marcotte and McEwan, like many bloggers, had written provocative postings on their personal sites. But the campaign had not read them all and had not seen the postings criticizing the church until Donohue put out a statement Tuesday, Palmieri said.

For instance, Marcotte had written that the church wants "to force women to bear more tithing Catholics" and McEwan had written that the pope is among those who "regularly speak out against gay tolerance." Other postings used more graphic language.

Edwards remained silent for two days as the controversy grew on the Internet. Most of those posting on liberal Web sites were calling for Edwards to keep the bloggers on staff and stand up to Donohue, and many were vowing to work against him if he didn't.

Donohue is a frequent critic of those who speak out against the church and what he calls "political correctness run amok," such as the separation of Christmas and the holiday season.

Donohue also doesn't shy from blunt language sometimes in his criticism of gays, Hollywood's control by "secular Jews who hate Christianity" and even the Edwards bloggers, whom he referred to as "brats" in an interview Wednesday on MSNBC.

Palmieri said Edwards had been traveling through Michigan, Missouri and Oklahoma and wanted time to discuss the bloggers' statements with them and weigh their future.

"We're dealing with people's careers and reputations and livelihoods," Palmieri said.

In her statement, McEwan said she doesn't expect Edwards to agree with everything she's posted, but they share "an unwavering support of religious freedom and a deep respect for diverse beliefs.

Marcotte's statement said her writings on religion on her blog, Pandagon, are generally satirical criticisms of public policies and politics.

Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, a nonprofit formed to highlight Catholic social justice teachings, also issued a statement condemning the bloggers' remarks but accepting Edwards' assurances that he was also offended.

"Catholics comprise more than one quarter of the U.S. public, and neither John Edwards nor any other candidate can afford to take this constituency for granted," said executive director Alexia Kelley, who served briefly as a religious adviser to 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry.

Edwards Blogger Flap Discomforts Religious Left (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 9, 2007

As the flap over alleged anti-Catholic writings by two John Edwards campaign bloggers devolves into a shouting match between conservative religious voices and liberal bloggers, some members of the "religious left" say they feel – again – shoved to the margins of the Democratic Party.

"We're completely invisible to this debate," said Eduardo Penalver, a Cornell University law professor who writes for the liberal Catholic journal Commonweal. He said he was dissatisfied with the Edwards campaign's response. "As a constituency, the Christian left isn't taken all that seriously," Penalver said.

Democrats -- and Edwards in particular -- have embraced the language of faith and the imperative of competing with Republicans for the support of religious voters. His wife, Elizabeth Edwards, even sits on the board of the leading organization of the religious left, Call to Renewal. But in private conversations and careful public statements today, religious Democrats said they felt sidelined by Edwards' decision to stand by his aides.

"We have gone so far to rebuild that coalition [between Democrats and religious Christians] and something like this sets it back," said Brian O'Dwyer, a New York lawyer and Irish-American leader who chairs the National Democratic Ethnic Leadership Council, a Democratic Party group. O'Dwyer said Edwards should have fired the bloggers. "It's not only wrong morally – it's stupid politically."

O'Dwyer e-mailed a statement to reporters saying: "Senator Edwards is condoning bigotry by keeping the two bloggers on his staff. Playing to the cheap seats with anti-Catholic bigotry has no place in the Democratic Party."

In a comment that several Catholic Democrats told The Politico they found particularly offensive, Edwards aide Amanda Marcotte asked, in a posting to her personal blog, "What if Mary had taken Plan B after the Lord filled her with his hot, white, sticky Holy Spirit?"

The other Edwards blogger, Melissa McEwan, has come under fire for referring to Christian conservatives as “Christofascists” in her personal blog.

Thursday, the campaign issued a statement from Edwards saying that he had been personally offended by the remarks and that the bloggers "have both assured me that it was never their intention to malign anyone's faith, and I take them at their word."

The campaign also sent out semi-apologetic statements from each blogger saying she was sorry if anyone was offended.

And so religious liberals find themselves in a quandary. They have no interest in associating with the likes of William Donohue, the Catholic League president who is closely aligned with the GOP and led the charge against Edwards' aides. Donohue said Thursday he would take out newspaper advertisements attacking Edwards as anti-Catholic. But religious liberals also think Edwards' aides merit more than a slap on the wrist.

“I thought his explanation was not satisfying," said Cornell's Penalver. "It's obvious that they did mean to give offense."

"You imagine a similar kind of comment directed at the Jewish community or at the gay community – something at this level of intentional offensiveness -- and I have a hard time believing it gets resolved in the same way," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130074

The Catholic Alliance, which stresses that fighting poverty and social injustice are Catholic values, sent out a careful public statement Thursday afternoon,

"We accept Senator Edwards' assurances that he too was offended by comments made by recently-hired staffers and that religious intolerance has no place in his campaign," the group's executive director, Alexia Kelley, said in the statement.

But in a mark of how religious Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts, Kelley also took a passing shot at Donohue in an interview.

She said she hoped that Donohue would hew to the Catholic value of forgiveness in forgiving the bloggers – as Donohue had notoriously forgiven Mel Gibson.

Edwards Gets It Right (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

What a difference two years makes! At this point in 2005, the only question seemed to be how much of America's social insurance system — the triumvirate of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid — the Bush administration would manage to dismantle. Now almost all prominent Democrats and quite a few Republicans pay at least lip service to calls for a major expansion of social insurance, in the form of universal health care.

But fine words, by themselves, mean nothing. Remember "compassionate conservatism?" I won't trust presidential candidates on health care unless they provide enough specifics to show both that they understand the issues, and that they're willing to face up to hard choices when necessary.

And former Senator John Edwards has just set a fine example.

At first glance, the Edwards health care plan looks similar to several other proposals out there, including one recently unveiled by Arnold Schwarzenegger in California. But a closer look reveals extra features in the Edwards plan that take it a lot closer to what the country really needs.

Like Mr. Schwarzenegger, Mr. Edwards sets out to cover the uninsured with a combination of regulation and financial aid. Right now, many people are uninsured because, as the Edwards press release puts it, insurance companies "game the system to cover only healthy people." So the Edwards plan, like Schwarzenegger's, imposes "community rating" on insurers, basically requiring them to sell insurance to everyone at the same price.

Many other people are uninsured because they simply can't afford the cost. So the Edwards plan, again like other proposals, offers financial aid to help lower-income families buy insurance. To pay for this aid, he proposes rolling back tax cuts for households with incomes over $200,000 a year.

Finally, some people try to save money by going without coverage, so if they get sick they end up in emergency rooms at public expense. Like other plans, the Edwards plan would "require all American residents to get insurance," and would require that all employers either provide insurance to their workers or pay a percentage of their payrolls into a government fund used to buy insurance.

But Mr. Edwards goes two steps further.

People who don't get insurance from their employers wouldn't have to deal individually with insurance companies: they'd purchase insurance through "Health Markets": government-run bodies negotiating with insurance companies on the public's behalf. People would, in effect, be buying insurance from the government, with only the business of paying medical bills — not the function of granting insurance in the first place — outsourced to private insurers.

Why is this such a good idea? As the Edwards press release points out, marketing and underwriting — the process of screening out high-risk clients — are responsible for two-thirds of insurance companies' overhead. With insurers selling to government-run Health Markets, not directly to individuals, most of these expenses should go away, making insurance considerably cheaper.

Better still, "Health Markets," the press release says, "will offer a choice between private insurers and a public insurance plan modeled after Medicare." This would offer a crucial degree of competition. The public insurance plan would almost certainly be cheaper than anything the private sector offers right now — after all, Medicare has very low overhead. Private insurers would either have to match the public plan's low premiums, or lose the competition.

And Mr. Edwards is O.K. with that. "Over time," the press release says, "the system may evolve toward a single-payer approach if individuals and businesses prefer the public plan."

So this is a smart, serious proposal. It addresses both the problem of the uninsured and the waste and inefficiency of our fragmented insurance system. And every candidate should be pressed to come up with something comparable.

DOJ_NMG_0130075

Yes, that includes Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton. So far, all we have from Mr. Obama is inspiring rhetoric about universal care — that's great, but how do we get there? And how do we know whether Mrs. Clinton, who says that she's "not ready to be specific," and that she wants to "build the consensus first," will really be willing to take on this issue again?

To be fair, these are still early days. But America's crumbling health care system is our most important domestic issue, and I think we have a right to know what those who would be president propose to do about it.

Clemons To Head Clinton's New Hampshire Campaign (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 9, 2007

MANCHESTER – As Democratic Presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton prepares for her first visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state tomorrow, her state campaign has its top staffer on board.

Clinton's campaign has hired New Hampshire Democratic Party executive director Nick Clemons as its state campaign director.

The hiring was first reported on UnionLeader.com yesterday afternoon.

Clemons, 33, of Portsmouth, has been party executive director since November 2004. He directed John Kerry's campaign in the state during the 2004 general election and was Kerry's field director during the New Hampshire primary campaign.

Clinton campaign national field director Karen Hicks called Clemons' hiring "a really good catch for us and I'm pleased that he is going to do it. He has the experience that allows us to hit the ground running." She called Clemons "one of the best political organizers in the state. He will bring a wealth of experience, a savvy and great set of contacts to the Clinton campaign."

Clemons said he was "excited at the opportunity to work for Senator Clinton. She's got a fantastic campaign team in place at the national level and here in New Hampshire."

State Democratic Chair Kathy Sullivan called Clemons "the best executive director in the country. He ran the most successful Democratic campaign in the country in 2006. He is very smart, and this is the best hire that Senator Clinton's campaign could have made. In addition to being a smart strategist, he also has an in-depth knowledge of New Hampshire. And he made me look really good!"

Sullivan said she intends to appoint an interim executive director pending approval of the party executive committee.

She is leaving her post in late March and said it will be up to the next party chairman to hire a new top party staffer.

Former President Clinton's Focus: Cooperation (DMN)

By Gromer Jeffers

The Dallas Morning News, February 9, 2007

GRAND PRAIRIE – Former President Bill Clinton on Thursday called on Americans to move from interdependence to an integrated society that focuses on security, diplomacy and improvements on such issues as health care and energy.

Mr. Clinton's speech, given at Nokia Theatre, was a sprawling lecture nearly devoid of politics.

He even refrained from discussing the presidential aspirations of his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

When the crowd of about 4,000 cheered when he referred to her, he told them, "The cause of your applause means I won't get to see her much in the next few months."

Mr. Clinton's speech focused on the United States' role in a modern global society.

His call for diplomacy and coalition building could have been a direct rebuttal to the war in Iraq. Although he said military force should always be an option for protecting a nation's interest, he added that war was a costly, sometimes incorrect action.

President Bush has been criticized for not developing a strong world alliance before going to war in Iraq.

"You've got to have more partners and fewer enemies," Mr. Clinton said during a speech that lasted just over an hour. "Then when you fight your enemies, you have a better chance to win."

Mr. Clinton said humanitarian aid to tsunami victims improved America's approval rating in Indonesia from 30 percent to well over 50 percent.

He said American aid helped change the minds of residents in the storm-ravaged country.

"They realized it was better to build than to tear down," Mr. Clinton said.

The former president called for the U.S. to develop a more efficient and affordable health-care system.

And, he said, businesses should find a way to develop and profit from cleaner energy.

"If I were young and going into business, I would get into clean energy and make a fortune," he said.

Mr. Clinton said many people in the U.S. – and the world – have benefited over the last century. But, he said, hundreds of millions remain poor, uneducated and unnecessarily ill.

"The modern world has been real good to me," he said. "But it is unequal, unstable and unsustainable."

Former President Clinton Urges Positive View (HC)

By Alexis Grant

Houston Chronicle, February 9, 2007

Telling Rice students "there's plenty of doing that needs done," former President Clinton on Thursday encouraged them to help steer the country in a positive direction while taking a global view of today's challenges.

"Private citizens have more power to do good in public areas than ever before," he said. "People with no money at all who can just give a little bit have the chance to change the world if they all agree on the same thing at the same time."

The Autry Court speech, sponsored by Rice University's Baker Institute for Public Policy, was attended by about 4,000 students and faculty.

"It was a very good message to Rice students because we really consider ourselves active in trying to change the world," said Matthew Broussard, 18, a mechanical engineering student.

Clinton also emphasized the importance of what he calls global interdependence.

In just over an hour that included a brief Q&A period, he talked about the need for new energy sources and better health care around the world, explained his philosophy on holding developing countries to certain standards while providing financial aid, and backed the two-term limit for presidents.

"You do have to have a security policy, but building a world with more partners and fewer terrorists is always cheaper than going to war," he said.

Clinton, who sometimes pulls in more than $100,000 for an appearance, according to published reports, spoke at Rice for free. He owed a favor to James A. Baker III, former secretary of state and founder of the institute, said Rice University spokesman Franz Brotzen.

But Clinton, whose wife is expected to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, joked that he had other reasons for visiting the university. He alluded to Baker's prominent role in the 2000 presidential recount in Florida that gave Republican George W. Bush the presidency over Al Gore.

"I got the biggest speaker's fee I've ever received," Clinton said. "Not one red cent. But I got Jim Baker's solemn promise that in the event of an election challenge in 2008, he will not represent the Republican nominee for president."

Williams Can't Duck Campaign Pushes (WT)

By Robert Stacy McCain

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Conservative economist Walter E. Williams says he's flattered at being urged to seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- even if the draft committee is headed by a cartoon duck.

The "Mallard Fillmore" comic strip has spent the past two weeks promoting the George Mason University economics professor as a 2008 candidate -- with some success, judging from Mr. Williams' e-mail in-box.

"I've been inundated," the 70-year-old Mr. Williams said of responses to cartoonist Bruce Tinsley's strip, which has prominently featured Mr. Williams' e-mail address (wwilliam@gmu.edu). "I've only gotten one or two ugly [e-mails], and I've gotten hundreds" of positive messages.

A popular syndicated columnist who often fills in for Rush Limbaugh when the top talk-radio host is on vacation, Mr. Williams said in a telephone interview that he was surprised when Mr. Tinsley began a series of "Draft Walter Williams" cartoons Jan. 29.

"I found it very funny, and I found it quite flattering as well," said Mr. Williams, whose column appears in The Washington Times, as does the "Mallard Fillmore" strip.

The idea for the series was simple, Mr. Tinsley said: Mr. Williams is "an actual conservative, and who better to run for elective office than somebody who's been writing his ideas down for us to read for years? He can't waffle. Also, Adam Smith and Bill Buckley weren't available."

Like many other conservatives, the Indiana-based cartoonist said he's less than enthusiastic about the current crop of Republican presidential contenders.

"Philosophical conservatives are tired of 'moderates,' who try to be all things to all people and end up pandering to those who wouldn't vote for them in a million years," Mr. Tinsley said in an e-mail. "Reagan was genuinely conservative, take it or leave it. And it worked."

While Mr. Tinsley said "maybe" he (and his cartoon alter-ego, Mallard) could support former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, he said he was disappointed that Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, "has said unequivocally that he's not interested" in a 2008 White House bid.

DOJ_NMG_0130077

"But I believe him, since he's one of the few legislators who seems to consistently mean what he says," Mr. Tinsley said.

Right now, however, Mr. Tinsley says he's "not giving up" on his campaign to promote the candidacy of Mr. Williams.

The George Mason professor says he shares Mr. Tinsley's disdain for career politicians.

"I personally think that if we chose the president of the United States at random, we'd get a better president than any president since Ronald Reagan," said Mr. Williams.

Mr. Williams' own '08 favorite is Rep. Ron Paul, Texas Republican and a 1988 Libertarian Party presidential nominee, who last month announced the formation of an exploratory committee.

"If the framers of the Constitution were somehow to come back, Ron Paul is one of possibly only three people in Congress that they'd even talk to," said Mr. Williams, adding that most politicians have a "generalized contempt" for the values of the Constitution.

The biggest obstacle to his own candidacy, Mr. Williams said, is his wife of 47 years, Conchetta.

"She said that if I ever thought about it seriously, she'd assassinate me," he said.

While his age (he'll turn 71 next month) might seem a problem to a presidential run, Mr. Williams says he is in excellent health, thanks to a regimen that includes a personal trainer, bicycling, two glasses of wine each day -- and smoking half a pack of cigarettes daily. "My grandfather smoked a pack of Camels a day, drank almost a half-pint of Old Grandad every day and died when he was 94," he said.

Though he has no plans for trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, Mr. Williams would not completely rule out a 2008 run for the White House.

"I've learned that one should always keep his options open," he said. "You should never say never, but I haven't gone to the trouble of forming an exploratory committee."

Lawmakers Closer To Moving Up Florida's Presidential Primary (AP)

By Stephen Majors

AP, February 9, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. - Defying national Republican and Democratic party threats, Florida lawmakers in a House committee Thursday unanimously approved a proposal to hold the state's presidential primary as early as January.

If the bill (HB 537) becomes law, Florida's primary - currently in March, when it's virtually irrelevant - would take place either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. That would mean Florida's 2008 contest could be in late January or earlier. New Hampshire's secretary of state is waiting to schedule the primary until other states set theirs, to preserve its first-in-the-nation status. National Democrats have recommended that New Hampshire hold its primary Jan. 22.

An identical bill has been filed in the Senate.

With states around the country, including California, jockeying for position to challenge the traditional dominance of the Iowa Caucus and the New Hampshire primary, Florida legislators on both sides of the aisle don't want to be left behind. They believe a state as large and diverse as Florida should play a fundamental role in the nomination process.

And they believe candidates would then have to pay more attention to Florida's needs - such as the idea of a national hurricane catastrophe fund, which Florida supports but has so far failed to gain traction nationally.

The national parties want to prevent a nationwide arms race for the earliest primary. Both parties could punish states like Florida that move their primary earlier than Feb. 5 by taking away delegates to the nominating convention. The Democratic Party could even punish candidates who campaign or advertise in states that move their primaries earlier than Feb. 5 by essentially keeping them from getting the state's vote.

Those threats pale in comparison to the influence Florida could gain, the bill's sponsor, Rep. David Rivera, R-Miami, told the House Ethics and Elections Committee.

"I think that having 67 less individuals attend five days in Minneapolis is a very, very small price to pay to increase Florida's relevance on the national stage," said Rivera, referring to the number of Florida Republican delegates that could be lost at the site of the 2008 Republican National Convention.

Rep. Dan Gelber, D-Miami Beach, the House Democratic leader, said Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called him to say the move could have consequences. But Gelber said it wouldn't make sense to punish Democrats for the actions of a Republican-controlled Legislature. Florida Democratic Party Chair Karen Thurman also wrote the House committee members in a letter, warning them not to push the primary any earlier than Feb. 5 to avoid potential backlash.

"I don't have any constituents in the DNC," Gelber said. "I only have constituents in my district. They would like to be more relevant."

According to a recent Quinnipiac University poll of 1,003 Florida voters, 46 percent of those surveyed said they wanted to move up the primary, compared to 36 percent opposed to it, and 19 percent unsure.

DOJ_NMG_0130078

Lawmakers and some experts think the national parties are bluffing, and would never take away a candidate's delegates if it meant hurting a party's chances overall in a national election.

Some committee members expressed concern that giving a state the size of Florida a greater say earlier in the nominating process could shut out presidential hopefuls with less money.

"I think we should all recognize that money does have too much (influence), and that's problematic," said Rep. Keith Fitzgerald, D-Sarasota. "I don't think the balance of that argument ... weighs against this."

Good For NH, Bad For Everybody Else (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 9, 2007

MANCHESTER – Actions by officials in various states to move up their presidential nominating primaries or caucuses to early dates to compete with the first-in-the-nation New Hampshire primary will backfire, the state's Democratic and Republican chairmen say.

"Everything like this that happens is just making New Hampshire more important," Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan said yesterday. "The more states that move up, the more important we become and, ironically, the less important they become because there will be so many of them."

"I agree completely," said state Republican Chairman Fergus Cullen. "These other states will just cannibalize themselves."

Sullivan said New Hampshire "will have the best primary ever, but we will have the worst process nationally" because the post-New Hampshire "front-loading" will likely have the nominees chosen by the first week of February 2008 and leave no time for debates across the nation among candidates of either party.

"As a New Hampshire person, this doesn't upset me," she said. "But as an American, having all these states move up is appalling."

Cullen added, "This front-loading makes New Hampshire yet more important but it's bad for the process and bad for democracy."

In 2004, seven states held primaries or caucuses a week after New Hampshire's primary. Other states spread out their primaries and caucuses through late winter and spring.

It's unclear today how the 2008 calendar will end up, but it appears that if the New Hampshire primary is held on Jan. 22 - and that has not been determined - there could be as many as 16 states holding primaries or caucuses either the following week or two weeks after New Hampshire.

In the latest developments, Florida lawmakers are quickly moving bipartisan legislation that would jump that's state's primary - currently in March - to either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. Wyoming Republicans voted to hold county conventions on the same day as the New Hampshire primary, regardless of when it is held. Wyoming Democrats are skeptical of breaking their national party's rule by jumping up the date of their conventions.

Large states such as California, New Jersey and Michigan are on the list of states that have either moved, or are on the verge of moving, caucuses or primaries to within two weeks of New Hampshire, while officials in Illinois are talking seriously about it as well.

Will candidates be forced to spend less time in New Hampshire and, as a result, diminish its importance to the nominating process? Sullivan doesn't think so.

"As more and more chaos is created in the calendar," she said, "the two known stable states that everyone knows are going to be early are Iowa and New Hampshire."

The Democratic National Committee wants Nevada to hold a caucus between Iowa and New Hampshire, and candidates are going to Nevada to campaign.

But neither national party holds any influence over when the New Hampshire primary date is set. Only Secretary of State William M. Gardner can do that under the authority given to him by a state law mandating the primary be held at least seven days before any "similar election." He has strongly indicated he will set the date of the primary ahead of Nevada, and possibly even Iowa's leadoff caucus, under what he considers a broad authority granted to him in the law to protect the primary's traditional status and influence on the nominating process.

Bill ensures primary power

Gardner could not be reached yesterday, but Deputy Secretary of State David Scanlan said: "This is the same story that just gets repeated every time a state tries something. There is really nothing new in the latest moves."

Scanlan said that Gardner "will set the date when he thinks the time is appropriate and he will set the date in accordance with state law."

Sullivan noted that as long as other states stay at least a week behind New Hampshire, "that would not violate the letter of our law. We could have Iowa and New Hampshire and 48 other states."

DOJ_NMG_0130079

Nevada is the only state at the moment that could trigger the law. It is unclear what Gardner would do about Wyoming. The question there will be whether elections of county convention delegates would constitute a "similar election."

Cullen agrees with Gardner's strategy. He also said New Hampshire's primary is a nationally recognized event not only because it is first.

"It's also that we're a small state where candidates can meet voters one-on-one," he said. "Florida can hold a primary in December and it wouldn't be a place where candidates can do that."

The rush to the front by a dozen or more states shows the national parties "have lost all control," Sullivan said. "Instead of focusing on a process that would have given all 50 states an important say in who the nominees are," she said, "they created chaos. There is clearly a lack of respect for the national party rules."

A Republican Florida lawmaker scoffed at the notion that his state would lose delegates at the national convention if Florida holds a primary outside of the party rules.

"I think that having 67 less individuals attend five days in Minneapolis is a very, very small price to pay to increase Florida's relevance on the national stage," said Rep. David Rivera, R-Miami, referring to the number of Florida Republican delegates that could be lost at the site of the 2008 Republican National Convention.

Sullivan found the Florida GOP situation especially interesting because U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida is the new national Republican chairman, "and he apparently can't control his own party in his own state."

But she did not give Democratic National Chairman Howard Dean a pass, saying that "both national parties are at fault here."

She suggested that the candidates themselves now "step up and use their influence over their supporters, who are officials in these states, and say, 'Stop!'"

In Florida, a House committee yesterday unanimously approved a proposal to push the state's presidential primary to late January.

If the bill becomes law, Florida's primary would take place either seven days after New Hampshire's, or on Feb. 5, whichever comes first. New Hampshire has not set its date. An identical bill has been filed in the Senate.

Florida legislators on both sides of the aisle don't want to be left behind. They believe a state as large and diverse as Florida should play a fundamental role in the nomination process.

And they believe candidates would then have to pay more attention to Florida's needs - such as the idea of a national hurricane catastrophe fund.

Rep. Dan Gelber, D-Miami Beach, the House Democratic leader, said Dean called him to say the move could have consequences. But Gelber said it wouldn't make sense to punish Democrats for the actions of a Republican-controlled Legislature. Florida Democratic Party Chairman Karen Thurman also wrote the House committee members a letter warning them not to push the primary any earlier than Feb. 5 to avoid potential backlash.

"I don't have any constituents in the DNC," Gelber said. "I only have constituents in my district. They would like to be more relevant."

Primary Madness (WP)

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

BY THIS TIME next year, the races for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations are likely to be over. Bemoaning the front-loaded primary calendar has become a quadrennial event, but this campaign could be more speeded up than ever and even less healthful for the democratic process. Under the plan, the Democrats' 2008 sprint starts with caucuses in Iowa (Jan. 14) and Nevada (Jan. 19), followed by primaries in New Hampshire (Jan. 22) and South Carolina (Jan. 29). New Hampshire, angry that its first-in-the-nation status is being threatened, could jump the starting gun and move its contest even earlier, to 2007.

But the worst news is that a number of larger states, including California, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Illinois, are considering moving their primaries to Feb. 5, the first permissible date for other states to hold contests. On the part of each individual state, this is a rational act: Why should voters from smaller states determine the outcome while big-state voters are shut out? But the overall result will be a worsening of all the ill effects of front-loading, and for both parties: In most states, the Republican primary is held the same day.

Front-loading benefits better-known candidates with big bank accounts more than it does dark horses who might be able to do well and gain momentum in a more rationally paced system. It deprives most voters in most states of having a say in who their party's nominee will be. It short-circuits a process that could test candidates' capacities for connecting with voters and conveying their views.

The Democratic National Committee has tried to bribe states into waiting by offering them bonus delegates for going later, but this doesn't seem likely to work. As a result, for 2008, there's not much to do about this state of affairs other than lament it. Regarding 2012, now is the time for both parties to get together on a reform. Because Republicans will set their rules for 2012 at the 2008 convention, the parties' consultation needs to happen soon.

The National Association of Secretaries of State has proposed a calendar that would allow Iowa and New Hampshire to go first, followed by four regional primaries held every month from March through June. The regions would rotate their positions on the primary calendar each cycle. We supported the plan in 2000, when it seemed the process couldn't become much crazier. Now, when that campaign looks measured and sedate by the light-speed standards of 2008, we agree more than ever.

Three Vulnerables Buck Parties; Loyal Sununu, Smith Under Fire (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Vulnerable Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Mary Landrieu (D-La.) spent much of the 110th Congress's first month burnishing their centrist credentials, while other 2008 targets largely have stuck by their parties thus far, according to a review of Senate roll call votes by The Hill.

Coleman and Collins capped off a month of bucking their party by voting to move forward with debate on legislation critical of President Bush's proposed troop increase in Iraq. Sens. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) and John Sununu (R-N.H.), meanwhile, are drawing heat for standing with their party on the vote.

Coleman and Collins were the only two Republicans to vote for cloture, and they also teamed up on three other close roll call votes. The two voted with Democrats on amendments to consider Indian tribes as corporations for political-giving purposes and to ban family from campaign and political action committees, as well as on cloture to increase the federal minimum wage.

On the other side of the aisle, Landrieu, widely considered the most vulnerable Democratic senator, voted with Republicans on those amendments and two others, to the ethics bill. One of the amendments allowed for pre-approved travel paid for by 501(c) 3 groups; the other struck a provision related to grassroots lobbying.

The only Democrat to vote with Republicans more frequently was Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), regarded as the most centrist Democrat in the Senate. For Republicans, only Collins's Maine colleague, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R), approached Coleman's and Collins's independent streaks.

Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said the departure of Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) from the chamber has left a void waiting to be filled at the left reaches of the Republican Party, and Collins and Snowe are the most likely candidates to fill it. Coleman and Landrieu, she said, have gradually built on their centrist credentials in recent months.

"They're up for reelection; they're not going to take one for the team right now," Duffy said.

Other vulnerable Republicans largely have voted the party line in 2007. Smith and Sununu joined with Democrats a few times during the ethics bill debate, but both are weathering criticism for not voting for cloture on the Iraq debate.

Liberal activist group MoveOn.org has spent $140,000 on ad buys nationwide and locally in Oregon and New Hampshire criticizing Smith, Sununu and others for their votes, and Democrats smell blood.

Smith has been a focal point in the Iraq war discourse since his impassioned post-election speech against how the war is being waged, and he opposes the troop increase.

Priding himself as an independent Republican, he broke away from his party at several points on the ethics debate. But Iraq remains at the forefront, and Democrats see potential fodder in his vote against cloture.

At the same time, explaining the vote to voters poses a challenge for Democrats, and if the resolutions do get to a vote, Smith likely will weigh in more clearly. On Wednesday, he was one of seven senators, including Coleman and Collins, to sign a letter pledging to bring Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) anti-increase resolution to a vote — a move the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) labeled "hypocrisy."

"Voters will do addition and subtraction; they won't do algebra. And cloture votes are algebra," a West Coast Democratic consultant, Jim Ross, said. "You have to say, 'This guy opposed the bill,' and make him defend his action."

Smith spokesman R.C. Hammond said the MoveOn ads deceive voters because Smith wanted to vote on all of the Iraq resolutions.

"Sen. Smith opposes the troop surge, and he's helped draft the consensus Warner resolution," Hammond said. "Oregonians know who's against the troop surge, and they know that the advertising is misleading."

Sununu, who along with Snowe and Collins is of a waning breed as a Northeastern Republican, voted with Democrats even less frequently than Smith. Formerly red New Hampshire experienced perhaps the largest Democratic swing in November, seeing about a quarter of its state legislature flip and its two Republican House members fall.

Sununu has not gone as far as others to separate himself from Iraq and did not sign the letter on Warner's resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0130081

A political science professor at Manchester, N.H.'s Saint Anselm College, Dante Scala, said Sununu needs to work on billing himself as New Hampshire's senator rather than the Republicans' senator — "what [Sen.] Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) does so well" — by finding non-GOP issues with which to identify himself.

"He's not going to become [Sen.] Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) or something," Scala said, referring to the most ardently anti-Iraq GOP senator. "I don't think anybody would buy that."

The DSCC also attacked Sununu Wednesday, charging him with evasiveness on Iraq: "Sununu may try to run from his blind support for the war in Iraq, but he won't be able to flee voters next election," DSCC spokeswoman Deirdre Murphy said.

Sununu has avoided speaking on the issue of late and his office did not return requests for comment.

Red-state Democrats who could face strong challenges in 2008, such as Sens. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), largely stuck with their party. Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) voted with Republicans on some amendments to the ethics bill.

Warner, who is up in 2008, voted with the Democrats on cloture for the minimum-wage bill.

Less Is More, But In Idaho, Not For Long (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

BOISE, Idaho, Feb. 2 — When Gov. C. L. Otter took office last month and immediately halted construction work on the state Capitol his objections went beyond the $130 million price tag for the renovation and addition.

"My concern is also about the expansion of government," said Mr. Otter, a Republican. "When you have more space, bureaucracy doesn't like an empty office. It creates a vacuum. It sucks people into it, and all of a sudden you've got to have more people."

The governor has since reached a deal with the Republican-controlled Legislature to cut the project in half, allowing construction to go forward, although not until the new individual offices for legislators are removed from the blueprints.

Yet if Mr. Otter won this round, he might well savor the moment because Idaho's government is growing whether or not government buildings grow with it.

In a conservative state that has long viewed government with suspicion, that still means conflict. But even the governor's fellow Republicans concede that the momentum here shifted years ago from bait-and-bullet to New West boutique. As with so many other decreasingly rugged places in the inland West, there is more of everybody in Idaho now: techies, Democrats, immigrants, environmentalists. Ten thousand people showed up at Boise State University last month to hear Al Gore talk about global warming. Ten thousand people. To hear Al Gore. In Idaho.

The state's population, almost 1.5 million, is up nearly 50 percent since 1990 and some projections show it gaining another 50 percent or more by 2020.

While the growth has brought a sophisticated new economy, it has also brought demands for more spending on education and transportation and concerns about high taxes, too much development and a trampled environment.

And a ton more government.

In 1991, the state budget was $900 million. This year it is $2.6 billion. In 1985, there were 11,876 state employees. In 2005, there were 17,528.

In 1985, the number of pages of legislation passed was 759. Last year it was 1,581.

The public spaces where many of the issues are aired, however, are the same small hearing rooms, some with a single row of chairs for the public, where part-time lawmakers and a few interested stakeholders once wrangled largely over matters of mining, farming and logging.

Now, although the Legislature is still part-time, people squeeze into the back of hearing rooms, huddle in doorways or crowd around speakers that broadcast committee discussions out into the rotunda. (The volume dial on the speaker outside one hearing room was turned all the way up to 10 this week.)

"It was designed to not have very much public participation in the process," Speaker of the House Lawerence E. Denney said of the Capitol.

While there now are more citizens who follow the Legislature, more people are paid to participate as well. About 75 lobbyists were members of the Idaho Legislative Advisors when Jan Eyth first started serving coffee and snacks in the group's tiny lounge on the Capitol's fourth floor in 1985. Now, Ms. Eyth said, there are more than 150 members, and there are more than 300 registered lobbyists in the state.

Still, some say, interpret this change carefully.

"You know what lobbyists are?" said Russell Westerberg, a lobbyist from Soda Springs who came to Boise as a state representative in 1975. "They're the people that the people have to pay to protect them from the people that they elected." He added, "It's still Idaho; the government that governs least, governs best."

DOJ_NMG_0130082

The Capitol, in which a light-filled rotunda is lined with bright marble, once housed the Legislature, the governor's office, the Supreme Court and even a mineral laboratory. Now, some key offices, including parts of the secretary of state's office, are hidden in windowless corners of the basement or they have moved out.

The state spends $13 million a year renting about 900,000 square feet of private office space.

All of that eventually prevailed upon Mr. Otter, to a degree. Under the compromise with the Legislature, which had approved the expansion a year ago, new underground wings will be reduced in size and many new offices will be cut. Larger hearing rooms will be built, however, and renovations at the Capitol will go forward.

Still, neither side claims to be happy with the deal, and no one is certain whether much money will be saved. The commission overseeing the project has asked to see a revised budget before moving forward. That could take weeks.

In the meantime, as the Legislature debates lowering grocery taxes, restricting elk ranching and building a new prison, it also is preparing to move out of the Capitol.

The Legislature, which had planned to hold its 2008 and 2009 sessions in temporary quarters in two aging buildings, including the former Ada County Courthouse, now probably will be there through the 2010 session because of the delays in construction.

The governor, whose office on the second floor of the Capitol has one of the few fireplaces in the building, says the state should renovate the older buildings and use them permanently for offices. Under the compromise, he agreed to move some of his staff out of the Capitol.

Mr. Otter, a former three-term congressman, took few specific stands in his campaign for governor last fall, but he did run commercials saying the expansion project was wasteful. He said he would "run government the old-fashioned way, lean and smart." Back then, he said he would rather spend the expansion money, more than $40 million of the overall amount, on education and other needs.

In an interview in his office on Friday, he popped up from his chair to retrieve photographs of a schoolyard cluttered with temporary classrooms. Then he showed a picture of the state Capitol in Texas, whose underground expansion wings were a model for the Idaho plan.

"This is where they want kids to spend nine months," Mr. Otter said. "This is where they want to spend three months."

Senator Robert L. Geddes, who is the president pro tem and one of the leaders of the expansion project, conceded that legislators could only put up so much of a fight, even in a changing state.

"The vision of a grandiose Taj Mahal being built for the comfort of me," Mr. Geddes said, "that doesn't sit real well in my conservative district."

The A.B.A.'s Judicial Ethics Mess (NYT)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

At a moment when judicial independence is under heightened political attack, the nation's legal establishment should be doing everything it can to shore up public trust. Instead, the special commission charged with recommending revisions to the Model Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association has been flip-flopping around on some of the most important aspects of the code, which the states use to set standards for their courts.

For decades, the code's overarching charge to judges has been to avoid not only actual impropriety, but also the appearance of impropriety. Recently, however, quietly adopted changes to the commission's "final" report demoted this gold standard of judicial conduct from an enforceable rule to a mere aspirational guideline.

When the misguided switch came to light, the panel reversed field again yesterday and went back to the previous formulation. But that does not excuse the fact that the panel was following internal politics, not sound legal principle. The change might have eluded pubic attention if Robert Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct, had not protested and Adam Liptak had not reported on the matter in The Times this week.

Mark Harrison, chairman of the flailing ethics panel, claimed just days ago that the "appearance of impropriety" standard was vague and unfair. But judges interpret rules like that all the time, and the Conference of Chief Justices, made up of top state judges, unanimously endorsed the appearance of impropriety as a basis for disciplinary enforcement.

Despite yesterday's news, the proposed code revisions have serious deficiencies. They fall well short of ending the festering scandal of expense-paid judicial seminars that are held at desirable resorts and underwritten by private interests . If the House of Delegates lacks the resolve to ban these junkets, it should at least limit reimbursements for accompanying spouses. There should be no free rides or free lunches (or breakfasts or dinners).

The rules on when a judge must bow out of hearing cases also need work. At the federal level, judges must recuse themselves when they have any financial interest raising a potential conflict. That is far preferable to the model code's approach of letting state judges decide for themselves whether their financial conflict is minimal enough to stay on a case.

DOJ_NMG_0130083

There is a real danger in relying on this commission's judgment. Members of the A.B.A.'s House of Delegates are supposed to vote on the new code next week in Miami. Their wisest course would be to defer the issue, at least until the group's next meeting in August. In the meantime, the president of the bar should appoint an independent committee of experts to review all of the provisions and make their own assessment of what is really needed.

Iran To Hit U.S. Interests If Attacked (WP)

By William Branigin

Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Iran's supreme leader warned today that any U.S. attack on his country would trigger Iranian retaliation against U.S. interests "around the world."

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei issued the threat as Iran's Revolutionary Guards carried out military exercises in the Persian Gulf that included the test-firing of anti-ship missiles with a range of more than 200 miles.

The missiles "can hit different kinds of big warships in all of the Persian Gulf, all of the Sea of Oman and the north of the Indian Ocean," senior Revolutionary Guards naval commander Ali Fadavi told Iran's state-run television. The missile tests were staged on the second day of exercises by Iranian naval and air force units in the Gulf as a second U.S. aircraft carrier headed toward the waterway.

Fadavi said the missiles can carry warheads of about 1,100 pounds and have a maximum range of 220 miles. He did not identify the missiles or elaborate on the results of the tests.

President Bush last month ordered an aircraft carrier strike group headed by the USS John C. Stennis to sail for the Gulf to join the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower, a carrier that deployed in the Gulf in December. The dispatch of the second carrier group has been portrayed in part as a show of force to Iran, which the United States accuses of meddling in Iraq and of pursuing nuclear weapons.

Addressing a gathering of Iranian air force officers, Khamenei, who holds the title of "supreme leader" in Iran's Shiite Muslim theocracy, said, "The enemies know well that any aggression will lead to a reaction from all sides in the Iranian nation on the aggressors and their interests around the world." In remarks broadcast on Iranian state television, he said of the prospect of an attack, "We believe that no one will make such an unwise and wrong move that would endanger their country and interests."

Khamenei continued, "Some say that the U.S. president is not the type who acts based on calculations or thinks about the consequences of his action. But even these people can be brought to their senses." He said U.S. policymakers know that Iran "would not let an invasion go without a response."

Another top Iranian cleric, former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, made similar remarks today in the Shiite holy city of Qom, warning that any military attack on Iran "would be very costly for the United States," the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. He said it was unlikely that Washington would "take such a stupid action," IRNA reported. Rafsanjani, who currently chairs a powerful consultative group called the Expediency Council, charged that the United States "wishes to see a dependent Iran and avoids considering Iran as a regional or global power," IRNA reported.

In Washington, the White House dismissed the threats, saying that the United States has no intention of launching a war against Iran.

"Khamenei from time to time makes these unprovoked statements, and we would certainly hope they are not directed at the United States because President Bush has made it clear we have no intention of going to war with Iran," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, [a wire service] news agency reported.

He also played down the missile tests, saying that the Iranians "run various exercises from time to time in the Persian Gulf" and that "we monitor those exercises."

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters that the administration does not see the tests "as a direct assault on our ships."

In response to Khamenei's warning, Snow said, "I've said it, the secretary of defense has said it, the president has said it: We're not invading Iran." He said Khamenei is "spinning a hypothetical about something that is not contemplated."

President Bush said last week that he has no intention of sending U.S. forces into Iran, but he vowed to "respond firmly" if Iran steps up a campaign that the United States charges is aimed at killing U.S. troops and derailing democracy in Iraq. Bush said he would do "whatever it takes" to protect U.S. troops in Iraq from what the White House says have been attacks with weapons supplied by Iran.

Washington is also locked in a dispute with Iran over the country's nuclear program, notably its efforts to enrich uranium in defiance of a U.N. Security Council resolution. The United States regards the program as a cover for developing nuclear weapons. Iran denies any such aim, insisting that it is building nuclear power plants only to generate electricity and that it wants to control its own nuclear fuel cycle.

DOJ_NMG_0130084

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said yesterday that he plans to discuss the nuclear issue with Western counterparts on the sidelines of a Feb. 9-11 security conference being held in Munich. The talks would be the first since the U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran in December, prohibiting the transfer of nuclear material and know-how to Iran. The council also gave Iran until Feb. 21 to suspend its enrichment program, but Tehran has shown no sign of acceding to that demand.

The State Department said U.S. officials have no plans to meet with Larijani in Munich and that Iran must stop its uranium enrichment program as a prerequisite for any direct talks.

Larijani and other Iranian officials have accused the United States of involvement in the kidnapping Sunday of an Iranian diplomat in Baghdad. The diplomat, identified as Jalal Sharafi, a second secretary at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad, was seized by a group of about 30 armed men, IRNA reported.

U.S. officials deny any role in the abduction, which may have been part of Iraq's growing sectarian violence pitting minority Sunni Muslim Arabs against Iraq's majority Shiites. Sunnis have charged that Iraqi Shiite leaders are beholden to Iran. In the 1980s, Iraq, then ruled by Saddam Hussein, fought a brutal eight-year war with Iran. The war ended in stalemate after Iranian forces managed to repel an Iraqi invasion aimed at gaining control of Iran's southwestern oil fields.

Iran's Leader Warns The U.S. About Carrying Out Any Attack (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 8 — Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned the United States on Thursday that Iran would retaliate against American interests worldwide if it was attacked. It was the latest volley in an escalating war of rhetoric between the countries.

Speaking to a group of air force commanders about rumors of an imminent American military strike, Ayatollah Khamenei said, "Iranian people should not get scared of such issues," the Iranian Student News Agency reported. "Our enemies know very well that any aggression will have a response from all sides by Iranian people on their interests all over the world."

He added, "No one would commit such a blunder and jeopardize the interests of his country and people."

Iran's Revolutionary Guards also said Thursday that as part of a war games exercise, they had successfully test-fired a land-to-sea missile capable of sinking large warships.

"These missiles, with a maximum range of 220 miles, can hit different kinds of big warships throughout the Persian Gulf, the Sea of Oman and the northern Indian Ocean," Ali Fadavi, a senior Revolutionary Guards naval commander, said on state television.

The speech by Ayatollah Khamenei was his first major public appearance since the United Nations Security Council approved limited sanctions on Dec. 23 because of Iran's refusal to halt efforts to enrich uranium. The United States and some European countries accuse Iran of having a secret weapons program, but Iran contends that its nuclear development is for peaceful purposes only.

Ayatollah Khamenei did not mention Iran's nuclear program, but he brushed off the sanctions as insignificant. "The United States and some other countries have imposed sanctions on Iran for many years now," he said. "But we achieved great scientific and technological progress under such circumstances. So they cannot scare this great nation with sanctions."

Ayatollah Khamenei also dismissed rumors that he was suffering from a serious illness, saying they were aimed at weakening the resolve of the Iranian people.

The war games by Iran, the second it has staged this year, seemed to be a response to the naval buildup by the United States in the Persian Gulf. President Bush has dispatched two aircraft carriers to the region and provided antimissile batteries to some Persian Gulf states.

In Seville, Spain, where Robert M. Gates, the American defense secretary, met Thursday with NATO defense ministers, he seemed to play down the significance of the strong language from Iran.

"My impression is that they make threats like this from time to time," Mr. Gates said. "We have no intention of attacking Iran."

He noted that, "obviously, when it comes to things like these tests, we watch them closely." But he concluded, "Other than that, I think, it's just another day in the Persian Gulf."

A special envoy for the ayatollah met in Moscow on Thursday with President Valdimir V. Putin and his national security adviser, Igor S. Ivanov. The envoy, Ali Akbar Velayati, a former foreign minister, was expected to deliver a formal response to a message from Mr. Putin that Mr. Ivanov brought to Tehran in January. The substance of the letters was not divulged.

Wide Response If U.S. Attacks, Iran Says (WT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0130085

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Iran's supreme leader said today that if the United States were to attack Iran, the country would respond by striking U.S. interests all over the world -- the latest sharp exchange in an escalating standoff between the two countries.

The comments by Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei came on the same day that another top official, Tehran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, warned in a column in the New York Times that efforts to isolate Iran would backfire on the United States, increasing sectarian tensions in the volatile Middle East, including Iraq.

The United States is reaping "the expected bitter fruits of its ill-conceived adventurism," he said.

"But rather than face these unpleasant facts, the United States administration is trying to sell an escalated version of the same failed policy. It does this by trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq," he said.

The United States and Iran have been in an increasingly tense standoff over Tehran's nuclear program. The tensions have worsened recently because of U.S. accusations of Iranian influence in Iraq.

The United States has denied it has any plans to strike Iran militarily but has sent an additional aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf in what U.S. officials call an effort to show strength in face of rising Iranian regional influence.

Speaking to a gathering of air force commanders, Ayatollah Khamenei said: "The enemy knows well that any invasion would be followed by a comprehensive reaction to the invaders and their interests all over the world."

In another sign of the tensions, Iran's intelligence minister also said the government had detected a network of U.S. and Israeli spies and had detained a second group of people who planned to go abroad for espionage training, state television reported. It gave few details.

The claim comes just a few days after an Iranian diplomat was detained in Baghdad in an incident that Iran blamed on U.S. forces. The Americans have denied involvement in the diplomat's detention.

Iranian leaders often speak of a crushing response to any U.S. attack. While the remarks are seen as an attempt to drum up national support, Iran's position on Iraq and its nuclear program has provoked harsher international and especially U.S. pressure in recent months.

President Bush has ordered American troops to act against Iranians suspected of being involved in the Iraqi insurgency in addition to deploying the second carrier. The U.N. Security Council has imposed sanctions because of Iran's refusal to cease uranium enrichment and is due to consider strengthening the sanctions later this month.

"Some people say that the U.S. president is not prone to calculating the consequences of his actions," Ayatollah Khamenei said in remarks broadcast on state television, "but it is possible to bring this kind of person to wisdom.

"U.S. policy-makers and analysts know that the Iranian nation would not let an invasion go without a response," he added.

Last week, a publication called Sobh-e Sadegh, the official publication of Iran's elite and hard-line Revolutionary Guards, also warned against American attacks, pointing out that because the United States has large numbers of troops in Iraq, Afghanistan, central Asia and Europe, it would be easy to kidnap Americans in retaliation.

Dems United On Iraq Bill, But Divided On Iran (HILL)

By David Mikhail

The Hill, February 9, 2007

As the House is set to proceed on a resolution addressing the war in Iraq, a potential divide is surfacing over Democratic bills regarding Iran.

Democrats may not stand united behind a series of bills that speak out against a military attack on Iran, concerned that such bills would make the party prone to attacks regarding foreign policy, according to a senior House staffer. In spite of the party's overwhelming unity behind similar resolutions regarding Iraq, it seems clear that the party's next challenge will be to craft a position on Iran that is distinct from the White House's and also insulates it from criticism of being weak in the global arena.

The potential divide also indicates that not all Democrats are convinced that the party has seized control of the national security issue, in spite of their electoral triumphs in November, which were largely due to the unpopularity of the Iraq war.

Within the first month of the new legislative session, Reps. Peter DeFazio (D-Ore.), Walter Jones (R-N.C.), and Barbara Lee (D-Calif.) have introduced bills in the House condemning the prospect of a preemptive strike against Iran and calling for congressional authorization before military action can be taken. The measures also affirmatively reject the notion that the authorization to use force against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, would also authorize an attack on Iran.

The senior House staffer, who is involved in foreign policy matters, stated that Republicans may try to use any legislation by Democrats concerning the potential use of force against Iran to portray the party as weak on terrorism and foreign policy, and that this could have a profound effect on denying Democrats the White House in 2008. The source went on to say that Democrats still cannot afford to take steps that open the party to criticisms of being weak on these matters.

DeFazio contended that a future attack on Iran would only solidify political support for the Iranian government and intensify its desire for nuclear-weapons capability, stating, "If Republicans want to defend going into Iran … have at it." He added that the prospect of a military attack on Iran is also a fear for the military community, citing a recent presentation by a retired major general that was delivered during the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting last week. According to DeFazio, the former officer said that there is "a substantial fear within the military community that the Bush administration" was seriously considering an attack on Iran. DeFazio noted that many lawmakers signed on to his resolution after the presentation.

Another House source added that congressional backing for the use of force against Afghanistan after Sept. 11 resulted in an overly broad instrument that has since been used by the White House for a variety of actions, including the detention of suspects without any formal process and incidences of extraordinary rendition.

The DeFazio resolution states, "That Congress … strongly and unequivocally believes that seeking congressional authority prior to taking military action against Iran is not discretionary, but is a legal requirement." The Lee legislation, while intended to prohibit the use of funds for covert military action against Iran, offers a statement of policy that, "It is the policy of the United States not to enter into a preemptive war against Iran in the absence of an imminent threat, and then only in accordance with international law and constitutional and statutory requirements for congressional authorization."

The resolution offered by Jones states that the president shall consult and receive authorization from Congress in the absence of an attack or demonstrable imminent strike by Iran. Even though it's a Republican bill, the vast majority of cosponsors are Democrats, including DeFazio, Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio) and Rep. John Murtha (Pa.).

Stacey Bernard, a spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), said that his office has not addressed the Iran resolutions yet and has focused entirely on Iraq as the House is set to address a non-binding resolution next week.

The Washington Post reported earlier this week that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has told her Democratic colleagues that if it appears likely that Bush wants to take the country to war against Iran, the House would take up a bill to deny him the authority to do so.

In spite of the potential divide regarding the Iran bills, Democrats seemingly share common ground on their view of the administration and the call for diplomacy. Lynne Weil, spokeswoman for House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), noted that during two committee hearings held within the past week, including a budgetary hearing with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Democrats had repeatedly expressed criticism about the administration's policy toward Iran while emphasizing that every diplomatic option needed to be explored.

Democrats have diverged on Iran in the past, though to a lesser extent, when Congress was looking to pass sanctions legislation last session. Several Democrats voted against an earlier version of the Iran Freedom and Support Act, a bill that was introduced by now-ranking member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), though it had acquired a large amount of Democratic support, stating that the sanctions legislation would lead to an escalation with the country.

Recent events have served to increase the tension between the two nations. The International Atomic Energy Agency stated that Iran has set up two cascades, consisting of over 300 nuclear centrifuges, in order to enrich uranium for a program the Iranian government has consistently stated is for peaceful, civilian purposes, while the U.S. has contended that Iran intends on creating a nuclear-weapons program. Additionally, the White House recently authorized American troops to take all necessary steps, including fatal force, to stop Iranian agents aiding Shiite militants in Iraq.

Asked about why he introduced his Iran resolution, Jones said that the matter presented a constitutional issue: "I want the Congress to meet its responsibility," he said, adding that the neoconservatives who pushed for the Iraq war still wield influence. In discussing potential future criticism from his fellow GOP colleagues, Jones stated, "If they don't believe in the Constitution … then I feel sorry for them."

Dissent In Tehran Buoys West (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

Iran is likely to showcase the expansion of its main nuclear plant as another advance toward large-scale production of enriched uranium, just in time for Sunday's 28th anniversary of its Islamic Revolution. But don't expect the Bush administration or its European allies to get agitated about the news.

Officials in Washington, London and Paris say that for the first time in several years, Tehran is showing signs of both political and economic unease in the wake of international moves to sanction Iran's nuclear program. Added pressure, these officials say, could nudge opinion in Iran closer toward favoring a deal to suspend its uranium work.

No one is predicting victory anytime soon in the high-stakes feud with Iran over its alleged ambitions to develop nuclear weapons. Still, Western officials have been cheered by reports of rising political dissent in Tehran, as well as debate within government circles there over the wisdom of stirring more international opposition to the nuclear program.

Even Sunday's festivities, which are expected to focus on Iran's nuclear developments, are being seen in Washington as a sign of weakness. Iran has been scrambling for months to assemble thousands of centrifuges at its main nuclear facility in Natanz, so it can claim to have made a technological leap toward enriching large amounts of the uranium needed to fuel nuclear power plants -- or, in the eyes of the West, to produce nuclear weapons. U.S. and European officials say the Natanz work remains shoddy and is largely being done for domestic effect.

"There is a large element of theater in all this," said one senior Bush administration official. For now, "there is little reason to believe that Iran is actually leaping to a new technological level."

Iranian officials have denied they are pursuing nuclear weapons and argue they have the right to enrich uranium under international rules. Amid rising tensions with the U.S., Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said on state television yesterday that Iran would go after American "interests around the world" if attacked by the U.S.

After months of haggling, the United Nations Security Council agreed just before Christmas to impose limited economic restrictions on Iran. It gave the country until Feb. 21 to suspend its uranium-enrichment program or face another round of sanctions. The U.S. has used the resolution to push Europe -- Iran's largest trading partner by far -- to take independent actions, such as cutting off bank lending and curtailing hefty government-backed export guarantees to Iran.

Some European countries have been quietly warning their banks about the risk of doing business in Iran. Last week, France said it was imposing some limited restrictions on its export guarantees to Iran, with possibly more to come.

"For the first time, really, Iran is paying a price for its nuclear work, and also showing some strain," said one senior European diplomat. "And also for the first time, there is a sense of real unity among the key players who are working this issue."

U.S. and European officials say there is ample evidence the U.N. resolution and other moves have hit home in Iran.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has been Iran's loudest voice of defiance against the international community since his election 18 months ago, has become a target of criticism over his handling of domestic and foreign policy. Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani in the past two weeks has criticized Mr. Ahmadinejad's confrontational approach toward the West. More than half of the country's Parliament members slammed the president last month for his domestic stewardship.

And Jomhuri Islami, a conservative newspaper loyal to Mr. Khamenei, warned last month that Iran should stop provoking the U.S. and take the U.N. resolution seriously. Mr. Ahmadinejad just days before had dismissed the resolution as "a piece of torn paper."

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who previously denied the Holocaust took place and threatened to wipe Israel off the map, is also coming under increasing fire on the economic front. Inflation and unemployment are picking up, European officials said, while investment in Iran's critical oil and gas fields is plunging.

European and U.S. officials note Iran has begun to reach out to Saudi Arabia and other countries, in what they describe as a bid by Tehran to deflect mounting pressures on the country. Recent U.S. actions against Iranian officials in Iraq, including the arrest by U.S. forces of five suspected security officials there last month, has heightened friction between the U.S. and Iran.

Leading the recent talks with the country's neighbors has been Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, who Mr. Ahmadinejad sidelined in September at a critical moment in negotiations with Europe over avoiding U.N. sanctions. Mr. Larijani is now planning to meet with European officials on the periphery of a security conference in Germany this weekend, potentially the first such talks since the summer. European officials said that while they don't expect meetings with Mr. Larijani to amount to much, his overture is significant, as it may portend a softening in Iran's stance.

In the meantime, the Bush administration said it is prepared to push ahead on a second sanctions resolution against Iran within the U.N.

Accord Is Signed By Palestinians To Stop Feuding (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

MECCA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 8 — The main rival Palestinian factions agreed late Thursday to form a government of national unity aimed at ending a wave of violence between them and an international boycott.

The agreement, signed here in Islam's holiest city under Saudi auspices, appeared likely to end, at least for now, weeks of fighting that had ravaged the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Still, it seemed to stop short of meeting the demands of the international community for resuming relations and support for the Palestinian Authority.

The accord, signed by Khaled Meshal of Hamas and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and leader of Fatah, its main rival, is the first time that the two parties have agreed to share authority. It sets out principles for a coalition government, like the distribution of ministerial portfolios, but leaves many of the details for later.

Israel and international powers have said that they would lift their boycott of the Palestinian government imposed after the victory by the militant group Hamas a year ago only if it agreed to three conditions: recognize Israel, renounce violence against Israel and abide by previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Mecca accord addresses only the last of those and does so rather imprecisely, promising "respect" for previous agreements between the Palestinians and Israel.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman, Tom Casey, said, "The international community has made it clear that in order to be able to have a broader relationship with the Palestinian Authority government, that those principles are going to have to be met." He added that officials were still studying the accord.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet with Mr. Abbas and Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, on Feb. 19 in Jerusalem to work on a broader peace initiative.

In Mecca, Mr. Abbas read out a statement during the signing ceremony where he re-appointed Ismail Haniya as prime minister and called on the new government to abide by "international law" and agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization. This appeared aimed at appeasing concerns of the international community.

The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, called the agreement "interesting" but said it would require further study.

In the streets of Gaza, Palestinians broke out in celebration as the agreement was being announced, with members of Hamas and Fatah firing into the air.

Hamas officials in Mecca bristled at the insistence of accepting Israel, insisting that any concessions they offered would not be enough.

"I wonder why the issue of recognizing Israel is the key to everything?" Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas government, said earlier Thursday. "We are interested to end the siege but not at any cost."

He added: "We try to balance between our Palestinian national constraints and our opening up to the international community. Israel is not ready to deal with any Palestinian side unless the Palestinians deal with the Israeli conditions."

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, said, "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles," but she declined to say whether the new Palestinian government had met any or all of those benchmarks. Israeli officials say that would require further evaluation.

Mostly, the Mecca accord promises to end the fighting that has claimed the lives of more than 90 Palestinians, with each side pledging to ease the tensions and turn a new page in their history. The two sides have signed several truces, but each one has broken down.

"These dark days will be completely gone," Mr. Meshal announced in signing the agreement. "Our Arabic, Islamic unity has brought us together, shining again." He added that having signed the accord in the holy city lent it greater significance.

Under the terms of the deal Mr. Haniya, the current prime minister, will form a new government with Hamas controlling a majority of the seats while Fatah will control several and have a number of "independent" Palestinians sitting in the remainder. The new government is supposed to be formed within five weeks.

The exact breakdown was not immediately clear late Thursday night. The critical role of interior minister is expected to go to an independent official, a Hamas spokesman said, while Mr. Abbas will keep control of some security agencies, including the Presidential Guard.

That division of authority has been an important factor in the recent Palestinian infighting, which has often pitted Fatah security force members against Hamas security force members in gun battles on the streets of Gaza.

Hamas rejects Israel's very existence and calls for its destruction. Fatah, which began with that same philosophy in the late 1950s, favors a two-state solution with Israel returning to its borders from before the 1967 war and a Palestinian state built in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem.

But there has been talk by some Hamas officials of the possibility of agreeing to the two-state solution implicitly without specifically recognizing Israel. Whether that would end the international boycott is unclear.

Thursday's agreement concluded an emergency two-day summit meeting steeped in religious significance and invested with the prestige of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. The Palestinians sat in a room high above Mecca's Grand Mosque, while Saudi officials remained outside, providing assistance when requested. Many worshipers below were aware of the ongoing deliberations, and could look up and see the figures of the Palestinians moving around.

Perhaps the biggest winner from the deal is Saudi Arabia, which has sought to build on its earlier success in 1989, when, in a similar summit meeting in the mountain town of Taif, it brokered an end to the 15-year Lebanese civil war. In scenes broadcast on Saudi Television, King Abdullah sat flanked by Mr. Abbas and Mr. Meshal, each of whom signed the document, then read a brief speech.

"They have proved they are worthy of trust and have proven they can stop the fighting," the king said.

DOJ_NMG_0130089

Saudi Arabia's effort to mediate between the Palestinian factions reflects a general agreement among leaders in the Arab world that the first step to stabilizing the burgeoning conflicts in the region and parrying the growing influence of Iran is resolving the Palestinian conflict.

The Saudis, who have traditionally preferred to work quietly behind the scenes, have grown increasingly alarmed at the chaos engulfing the region and have stepped forward to try to use their religious credibility, and vast oil wealth, to try to preserve the status quo and serve as a counterpoint to Iran.

The Saudis may hold a similar meeting for Lebanon's warring factions, Hezbollah and the so-called March 14 movement, which have come to blows in recent weeks.

For the Palestinian leaders, too, the talks offered an opportunity to improve a public image increasingly marred by contempt and criticism in the Arab world for allowing the bloodshed to reach such levels.

Many saw the meeting as a last chance to prevent an all-out civil war between the feuding Palestinian factions, which have broken numerous cease-fire agreements since clashes began last summer.

"Hamas and Fatah have not let their people down," Mr. Meshal declared. "To the heroes in Palestine, I say these are the leaders of the Palestinian people."

Hamas, Fatah Reach Tentative Accord (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

JERUSALEM -- The rival Palestinian groups Hamas and Fatah announced Thursday that they have agreed in principle to share power in hopes of easing months of deadly factional fighting and breaking a damaging international aid embargo.

The tentative accord was announced in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, where leaders of the two groups met for two days under the auspices of King Abdullah.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said he was hopeful the agreement would quell the factional clashes that have left scores of Palestinians dead in the Gaza Strip. Previous agreements between the two factions have collapsed.

"I hope that all the shameful acts that make us feel ashamed will stop, and that we move seriously toward liberating our country," Abbas said during a signing ceremony in a palace near the Kabaa, Islam's holiest site. He was joined by the exiled political leader of Hamas, Khaled Meshaal, as Saudi King Abdullah looked on from between the two men.

Celebratory gunfire erupted in the Gaza Strip as news of the agreement reached the impoverished coastal enclave.

But the pact was vague on several issues that could determine whether it can rein in Gaza's gunmen or lift the Western aid boycott, imposed after Hamas won parliamentary elections in January 2006.

Israel and much of the West considers the radical Islamist group a terrorist organization, and it refuses to recognize the state of Israel or honor past agreements between the Jewish state and Palestinians.

Israel offered a terse immediate response. "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles: recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former treaties and renunciation of terror," said Miri Eisin, an Israeli government spokeswoman.

Officials from the two Palestinian factions said they have worked out a formula for distributing Cabinet positions, including leaving Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas as prime minister, but they did not name an interior minister, a crucial post with formal authority over security forces. The minister would be nominated by Hamas, but approved by Abbas, of Fatah.

The parties also have not worked out who will control the various agencies of the security services, a potentially explosive issue. The two factions planned further talks on those details and several other unresolved matters.

The agreement also does not include language that explicitly recognizes Israel, nor does it include a renunciation of violence, two of the three conditions set by the West for resuming direct aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Instead, the language was more oblique: the new government would "respect" international resolutions and past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. That wording can be interpreted as providing tacit recognition of Israel, but falls well short of international demands.

The Middle East mediators known as the Quartet -- the United States, European Union, Russia and United Nations -- had demanded as their third condition that the new government abide by past Palestinian-Israeli agreements.

It remains unclear whether the language agreed upon by Fatah and Hamas will satisfy the Quartet's conditions enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars annually in foreign aid.

If the accord quiets the internal strife, Abbas could have freer rein to pursue a peace agreement with Israel at a time when the Bush administration is pushing new talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to join Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Feb. 19 for a three-way meeting in Jerusalem aimed at exploring the possible outlines of a final peace agreement.

In September, the two groups announced a similar agreement on a unity government but the deal fizzled almost as soon as it was declared. Subsequent talks went nowhere.

"For those who are afraid that this agreement will be similar to the previous one, I say, 'No,' " Meshaal said. "We swear to God in this blessed place that this agreement has our complete commitment."

Tit-for-tat clashes had worsened in recent months, claiming more than 90 lives since mid-December. The talks in Mecca were seen as perhaps the last chance to reach a power-sharing deal in order to stave off wider civil strife.

Palestinians Reach Deal On A Government (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 8 -- Rival Palestinian factions Fatah and Hamas agreed Thursday to form a power-sharing government and end the armed feuding that has killed scores of Palestinians over the past year.

It remained unclear whether the new government will meet conditions laid down by Israel and international donors to fully restore funding to the Palestinian Authority that they cut off after Hamas's victory in January 2006 parliamentary elections.

The agreement does not explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist, a key international demand. Hamas officials said their movement would not do so.

The new cabinet will set aside seats for Fatah -- it currently has none -- and some smaller parties, but it will continue to be led by Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

In assigning Haniyeh the task of forming a new government, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, stated that its platform must conform with "international resolutions" and "respect" previous agreements signed with Israel.

The wording amounted to a compromise acceptable to Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, which refuses to openly endorse the 1993 Oslo accords and other agreements that the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization negotiated with the Jewish state.

The deal "brings us to the shores of peace," Abbas said in the holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, where the factions have been meeting. "This initiative has been crowned with success."

Dubbed the Mecca Accord, the agreement emerged after two days of negotiations under the auspices of King Abdullah, a Sunni Muslim who is concerned by Shiite-dominated Iran's growing influence within the Palestinian territories through the money it has provided Hamas during the aid embargo. Leaders of the Saudi royal family lined the ornate palace meeting room with a view of the Grand Mosque for the announcement.

Palestinian officials used the deal to appeal for an end to the partisan violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip that has killed about 70 Palestinians since December, when Abbas threatened to call early general elections unless Hamas agreed to share power.

The disunity has undermined the Palestinian national movement as Abbas is preparing to meet Feb. 19 with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to discuss ways of reviving the Palestinian-Israeli peace process. Palestinian leaders said the agreement, which gives Haniyeh five weeks to form a government, would begin closing those rifts.

"We will rebuild our Palestinian house on strong foundations," said Khaled Meshal, exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, who took part in the talks. "This agreement will be fully committed to before God."

After Hamas ended Fatah's long monopoly on political power last year, it invited Fatah to join its cabinet, but the secular nationalist party declined. Since then, party leaders have twice announced the formation of a national unity government, only to see the agreements collapse soon after.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- the group of Middle East peace mediators known as the Quartet -- have demanded that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements in return for resumption of aid that accounts for nearly half the Palestinian Authority's operating budget.

Miri Eisin, an Israeli government spokeswoman, said after the agreement was announced that "Israel expects the new Palestinian government to respect all three of the international community's principles." She declined to say whether Israeli officials view the agreement as meeting those conditions.

After the deal was announced, celebratory gunfire erupted in the Gaza Strip, the scene of much of the factional violence.

The agreement calls for Hamas to control nine government ministries, the most of any party, followed by Fatah with six.

Hamas agreed to cede control of such important portfolios as the foreign affairs and interior ministries. The latter controls some of the security services involved in the recent fighting. Hamas is to name an independent politician to be interior minister, and Fatah will choose an independent as foreign minister.

Palestinians To Form Unity Government (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Fatah and Hamas leaders meeting in Mecca signed a pact last night to form a power-sharing government, bowing to pressure from the Arab world to bury their differences for the sake of Palestinian unity and head off a looming civil war.

It was uncertain, however, whether Hamas had moved far enough towards meeting international demands that it recognise Israel to lift a boycott of the Palestinian Authority in force since the Islamists came to power in an election one year ago.

A statement read out in the Saudi holy city at the end of two days of talks between the rival factions said a new national unity government would respect past agreements made by the Palestinians.

Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president, was earlier reported to have sought a stronger statement of Hamas's "commitment" to such agreements, signed when Fatah was in power and which recognise Israel.

Members of the international Middle East Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – had hoped for a more unequivocal indication that Hamas was abandoning its refusal to recognise Israel's right to exist.

Mr Abbas said the new government should "respect the resolutions of international law and the agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organisation" that he heads.

The PLO, dominated by Fatah but to which Hamas does not belong, recognised Israel as part of the Oslo peace accords that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority in 1994.

Miri Eisen, Israeli government spokeswoman, said shortly after the factions signed their accord in the presence of Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah: "Israel expects a new Palestinian government to respect and accept all three of the international community principles: recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former agreements and renunciation of all terror and violence."

In a statement to Associated Press, she did not say whether Israel believed the guidelines of the new government issued in Mecca fulfilled those demands.

Quartet reaction to the Mecca accord will set the tone for trilateral talks in Jerusalem next week at which Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, hopes to coax Mr Abbas and Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, towards a revival of the defunct peace process.

Ismail Haniyeh, the PA's Gaza-based Hamas prime minister, predicted the international boycott would end. "This is the first step on the way to breaking the embargo on the Palestinian people under occupation," he said in Mecca.

Even if last night's deal did not lead to an early lifting of the boycott, there were hopes in Gaza and the West Bank that it would at least defuse a factional conflict that has claimed dozens of lives in recent weeks.

Mr Abbas, who headed Fatah's delegation to the Mecca talks, threatened in December to decree fresh elections if no agreement on a national unity agreement were forthcoming. His ultimatum to Hamas sparked an increasingly violent series of confrontations between the two factions that raised fears of an all-out civil war.

The two delegations – Hamas was represented by Mr Haniyeh and Khaled Mashaal, its exiled leader – agreed to a distribution of cabinet posts. Salam Fayad, an independent former finance minister, is expected to return to a post in which he gained widespread respect among international aid donors.

Mr Haniyeh will remain as prime minister under the terms of the agreement. Hamas will receive nine portfolios and Fatah six. Mr Haniyeh will propose an independent as interior minister to replace the Hamas incumbent who has been in charge of a 5,000-strong militia involved in recent clashes with Fatah.

Ziad Abu Amr, an independent elected with Hamas support but subsequently estranged from the Islamists, was expected to serve as foreign minister.

Palestinian Factions Reach Deal (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

MECCA, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Rival Palestinian factions signed a power-sharing accord aimed at ending months of bloodshed Thursday, agreeing that the Islamic militant group Hamas would head a new coalition government that would "respect" past peace agreements with Israel.

However, the United States and Israel have demanded the new government explicitly renounce violence, recognize Israel and agree to uphold past peace accords. The vague promise to respect past deals — a compromise reached after Hamas rejected pressure for more binding language — was not seen as going far enough.

U.S. and Israeli acceptance is crucial to the deal's success. Unless they are convinced Hamas has sufficiently moderated, the West is unlikely to lift a crippling financial blockade of the Palestinian government, and it will be difficult to advance the peace process.

"Israel expects a new Palestinian government to respect and accept all three of the international community principles — recognition of Israel, acceptance of all former agreements and renunciation of all terror and violence," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin told the Associated Press after the accord was announced.

She would not say whether Israel believes the guidelines of the new government fulfill those demands.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said "we'll see what any final agreement actually looks like and we'll have to make an evaluation from there" whether it meets international demands.

Also riding on the agreement's success are Palestinian hopes to avert an outright civil war. Hamas and Fatah gunmen have clashed repeatedly in recent months, killing dozens — including 30 who died in four days of fighting that ended with a fragile truce Sunday. The deal could also fall apart as the two sides work out who will fill sensitive posts in the new government — particularly the interior ministry, which controls security forces.

Saudi Arabia — which put its credibility on the line by hosting the high-profile summit in the holy city of Mecca — will likely now face the task of selling the agreement to its ally, the United States.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal headed two days of intense negotiations in a Mecca palace overlooking the Kaaba, Islam's holiest shrine — a venue Saudi Arabia chose to step up the pressure on the two sides to compromise.

Much of the negotiations centered on a single word. Abbas pressed Hamas to accept the stronger stance of "committing to" past peace accords. But in the end, he was forced to settle with the promise to "respect" them.

The final agreement was announced at a ceremony aired live on Arab television Thursday night, in which Saudi King Abdullah sat with Abbas on his right and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal on his left.

Abbas aide Nabil Amr read a letter from Abbas proclaiming the accord and asking Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to form the new coalition government within five weeks, divvying up Cabinet posts between the factions according to a formula agreed on in the Mecca talks.

The letter said the new government would "respect" past peace deals signed with Israel by the Palestine Liberation Organization, dominated by Fatah.

Still, Abbas and Mashaal insisted the agreement would bring peace between their factions and lavished praised on the Saudi monarch for his help — even comparing him to the Prophet Muhammad in his ability to bring reconciliation.

Abbas said the deal would "satisfy our people ... and bring us to the shores of peace ... This initiative has been crowned with success."

Mashaal vowed the accord would put an end to violence after a series of truces between Fatah and Hamas gunmen that collapsed. "I tell those who fear that the fate of this agreement will be the same fate of the old ones, ...we have pledged our allegiance to God from this sacred place .. and we will go back to our country fully committed to it."

"I say to our young people that this is an agreement of the leadership of the biggest groups and none of you should accept any order from others to fire," he said.

In Gaza City, celebratory gunfire was heard for more than an hour after the accord was announced. Residents expressed hope it would mean an end to the violence and the financial boycott, imposed by the West after Hamas came to power following January 2006 elections.

"We've been holding our breath. God willing, this is a permanent agreement, not a temporary truce. We hope this will lead to lifting the siege," said Mahmoud Qassam, a fish seller watching the ceremony at his home in Gaza City's Shaati refugee camp, meters (yards) from Haniyeh's home.

A first test of international acceptance of the deal could come on Feb. 19, when Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are due to meet in Jerusalem for talks intended to revive peace negotiations.

If the West does not back the new government and refuses to lift the boycott, it could put a strain on the fragile peace between Hamas and Fatah.

The deal could also fall apart over the formation of the government — particularly over the issue of who will fill the vital post of interior minister, which would control the security forces. Under the agreement, the post will go to an independent, since Hamas and Fatah were each reluctant to see the other faction hold the ministry.

Hamas must propose the candidate for approval by Abbas, and it did not appear that the two sides have settled on a name.

Under the agreement, Hamas will get nine Cabinet posts, including the prime minister position. Fatah gets six, and other factions get four. Besides the interior ministry, independents will get the foreign ministry and planning ministry.

"There are many details that still need to be worked out after this agreement, including the interior minister and marketing the agreement to the international community," said Abdel-Rahman Zaydan, a member of the Hamas delegation. "The Saudis will be part of this effort."

DOJ_NMG_0130093

Abbas had asked Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal to sound out the Americans on whether "respect the accords" is acceptable, a Fatah delegate said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomacy.

To boost the new government, the kingdom promised $1 billion in aid to the Palestinians, Ahmed Youssef, a political adviser to Hanyieh, said in Gaza.

"I believe this agreement could be accepted by the European Union. We have had talks with European parties who say such an agreement could be accepted," Nasser Shaer, deputy prime minister in the outgoing government, said in Ramallah.

Asked if the deal met U.S. and Israeli demands, Mr. Shaer said: "With Israel? No. America has its own scenario ... we are betting on assistance from Arab countries. Saudi Arabia as well as other Arab states could help sell this agreement."

Israeli Hospital Treats Palestinian Fighters (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

ASHKELON, Israel -- The wounded in the bitter Palestinian struggle between Hamas and Fatah fall in the dusty streets of Gaza, but it is to an Israeli hospital in this nearby coastal city that many are brought for treatment.

Officials at Ashkelon's Barzilai Medical Center say there is no political calculation behind the decision to take in the Palestinian wounded, who were arriving at a rate of several a day before the factions struck a deal in Saudi Arabia yesterday.

But when the father of a wounded security officer from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction tells a reporter that he wants "to say thank you to all of the people of Israel," it seems that the center's work is changing at least some hearts and minds.

The expression of warmth toward Israel came from Abdel Hamin Odeh, father of Adel Odeh, a Fatah fighter who was brought to Barzilai suffering a critical leg wound. By this week, he was shuffling gingerly though the halls with the help of a walker.

Mr. Odeh had first been taken to the Palestinian Al Quds Hospital in Gaza City, said the gunman's father, Abdel Hamin Odeh. "They took care of him, but not very well."

Barzilai's chief medical director, Ron Lobel, says the Israeli hospital has treated 124 patients from the Gaza Strip in the past year.

"We don't know if it's Hamas or Fatah, we don't know if they are civilian or armed forces, we just know they are injured," said Dr. Lobel. "It's something normal, between hospitals."

Sitting alongside the neighboring bed, Rafat Shelieh gestured toward his younger brother, Abdallah, who was waiting to schedule his third operation since arriving at Barzilai on Feb. 1.

"He would have lost a leg," Rafat Shelieh said. "The treatment is a thousand times better here than in Gaza."

Abdallah Shelieh, a 25-year-old policeman from a Fatah family, lifted his hospital gown and pointed to the bullet wounds caused by Hamas gunmen who assaulted his home in the Jabaliya refugee camp two weeks ago.

There was one wound on the right side of his rib cage, another in the right shoulder, and two in the right leg, one high and one low.

"I was defending my house," said Abdallah Shelieh, describing a daylong battle that left him wounded and bleeding inside the house for nearly seven hours. "I fired on them for about 15 minutes."

Although the hospital insists it does not discriminate between factions, most of the wounded Palestinians it receives have come from Fatah, in part because border background checks by the Israeli secret service seem to have shut out Hamas members.

Fatah officers such as Abdallah Shelieh, meanwhile, have been avoiding Gaza City's main facility, Shifah Hospital, for fear of Hamas security forces who have set up military positions on the roof and in their own wing of the hospital.

Medical services in Gaza are further hobbled by a lack of supplies -- including blood -- and surgical knowledge to handle the wounded, said a Shifah hospital official.

Despite hopes that yesterday's agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, will put an end to the flow of wounded Palestinians, Adel Odeh held out little hope that the deal would last.

"There won't be peace between Hamas and Fatah," he said. "I know both of them, and neither of them likes the other."

The recent bloodshed will only intensify those grudges, said Rafat Shelieh, who denigrated Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal and disparaged the Islamic militants as not sophisticated enough to run the government.

With his home destroyed and a brother laid up in the hospital, he said he also was not optimistic about the chances for reconciliation.

"My heart is gone. They should be afraid of me. Not the other way around," he said. "Everything in the house is gone. I only have the jacket and clothes on my back. Will I forget that?"

Will Palestinians Take The Second Step? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130095

THE AGREEMENT between Palestinian factions reached in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Thursday is welcome even if it accomplishes nothing more than an end, for now, to fratricidal violence in the Gaza Strip. It remains to be seen whether the agreement between Fatah and Hamas will bring something more — an improvement in their material condition.

That additional blessing depends on whether Hamas is willing to join Fatah and its leader, President Mahmoud Abbas, in recognizing the state of Israel. While the rivalry between Hamas and Fatah manifests itself in multiple ways, the difference between the two movements that matters to the outside world — including European and American donors — involves the Jewish state.

Simply put, Abbas is willing to accept the reality of Israel even as he complains about the hardships Israelis have visited on his people. Hamas, the terrorist group/political party of Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, so far has been willing only to dangle the possibility of a hudna, or 10-year truce. That's not good enough.

When the United States suspended aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas prevailed in parliamentary elections, Washington conditioned a resumption of aid on three commitments: accept Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and agree to abide by past agreements with Tel Aviv.

Thursday's agreement, brokered by a newly assertive Saudi Arabia, does direct the Hamas-led government to "respect international resolutions and the agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization" — with Israel, that is. That's a good sign. But before Europe and the U.S. provide further assistance, the government must acknowledge Israel's right to exist.

That right is enshrined in U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, passed after the 1967 Arab-Israeli war and repeatedly reaffirmed, calling for a "just and lasting peace in which every state in the area can live in security." Palestinians and other Arabs like to cite other language in 242 calling for the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict," but the two concepts — Israeli withdrawal and Israeli security — are intertwined.

After years of equivocation, the late Yasser Arafat finally acknowledged that reality, setting in motion a process that produced the Palestinian Authority and the endorsement by the U.S., Russia, the U.N. and the European Union of a "two-state solution" in which Israel and a Palestinian state would exist side by side. Abbas recognizes Israel's right to exist (and with more credibility than Arafat enjoyed), but Hamas has held out.

That must change. It isn't enough for Hamas to "respect" past agreements or to hint that it now embraces a document drawn up by Palestinian prisoners last summer that seemed to endorse a two-state solution. A Palestinian "unity" government that can't unite on this question will remain suspect in the eyes of some of the countries that can most help the Palestinian people.

Israeli Official Faults Egypt Over Arms Flow Into Gaza (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

A senior Israeli official yesterday accused Egypt of failing to halt arms smuggling into Gaza, thus bolstering the militant group Hamas at the expense of the Palestinian leadership supported by the United States.

The comments, by Israeli Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, reflect the increasing frustration of Israeli officials that Hamas has been able to increase its grip on the Gaza Strip since Israel withdrew its troops in 2005. Egypt at the time agreed to monitor the six-mile border between Gaza and the Sinai Peninsula, but hundreds of rockets have fallen on Israeli population centers from Gaza.

"There is no doubt that Egypt is not doing enough," Dichter told a group of reporters, asserting that "tens of tons" of explosives are being smuggled. "I am sure that if Egypt decides to block this flow of smuggling, they can do it, 100 percent."

Some Israeli officials said they suspect that Egypt is playing a double game -- officially supporting Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in his struggle with Hamas while hedging its bets because Hamas is an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamic group with growing political strength in Egypt.

Egypt has publicly supported U.S. efforts to strengthen the security forces loyal to Abbas. It has also discreetly shipped arms to Abbas's forces.

Dichter, noting that he does not believe the Egyptian government itself is engaging in smuggling, declined to speculate on the reasons why Egypt has not halted the flow of arms into Gaza. "It is very easy to be done. It is a matter of determination," he said. "There is no doubt it strengthens the terrorist organization."

Dichter said that he had raised the problem in talks with Bush administration officials this week.

Egyptian Ambassador Nabil Fahmy rejected Dichter's comments as inaccurate and untrue. He said most of the weapons that enter Gaza are either smuggled through Israel's black market or over the sea along Gaza's coast.

"They should control their own market, frankly," Fahmy said. He added that when Israel occupied the Gaza Strip, "they were not able to prevent smuggling 100 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0130096

Fahmy said that Egyptian forces in the Sinai are limited in size under the Camp David accords, though the level was increased to 750 troops in an agreement with Israel after the Gaza withdrawal. The problem has been exacerbated, he said, by a lack of policing on the Gaza side of the border. "There is a good-faith effort to try to control the smuggling," Fahmy said.

Bush To Meet With Former Lebanese President Gemayel (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

US President George W. Bush is to meet with former Lebanese president Amin Gemayel and affirm US support for a "sovereign and democratic" Lebanon as the country is locked in political crisis, the White House said.

"We'll be demonstrating US commitment to a sovereign and democratic Lebanon, and express sympathy, again, on behalf of the president and the American people, for the assassination of Mr. Gemayel's son, Pierre Gemayel," said Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow.

Pierre Gemayel, the industry minister in Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's pro-Western government, was killed on November 21 in Beirut by unknown assailants.

His father, who served as president of Lebanon from 1982 to 1988, after the assassination of his newly elected brother Bashir, views neighboring Syria as the prime suspect in his son's death.

Bush has voiced unwavering support for Siniora's beleaguered government, which since mid-November has faced stiff opposition led by the radical Islamic militia Hezbollah.

The US president accuses Syria and Iran, branded foes by his administration, of backing Hezbollah in an attempt to topple the elected government.

Bush's meeting with Gemayel comes two days after the Lebanese government and the United Nations signed an agreement to set up an international court to try the suspected killers of another Lebanese leader, former premier Rafiq Hariri.

The creation of the tribunal requires approval by Lebanon's divided parliament, amid a political crisis teetering toward what many see as civil war.

Lebanese PM Protests Over Israeli 'incursion' (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister, on Thursday protested that Israel had violated his country's sovereignty in an incident that led to the first cross-border exchange of fire since last year's war.

The Israeli military said it returned fire after the Lebanese army fired warning shots towards an Israeli army bulldozer searching for explosive devices on the border. There were no casualties in the brief exchange.

Israel acknowledged that its bulldozer had crossed the border fence but insisted it was operating inside Israeli territory. The search had been mounted after four devices were discovered this week. The Israeli military said it believed they were planted by Hizbollah, the Lebanese Islamist movement that fought a month-long war with Israel last summer. Hizbollah says the explosives were placed there before last year's war and are not new.

The exchange of fire was the most serious incident since then and the first involving the Lebanese army since it took over Hizbollah positions in the wake of Israel's withdrawal.

Mr Siniora, whose pro-western government is being challenged by Hizbollah, ordered the army to continue confronting Israeli incursions into Lebanese territory, according to a statement by the country's news agency. The Lebanese army's apparent willingness to challenge Israel may boost its credibility domestically, one pro-government MP said.

A 12,000-strong force of the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (Unifil) is based in southern Lebanon alongside some 15,000 Lebanese soldiers as part of last year's ceasefire.

Despite the large neutral presence on the Lebanese side of the border, Israel is concerned at any indication that Hizbollah may be trying to re-establish itself militarily in the south.

Amir Peretz, the Israeli defence minister, said after a meeting with his security chiefs that Israel did not seek an escalation along the border with Lebanon but its forces would return fire when fired on.

"Unifil forces and the Lebanese army are fulfilling their roles, and we intend to continue to operate within the political and regulatory framework established in recent months," Mr Peretz said. He added, however: "There is no intention of returning to the policy of looking the other way on Lebanon."

The Israeli daily Yedioth Ahronoth said Unifil handed the Israeli army parts of explosive charges found near the border so that experts could determine whether they were placed at the time of the war or more recently.

DOJ_NMG_0130097

¦ The Lebanese army on Thursday night seized a major arms shipment for Hizbollah in a truck near Beirut, writes Ferry Biedermann in Beirut. Hizbollah in a statement acknowledged that the weapons and munitions were meant for its fighters in the south of Lebanon and demanded the return of the intercepted shipment.

According to the army, the weapons included Grad rockets of the type that Hizbollah fired at Israel during the war last summer.

Hizbollah said that the truck was on its way from Lebanon's eastern Bekaa Valley, which borders Syria, and that it was seized by Lebanese customs officials. But Defence Minister Elias Murr said on Lebanon's LBC television station that the shipment originated from within Lebanon.

Israel and the US have accused Syria repeatedly of being a conduit for rearming Hizbollah, in breach of UN Security Council resolution 1701 that ended last summer's war.

Lebanese Premier Pins Stability On Secure Border, Regional Talks (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The day after a military skirmish between Lebanese and Israeli troops, embattled Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora vowed in an interview to buttress defense of his nation's 49-mile border with Israel as part of a broader initiative to restore stability to Lebanon.

Mr. Siniora said Beirut welcomes recent efforts by Saudi Arabia and Iran to facilitate a regional dialogue toward resolving Lebanon's political crisis, which pits his government against the Shiite Muslim militia and political party Hezbollah. The Lebanese leader also said a consensus must be built in the Middle East to press ahead with an international tribunal to identify and try the assassins of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed by a bomb in downtown Beirut nearly two years ago.

"What we are after...is to know" who committed the crime "to prevent attacks in the future," Mr. Siniora said in his office, which Hezbollah supporters have placed under a virtual siege for nearly three months. "We are very much committed to protecting the democracy and the liberties and freedom of the Lebanese."

Mr. Siniora spoke less than a day after Lebanese soldiers exchanged fire with Israeli troops stationed across from the Lebanese town of Maroun el-Rass. In the interview, the prime minister accused the Israeli military of violating Lebanon's border by dispatching a bulldozer on an explosives-clearing mission across the United Nations-designated "blue line" that divides the countries. The Lebanese Army fired at the bulldozer after it ignored warnings to pull back, Mr. Siniora said. He said the Israelis should have worked through the U.N. peacekeeping force that has been granted an expanded mandate to police the border since a cease-fire ended last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"We gave clear instructions to the army to stop [the Israelis] passing the blue line," Mr. Siniora said, adding, "It's a matter of principal" that Israel defer to the U.N.

The Israeli Defense Forces denied yesterday that its troops crossed the blue line. The IDF said it engaged in a justified operation to clear mines laid by Hezbollah on Israel's side of the line. The IDF also said it had asked the U.N. to alert the Lebanese military that the operation posed no threat to its troops. "The IDF will continue to act whenever necessary in order to protect the full sovereignty of the State of Israel while strengthening its security arrangements in the north," it said in a statement.

Officials from the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon have said in recent months that Israel regularly violates terms of the summer cease-fire by flying jets and drones in Lebanese airspace. Liam McDowell, a Unifil spokesman, told the Associated Press yesterday that his organization is investigating whether Israeli troops had crossed the blue line.

The incident came as Mr. Siniora's government seeks an agreement with Hezbollah and its political allies. Hezbollah pulled its ministers from Mr. Siniora's government in November to protest what it claims was his effort to push on with establishing an international court to try the Hariri case without Hezbollah's consent. Since then, Hezbollah has threatened to topple the government.

The crisis has sparked sectarian tensions, including riots last month that pitted Hezbollah's Shiite supporters against Mr. Siniora's largely Sunni Muslim base. Many in Lebanon fear the situation could spark a return to civil war.

Mr. Siniora's government is supported by the U.S., France and Saudi Arabia, while Hezbollah gets arms and funding from Iran and Syria. In recent weeks, Saudi Arabia and Iran have engaged in a regional dialogue to try to broker a political settlement in Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories, an effort Mr. Siniora said could help stabilize the region.

Saudi Arabia's national-security adviser, Prince Bandar, traveled to Tehran to meet with Iranian officials last month. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah is hosting leaders of Hamas and Fatah -- the Palestinian parties wrestling for control -- in the holy city of Mecca this week to try to forge a settlement.

"There are real contacts being made," Mr. Siniora said. Still, he said he doesn't see Lebanon's political standoff being resolved until there is an agreement on the Hariri court. Hezbollah and its allies say they support the government's efforts to capture and prosecute the killers. They also say they object to some of the legal statutes created by the U.N. and Beirut to govern the court.

This week, the U.N. Security Council formally endorsed language governing the establishment of the tribunal and is waiting for Beirut to do the same. Mr. Siniora said the failure of Hezbollah and its allies to provide clear recommendations for changing the language has made his government lack the confidence "that they really want it."

N. Korea Talks Resume With 'Fresh' Hope (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 8 -- Six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program resumed Thursday, buoyed by signs that North Korea is ready to return to serious negotiations.

The Chinese chief negotiator and host, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, suggested there were hopes of breaking a long stalemate that has led to questions about the future of the talks, which have been grinding away, off and on, since August 2003. At a formal opening session, he qualified the new round as a "fresh start" made possible by agreements reached last month in separate discussions in Berlin between U.S. and North Korean diplomats.

"These results provide a more solid basis for this session," Wu said.

The last round of the Chinese-sponsored talks broke up in failure Dec. 22 after North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, refused to engage in formal discussions about his country's nuclear weapons. He said nothing could be done on the nuclear front until resolution of a U.S.-North Korean financial dispute centering on a Macau bank accused of laundering illicit money from North Korea.

U.S. and North Korean banking officials have held two sessions of separate negotiations on the banking standoff. Although there has been no announcement indicating that the issue has been resolved, North Korean leaders apparently have decided that the exchanges show enough promise that they can resume discussing the nuclear problem.

The chief U.S. delegate, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, said Thursday evening that the North Korean attitude appeared different from the balk in December. During Thursday's talks, Hill said, Kim displayed a willingness to negotiate that augured well for chances of making progress at least on some preliminary steps.

Kim said on his arrival that he came prepared to discuss the first steps in what the Bush administration hopes will be a gradual but irreversible program to eliminate North Korea's nuclear weapons and dismantle the facilities that produce fuel for the bombs. But he also made clear that agreement remains a distant goal.

In remarks to reporters, Kim said his willingness to negotiate depends on what the United States is willing to concede in return. Without citing specifics, he said the Bush administration must abandon its "hostile policy" and embrace "peaceful coexistence." The United States knows North Korea's requirements for reaching a first-step agreement, he added.

According to two U.S. nuclear experts who spoke with Kim last week in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital, the requirements include supplies of heavy fuel oil, resolution of the banking dispute, help in building civilian nuclear reactors and normalization of relations with the United States. In exchange, the experts said they were told, North Korea would be ready to freeze its Yongbyon reactor and allow the return of international nuclear inspectors to some North Korean facilities.

In an agreement in principle reached in September 2005, North Korea pledged to dismantle its entire nuclear program in return for economic aid and normalization of relations with the United States. That accord was hailed as a major step forward. The negotiations have stalled since then, however, on what steps should be carried out, and in what sequence, to put that pledge into practice.

In a measure of the difficulty, when the talks began more than three years ago they were designed to prevent North Korea from developing nuclear weapons, and that was the context in which the September 2005 accord was reached. Since North Korea set off a nuclear test explosion last October and declared itself a nuclear power, the emphasis has shifted to persuading the Pyongyang government to get rid of nuclear weapons it says it already has and to stop producing material to make more.

U.S. officials have said their intelligence indicates that North Korea has accumulated enough plutonium to fuel as many as 10 nuclear weapons and that its main facility, at Yongbyon, is producing more. In addition, U.S. officials have said North Korea has a separate uranium enrichment program to produce more weapons material, which Pyongyang denies.

In addition to North Korea, China and the United States, the talks involve South Korea, Russia and Japan.

N. Korea Talks Resume On Positive Note (AP)

South Korea's nuclear envoy said Friday that a Chinese draft agreement — with North Korea accepting in principle the initial steps for its disarmament — offered a good start for discussion. But the main U.S. envoy said there was still much work to do.

Envoys from six nations are trying to agree on steps to implement a September 2005 deal in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The 2005 deal — the only one to emerge since negotiations began in 2003 — was a broad statement of principles that did not outline any concrete steps for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program.

"It's good as a basis for negotiations, but I don't want to predict whether there will be smooth negotiations," South Korea's Chun Yung-woo told reporters Friday ahead of the second day of talks in Beijing. He declined to give any details of what the draft contained.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill gave no details on the draft, but said Friday he was anxious for progress in the slow-moving negotiations.

"We haven't discussed it yet but that is what we will be doing first thing this morning ... In these processes you often start discussing things and you move to the written form and that is always a challenge," he told reporters.

The Chinese presented the draft after the first day of meetings Thursday, during which the North agreed in principle to take initial steps toward its eventual nuclear disarmament.

A South Korean official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing diplomacy, said China circulated a draft proposal. The official gave no details, but other delegates said earlier that the agreement would outline initial steps for implementing the 2005 accord.

Such an agreement would set the stage for the first tangible steps in more than three years of negotiations.

In his comments Thursday, Hill said that the new proposal would be "a set of actions that would have to be taken in a finite amount of time." He declined to give specifics, but said moves would occur in a matter of weeks.

"The delegations are coalescing around some of the themes that we believe should be the basis for a first step in implementing" the 2005 agreement, he added.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington she was "cautiously optimistic" that the implementation of the agreement could begin.

At the last round of talks in December, in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 underground nuclear test, the communist nation refused even to talk about its nuclear programs. Instead, Pyongyang demanded the U.S. lift financial restrictions targeting alleged North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

Since then, the U.S. and North Korean nuclear envoys held an unusual one-on-one meeting in Germany last month where differences between the sides were apparently discussed, although no details of any concessions have been made public. Pyongyang and Washington held separate talks in Beijing late January on the financial issue, although it has yet to be resolved.

Unlike in the December talks, negotiators Thursday "were able to make progress in discussing denuclearization," Hill said.

The North's chief negotiator had said before the talks began that his country was "prepared to discuss first-stage measures" toward nuclear disarmament.

"We are going to make a judgment based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence," Kim Kye Gwan said on arriving in Beijing for the meeting at a Chinese state guesthouse.

American experts who visited Kim in Pyongyang last week said North Korea would propose a freeze of its main nuclear reactor and a resumption of international inspections in exchange for energy aid and a normalization of relations with Washington.

The North, which suffers from chronic power shortages, is also seeking electricity supply or an annual import of at least half a million tons of heavy fuel oil — the amount it had been promised under a Clinton-era denuclearization deal with the U.S.

North Korea and the U.S. agreed in 1994 for Pyongyang to freeze its plutonium-based nuclear reactor in exchange for energy aid. The North promised to eventually dismantle the facility following construction there of two light-water nuclear reactors for electricity — a type more difficult to divert for weapons use.

However, that deal fell apart in late 2002 after Washington accused North Korea of a secret uranium enrichment program. The North expelled international inspectors and restarted its reactor, and is believed to have amassed enough radioactive material for at least a half-dozen bombs.

The six-nation talks — involving China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas — began in August 2003, but the North has twice boycotted them for more than a year. The latest was over a U.S. decision to blacklist a Macau bank where the North held accounts, saying it was complicit in the regime's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

Rice 'Optimistic' Over Nuke Talks (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

DOJ_NMG_0130100

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that she is "cautiously optimistic" that initial progress can be made at six-nation negotiations aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear-weapons programs, as talks resumed hours earlier in Beijing.

The Chinese hosts circulated a joint statement draft outlining the first steps Pyongyang must take, as well as reciprocal gestures by the United States and the other participants, diplomats said.

"The six-party talks have reconvened in Beijing just as we speak, and I think we are cautiously optimistic that there may be some movement forward," Miss Rice said during testimony on the 2008 budget request before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At the same time, she said she does not count her "chickens until they are hatched."

Kim Kye-gwan, the chief North Korean negotiator, said in the Chinese capital that his delegation was "prepared to discuss first-stage measures" toward disarmament. But he also repeated a refrain the North has been using since President Bush took office in 2001.

"We are going to make a judgment based on whether the United States will give up its hostile policy and come out toward peaceful coexistence," he said, adding that Washington was "well aware" what it had to do.

Still, U.S. and other officials said the first day of the talks went well, unlike the last round in December, when U.S. financial sanctions on the North reportedly were cited by Mr. Kim as an obstacle to progress on the nuclear issue.

"We had a good first day today," Christopher Hill, the top American negotiator, told reporters in Beijing. "We hope we can achieve some kind of joint statement here."

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, met with Mr. Kim over three days in Berlin last month, after which the North said they had agreed on some of the outstanding issues.

Last week, Treasury officials held talks with a North Korean delegation in Beijing on the financial penalties, which involved freezing the North's assets in a Macau bank, apparently to the partial satisfaction of Pyongyang.

Washington imposed the restrictions in fall 2005, saying the funds were associated with illicit activities, such as money laundering and counterfeiting U.S. dollars.

The draft proposed by China yesterday builds on a joint statement all six countries -- the United States, China, Japan, Russia, South and North Korea -- signed in September 2005, which described the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula as their goal, diplomats said.

In exchange for scrapping its nuclear-weapons programs, the North is expected to receive economic and political incentives, such as energy and possibly diplomatic relations with the United States.

Last week, U.S. specialists met in Pyongyang with Mr. Kim, who said North Korea wanted heavy fuel oil and light-water reactors, which it had received for freezing its program in 1994. Both projects were abandoned in 2002 after Washington said Pyongyang was secretly enriching uranium in violation of the deal, known as the Agreed Framework.

Draft Agreement Offered In North Korea Talks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2007

BEIJING — Talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program resumed here Thursday, with China distributing a draft agreement that U.S. and South Korean envoys described today as offering a good start for discussions.

South Korean negotiator Chun Yung-woo and U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill declined to give any details of the draft.

Japan's Kyodo News agency reported today that the draft called for communist North Korea to suspend operations at its nuclear facilities at Yongbyon within two months in exchange for energy aid.

The agreement was drawn up after the first day of six-nation talks among the two Koreas, Japan, the United States, Russia and China.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency said China had proposed five working groups on North Korea's denuclearization, including one on normalizing ties between Pyongyang and Washington.

Yonhap said the one-page draft included timelines for the North's freezing of its key nuclear facilities, including its only operational 5-megawatt reactor, and for the other parties to supply aid and security guarantees.

Any agreement on an initial set of reciprocal moves to implement a September 2005 accord — in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees — would set the stage for the first tangible steps in the often-delayed process.

The 2005 deal, a broad statement of principles that did not outline any concrete steps for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program, was the only agreement since the negotiations began in 2003.

Hill cautioned that much work remained.

"We have to sit down and make sure we agree on every word, every comma. It will be a long day," he said.

At the last session, in the wake of its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test, North Korea refused to even talk about its nuclear programs. Instead, it demanded that the U.S. lift financial restrictions targeting alleged North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

But the U.S. and North Korean nuclear envoys held an unusual one-on-one meeting in Germany last month where differences between the sides were apparently discussed. Pyongyang and Washington held separate talks in Beijing in late January on the financial issue, although it has yet to be resolved.

N. Korea Agrees To Initial Steps To Disarm (USAT)

USA Today, February 9, 2007

Talks on North Korea's nuclear programs resumed Thursday in Beijing, where China distributed a draft agreement and the North agreed in principle to initial steps to disarm. Envoys from six nations are working out details of a September 2005 deal in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees. That deal was a broad statement of principles. The main U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, said the new proposal would be "a set of actions that would have to be taken in a finite amount of time." He declined to give specifics.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Washington that she was "cautiously optimistic" that implementation of the agreement could begin.

Iran warns U.S. of retaliation if attacked

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned that his nation will strike U.S. interests around the world if Iran is attacked. The Bush administration has said it has no plans to strike Iran but has sent a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. Speaking to a gathering of Iranian air force commanders, Khamenei said: "The enemy knows well that any invasion would be followed by a comprehensive reaction to the invaders and their interests all over the world."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said dealings with Iran, and concerns about its nuclear program, are "focused on diplomacy."

British airports reopen after snowfall

Five British airports reopened after workers cleared runways of snow that had fallen up to 6 inches deep in some places. Stansted, Bristol, Birmingham, Luton and Cardiff airports all had reopened by midday. Heathrow, one of Europe's largest airports, remained open but reported 90 cancellations. Hundreds of other flights were canceled throughout the country.

National Rail experienced disruptions across its network, and the Highways Agency warned against all but essential travel. Subway service in London was canceled or delayed after the capital got an inch of snow. The cold interrupted a warm winter. January was Britain's mildest month in more than 90 years, said Wayne Elliott of the Met Office, the U.K.'s weather service.

Congress Urged To Increase Focus On Asia (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, February 9, 2007

The Congressional Research Service has waved a red flag in front of the new Congress, warning that America risks costly conflicts if it does not pay closer attention to the rise of China and other troubles in Asia.

A preoccupation with Iraq and the Middle East means the United States "is not sufficiently focused on the Asia-Pacific at a critical point in the evolution of what may prove to be a new era," says the report from the CRS, an arm of the Library of Congress.

The report says a failure to attend to a less than peaceful rise of China, tensions over Taiwan, and conflict on the Korean Peninsula "has the potential to embroil the United States in a large-scale war that could be very costly in terms of lives, wealth, power, and prestige."

Moreover, terrorist groups in Southeast and South Asia are "a key source of instability, a threat to U.S. forces and interests, and could serve as a catalyst for inter-state conflict," the document says.

The CRS, which describes itself as "the public policy research arm of the United States Congress," provides nonpartisan research and analysis on critical issues and works primarily for members of Congress and their staffs.

Its report echoes comments made last summer in a seminar at the East-West Center, a research and educational institute in Honolulu, where Asians and Americans alike criticized the Bush administration for neglecting Asia.

James Kelly, the assistant secretary who headed the East Asia division of the State Department during President Bush's first term, said: "There is an insufficient realization that Asia has become the center of gravity," meaning the focal point of political, economic and military power. "Policy and strategy toward East Asia," he said, "are not easy to discern."

Similarly, Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to the Philippines and South Korea, said that by 2009 when the next president takes office, power in Asia "will have shifted while we were not paying attention."

Other voices have cautioned that potentially damaging trends in Asia, especially in China, are being overlooked in the United States. Fred Bergsten, an economist and former senior Treasury official, said China's undervalued currency "could have a devastating impact on the global trading system."

"It is obvious that China is extremely reluctant to make the needed changes in its currency policy," he told a House committee two weeks ago. "It is equally obviously that U.S. efforts on the issue over the past three years ... have borne little fruit to date. A new U.S. policy is clearly needed."

The CRS study, written by analyst Bruce Vaughn, says: "The relative lack of attention to Asia comes at a time when the correlates of power are shifting not only with regard to China but elsewhere in Asia."

Therefore, it says, some Asian nations "are beginning to hedge against what they perceive as an increasingly distracted and insufficiently engaged American power."

"This perceived American vulnerability and uncertainty about America's future role in Asia is leading some Asian analysts to predict that the United States will enter into a 'new phase of inner absorption, if not increasing isolationism,' " the report says, quoting Singaporean scholar Eric Teo Chow Cheow.

The congressional researcher said Japan and Australia are seen as solid U.S. allies while the United States has "key strategic relationships" with Singapore, India, Taiwan and Indonesia.

Elsewhere, however, the United States and South Korea "are drifting apart" and Thailand prefers "equidistance" between the United States and China, it says. New Zealand has dropped out of its alliance with the United States and relations are tenuous with the Philippines, which is struggling with an Islamist insurgency in its south.

US Congress Takes Aim At Tokyo Over Yen (FT)

By Eoin Callan, David Pilling, And Peter Garnham

Financial Times, February 9, 2007

Powerful House Democrats are pressing the Bush administration to persuade Tokyo to strengthen the yen, claiming the currency's weakness is bolstering Japanese imports at the expense of US manufacturers.

In a letter to Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, the House members alleged that Tokyo was pursuing a cheap currency to subsidise exporters and urged Mr Paulson "to press the Japanese government to reverse their weak yen policy".

The pressure from Democrats sets up a confrontation with the US Treasury secretary, who argues the yen's weakness reflects Japan's economic fundamentals rather than a deliberate policy of manipulation.

The former head of Goldman Sachs has moved to stiffen the Treasury's resistance to Congress over currency policy and is set to replace the key official responsible for working with Congress on international imbalances.

The Democrats want Mr Paulson to distance himself from Tokyo at the Group of Seven finance ministers meeting starting in Germany today. But he is likely to resist pressure from Congress and European leaders to single out Japan.

The accusation of currency manipulation confirms the fears of executives of Toyota that the company is facing a political backlash on Capitol Hill as it overtakes General Motors as the world's biggest carmaker.

Michigan Representative Sander Levin, chairman of the House trade subcommittee, told the Financial Times: "Japan is clearly following policies to maintain a weak yen."

The yen's fall continued on Thursday, down 0.4 per cent to Y121.20 against the dollar and 0.6 per cent to Y157.90 against the euro.

Japanese exports as a percentage of gross domestic product have – at 16 per cent – surpassed the levels of 1985 when Japan was forced to revalue under pressure from the US.

Takatoshi Ito, a member of the Japanese cabinet's council on fiscal and economic policy, said: "Japan has not intervened since March 2004 – not even oral intervention – so the ministry of finance is clean as market fundamentals push the yen weaker."

Tensions over the yen are set to be reflected in legislation drafted in the Senate on currency manipulation, analysts said.

Representative Barney Frank, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said: "This is directly tied to the administration's efforts to get trade promotion authority renewed. It cannot be the case that we will let the status quo go on."

Bush Plans Latin America Tour (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

President Bush will leave next month on a five-nation tour of Latin America, the White House said Thursday.

Bush and first lady Laura Bush will visit Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico from March 8 to 14.

DOJ_NMG_0130103

"The trip will underscore the commitment of the United States to the Western Hemisphere and will highlight our common agenda to advance freedom, prosperity and social justice and deliver the benefits of democracy in the areas of health, education and economic opportunity," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Snow said immigration would be only one topic of the trip. In Brazil, for instance, Bush will be talking about energy independence and trade. In Bogota, Bush will be discussing Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's work to battle narcoterrorism .

"In Mexico, we're going to be supporting the president's efforts to address poverty, income equality, restoring law and order, fighting the common threats of drug trafficking and strengthening the economic relationship," Snow said.

Republican Candidates Weigh Agendas In Post-Bush Era (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

FISCAL REALITY PINCHES 2008 candidate platforms.

In Detroit economic speech this week, Romney proposes only to extend Bush tax cuts rather than offer new ones. The ex-Massachusetts governor had contemplated lower top individual and corporate tax rates, but was deterred by lost revenue as more upper-middle-class taxpayers seek relief from alternative minimum tax.

On California fund-raising swing, Giuliani will huddle with Schwarzenegger, whose success as a Republican maverick offers a model for the former New York City mayor. Schwarzenegger has highlighted health and environmental issues.

At pep rally for potential donors, Clinton campaign presses backers to sign up as $25,000 "Hill-raisers" by end of next week.

SENATE REPUBLICANS AIM to split Democrats from liberal bloggers on Iraq.

McConnell's insistence on Gregg's war-funding resolution aims to divide antiwar blogosphere from Democrats wary of cutting money for troops. Though squeeze is toughest on 2008 contenders, other Democrats may be forced to wrestle with it for months in votes on war appropriations.

Strain of the fight shows on Republicans' 2008 front-runner McCain, who has become testy amid quickening presidential maneuvers. House Democrats, moving to jump-start debate next week with simpler resolution opposing Iraq troop surge, expect 30 Republicans to defect from Bush.

BUSH HEADS to Chávez's backyard.

In March trip, the president will hopscotch Latin America promoting trade expansion and countering the populist Venezuelan leader's criticism of his intentions. He's expected to praise leaders in Brazil and Uruguay, leftists who are friendly to free-market policies.

In Brazil, Bush faces pressure to lift U.S. import tariffs on ethanol, now receiving emphasis in administration energy policies. Those tariffs hurt Brazilian manufacturers while protecting politically influential American farm states. Treasury chief Paulson also plans Latin American trip next month.

Panamanian President Torrijos meets Bush in Washington next Friday as U.S.-Panama trade talks near completion.

PORT-SECURITY FEARS could shape congressional debate on U.S.-Peru trade pact. House Democrats Murtha of Pennsylvania and Taylor of Mississippi warn Dubai Ports World has operations in Peru and could gain "new rights" to operate in U.S. under the deal. A spokesman for U.S. Trade Representative Schwab calls that concern "a red herring," noting exceptions in the agreement for national security.

PRIORITIES: Bush's 2008 budget proposal aims to spend $25 million for assessing vulnerabilities of thousands of hazardous facilities to terrorist attack. It calls for $53.6 million to protect 2008 presidential candidates.

HOME COOKING? Treasury Secretary Paulson, a Goldman Sachs veteran, may look to corporate banking circles to fill department's top international post. Departing incumbent Tim Adams has worked mostly in government, serving both Bush presidencies.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS? Though Bush team has strained relations with press, Health and Human Services department has begun meeting with reporters in major U.S. cities to discuss getting word out if flu pandemic hits. Goal is to " learn from the media the kind of things they want to know," says spokeswoman Suzy DeFrancis.

INTELLECTUALS HUSTLE to keep pace with accelerating political debate.

Democratic national-security strategists Kurt Campbell and Michelle Flournoy leave the Center for Strategic and International Studies to create a "centrist" brain trust: the Center for a New American Security. One board member is former White House chief of staff John Podesta, who runs Hillary-friendly Center for American Progress.

But "we will be strictly nonpartisan," says Flournoy, noting the center is courting moderate Republicans as well.

Venezuela To Nationalize Power Company (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — President Hugo Chavez's government moved to nationalize Venezuela's largest private electric company on Thursday, signing an agreement to buy a controlling stake in Electricidad de Caracas from its U.S.-based owner, AES Corp.

The sale agreement was signed by Paul Hanrahan, president and chief executive of Arlington, Va.-based AES, during a ceremony at the presidential palace in Caracas, agreeing to pass the company's 82-percent stake in the utility to the Venezuelan government within 30 days.

Venezuela will pay some $739.3 million for AES' share in Electricidad de Caracas, said Rafael Ramirez, president of state oil company Petroleos de Venezuela SA. He said the company is valued at $900 million as a whole.

Ramirez said minority shareholders, including employees and retirees of the company, would have "the option to stay with us in the new state company or of course to sell us their shares."

"We are preserving the interest of the minority shareholders," said Ramirez, who signed along with Vice President Jorge Rodriguez on behalf of the government.

Ramirez and Rodriguez shook hands with Hanrahan after the ceremony.

The deal marks the first of multiple nationalization moves planned by Chavez since he was re-elected in December. The Venezuelan president also plans to nationalize other smaller companies in the electrical sector, as well as the country's largest telephone company, CA Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, CANTV.

Electricidad de Caracas has been privately owned since its founding in 1885. U.S.-based AES, a global power company that today has businesses in 26 countries, bought a majority stake of Electricidad de Caracas in a hostile takeover in 2000.

Two More In Britain Exposed To Isotope (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

Two more people have shown signs of low-level exposure to polonium-210, the radioactive isotope that killed former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, British health authorities said Thursday.

The Health Protection Agency said one was a staff member at the Sheraton Hotel in London's Park Lane and the second visited a bar at London's Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1, the same day as Litvinenko.

Russian businessman Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB agent, and business associate Dimitri Kovtun met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel bar on the morning he fell ill. The hotel is among a number of sites investigators found traces of the radioactive isotope responsible for killing Litvinenko.

Health officials said the two who tested as having been exposed to the radioactive isotope were likely to face only a small risk of long-term health effects.

Of the 13 people who previously tested positive for contamination since Litvinenko was poisoned, eight worked at the Millennium Hotel.

Litvinenko was a vocal Kremlin critic who accused Russian authorities of being behind deadly 1999 apartment building bombings that stoked support for a renewed offensive against separatists in Chechnya.

He died from polonium-210 poisoning in a London hospital Nov. 23, and in a deathbed statement accused President Vladimir Putin of being behind his killing.

British Deny 'Witch Hunt' In Arrest Of Muslim (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 8 — The British police on Thursday arrested an outspoken advocate of fiery Islamic views, a week after seizing nine people accused of a separate conspiracy to kidnap and kill a Muslim British soldier.

The arrests brought accusations on Thursday of a witch hunt against Muslims, but high government officials rejected the idea.

The man arrested on Thursday is Abu Izzadeen, a 31-year-old former spokesman for the militant and now outlawed the group Al Ghurabaa.

DOJ_NMG_0130105

Mr. Izzadeen initially achieved prominence after the subway and bus bombings in London in July 2005, when four Muslim suicide bombers killed 52 people on London's transit system. At that time, he called the attacks "praiseworthy." Earlier this week, a British television report said Internet images showed Mr. Izzadeen saying in 2004 that Muslims who joined the British Army should be beheaded under Islamic law.

His arrest on Thursday, however, was related to a speech in Birmingham last summer, the police said, and was carried out under counterterrorism laws forbidding the encouragement of terrorism.

Mr. Izzadeen, who was born in a Christian family from Jamaica and named Trevor Brooks, seized headlines in September when he confronted the home secretary, John Reid, at a meeting in east London, after Mr. Reid had suggested that British Muslim parents should watch their children for signs of radicalism. Mr. Izzadeen accused him loudly of being "an enemy of Islam and Muslims."

Referring to Thursday's arrest, one of his allies, Anjem Choudhury, said, "The Muslim community are subject to a witch hunt, and I see this as a continuation of that witch hunt by the Blair regime."

A similar charge was leveled on Thursday by Abu Bakr, a graduate student of political Islam from Birmingham. Mr. Bakr was one of nine people seized last week when the police rounded up suspects in what the authorities called a conspiracy to capture an off-duty British Muslim soldier and broadcast images of his beheading on the Internet. Mr. Bakr and another suspect were released without charges on Wednesday and a judge gave the government 72 hours to present evidence against the others.

[Early Friday, the police issued a statement saying that five of the men had been charged, one more had been released and one was still being held, (a news agency) reported.]

"It's not a police state for everybody else because these terror laws are designed specifically for Muslims, and that's quite an open fact," Mr. Bakr told the BBC in an interview on Thursday.

Mr. Bakr's accusations stirred a familiar unease among those who maintained that Britain's Islamic minority of fewer than two million had been unfairly singled out and stigmatized since before the bombings of July 2005.

Muslims who project themselves as moderate distanced themselves on Thursday from Mr. Izzadeen. Inayat Bunglawala, a spokesman for the Muslim Council of Britain, an umbrella organization for Muslim groups, called him "a character who has made some incendiary remarks in the past."

But Mr. Bunglawala went on to say that there would be "some cynicism" among Muslims about the fact that the arrest came so soon after the release without charge of the two men in Birmingham.

Government officials seemed to line up to protest any suggestion that Britain's counterterrorism laws might constitute an infringement of democratic principles.

"It is a gross caricature of the political process in this country," said Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman, who customarily speaks without being identified by name.

Jack Straw, the leader of the House of Commons, declared, "We should not give excuse or quarter to those who claim this country is a police state — that is absolute, utter nonsense."

Gordon Brown, chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Blair's expected successor, told Sky News television, "I think people know Britain around the world as a country that stands up for liberty, where we do not act arbitrarily, where the police act within the law."

Chirac Discusses Life After Politics In TV Interview (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 8 — President Jacques Chirac, in remarks that his office confirmed Thursday, has given his first hint that he may not run for a third term in the French elections in April.

"I have always tried to act for the French and for the idea that I had of France," he said, according to a transcript of remarks released by his office that are a portion of a television interview to be broadcast Sunday. "And the day I will no longer have responsibilities of this nature, well, I will try to serve France, the French, in another way."

The interviewer responded, "So there is a life after politics?" to which Mr. Chirac replied, "There is without a doubt a life after politics."

Mr. Chirac's office played down the significance of his comments, saying they were of a general nature. "To a completely timeless question, the president responded in a completely timeless way, and the president's answer therefore brings no information about the decision that he has said he will announce in due time," a spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0130106

The 20-minute interview was taped three weeks ago and is to be broadcast Sunday, as part of a show about his wife, Bernadette Chirac. The rest of that show was taped in front of an audience on Wednesday, and some French news media picked up the remarks and reported them.

Mr. Chirac has promised to make his decision known during the first quarter of the year. According to election rules in France, candidacies must be declared by March 15. Upon watching the taped interview on Wednesday, Ms. Chirac said of Élysée Palace, where she and her husband live, "I will miss this house very much, but I'll adapt," according to the French daily Le Monde.

Of late, commentators have noted the reassignments of some of Mr. Chirac's closest aides to coveted posts away from the president's chambers. But a number of legislative issues coming up in late February mean that Mr. Chirac may not be in a rush to make his decision known.

The issue is of importance to Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and Mr. Chirac's former protégé, who is running on the ticket of Mr. Chirac's UMP party. His primary opponent is Ségolène Royal of the Socialists.

Civic Groups Seek To Amend Law On Insults To Turkish State (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

ISTANBUL, Feb. 8 — A group of civic organizations on Thursday submitted suggestions for rewording a section of the Turkish penal code under which noted intellectuals and writers had been charged with the crime of insulting the Turkish identity and the state.

But some critics of the law say it should be revoked, not amended.

After the killing last month of an Armenian-Turkish journalist, Hrant Dink, some critics said the law, known as Article 301, was partly responsible. According to this argument, Mr. Dink's conviction under the article for comments he made about the genocide in which more than a million Armenians were killed by the Ottoman Turk government from 1915 to 1918 made him a traitor in the eyes of many Turks and put his life in jeopardy.

For Turkey, the Armenian issue is among the thorniest issues of free speech. The courts have interpreted the use of the word genocide in reference to the killings as an "insult against the Turkish state" under Article 301.

Last year, after harsh criticism by the European Union, the government said it was receptive to changing the law but not abolishing it.

The proposal submitted on Thursday, signed by 10 civic organizations, tried to make a distinction between illegal language and legal criticism. Instead of outlawing "insulting Turkishness" it proposed new wording that would outlaw "openly abasing and deriding" the Turkish identity.

That was not enough for one civic group, the Turkish Chamber of Doctors, which broke with the umbrella group and accused the government of trying to evade responsibility for the law for fear of losing voters in November's general elections. "Changes are only a facade and can never prevent bitter consequences, as we've witnessed with Mr. Dink's murder," said Gencay Gurun, the group's general secretary.

Perihan Magden, a journalist who is one of a number of people given security protection by the government after Mr. Dink's death, said the suggested changes were too mild to make a difference.

"The fact that I have to live in my own country under police protection is a government acknowledgment that something is wrong," she said.

Another Bad Idea From The Kremlin (NYT)

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

The Russian energy minister, Viktor Khristenko, piously declared on Tuesday that Russia's meetings with other gas producers were intended only to improve energy security, and that any talk of a cartel was the product of a "sick imagination." A curious insistence since the idea of a cartel has been raised by President Vladimir Putin, who recently called OPEC-like cooperation with Iran for gas "an interesting idea" — though, of course, its goal would be to better serve customers, not fix prices.

The Kremlin is full of disturbing and counterproductive ideas these days on how it can wield its energy resources, not to mention shield its economic client Iran from international pressure. And if it looks as if a cartel might serve Mr. Putin's ambitions, the world should pay close attention.

There are reasons why a gas cartel could not work like an oil cartel. Gas is generally delivered over pipelines and is expensive to store, leaving sellers as well as buyers dependant on long-term contracts. Moscow has also stayed out of OPEC.

What arouses anxiety over the new cartel talk — especially in Europe, which relies on Russia for more than a quarter of its natural gas — is the fact that Mr. Putin has already managed to get most of Russia's energy production and distribution under the Kremlin's control.

Even as Mr. Putin and the state gas monopoly, Gazprom, insist that they are reliable suppliers, their record is far different. They destroyed a defiant domestic oil company, Yukos, tried to muscle Ukraine and Belarus into turning over their portions of the old Soviet pipeline network, and leaned on Shell to gain control over the Sakhalin gas project.

Mr. Putin needs to understand that Russia's long-term economic and strategic interests depend on its playing by the international rules, rather than breaking them. Russia is still not capable of developing its oil and gas by itself, and the expertise it needs lies almost entirely in the West. So yes, Mr. Khristenko, number us among those who mistrust the Kremlin — and prove us wrong.

Not Their Parents' Russia (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 9, 2007

MOSCOW

Russia today is a country that takes three hands to describe.

On the one hand, it is impossible any more to call Vladimir Putin's government "democratic," given the way it has neutered the Russian Parliament, intimidated or taken over much of the Russian press, subordinated the judiciary and coercively extended its control over the country's key energy companies.

On the other hand, it is obvious talking to Russians how much the humiliating and dispiriting turmoil that accompanied Boris Yeltsin's first stab at democracy — after the collapse of Communism — left many people here starved for a strong leader, a stable economy and stores with Western consumer goods. Mr. Putin is popular for a reason.

And on the third hand, while today's Russia may be a crazy quilt of capitalist czars, mobsters, nationalists and aspiring democrats, it is not the totalitarian Soviet Union. It has more than a touch of the authoritarianism of postwar Gaullist France and a large spoonful of the corruption and messiness of postwar Italy — when those countries emerged from World War II as less than perfect democracies.

But 60 years later, after huge growth in their per capita incomes, France and Italy now help to anchor Western Europe. For all of their shortcomings, their postwar governments provided the context for the true democratic agent of change to come of age — something that takes 9 months and 21 years to produce — a generation raised on basically free markets and free politics. I still think Russia will follow a similar path — in time.

"In historical terms, the transition will be very fast," Boris Makarenko, deputy chief of Russia's Center for Political Technologies, said to me. "But I am 47. I am in a hurry. I am very optimistic [though] for my daughter, who is 15. ... I can see the normal middle class rising here. It's all about shape and pace. When will we get there, I don't know — we will get there, but probably not fast enough for me to see."

The Yeltsin democratic experiment is over, to be sure, added Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Carnegie Endowment's Moscow office, "because it was delegitimized by the 1998 ruble crash and because it was a time of supreme corruption and dominance by oligarchs — but the Russian democratic experiment is not over because Russia is such a changed place."

Ms. Gottemoeller, an American, told me she recently visited Ulyanovsk, Lenin's birthplace, in the heart of Russia's aging industrial rust belt, and went out to dinner with three Russian couples, all new entrepreneurs.

"After they plied me with drinks," she recalled, "they said: 'O.K., we have a question. We want to know how you define middle class' — and did I think they were middle class? And that just flummoxed me. ... They wanted to know what middle class was in America. It meant a lot to them to think they were linked up to a broader community of middle class. ... [They] are not out in the streets with a banner, but their aspirations are huge and in the right direction."

People who identify themselves as middle class often end up fighting for legal and civil rights to protect their gains, without even knowing they are fighting for them. That said, the pace of democratization here will most likely depend on three things.

One is whether this emerging middle class gets so preoccupied with material gains — thanks to the trickle-down of high oil and gas prices — that "it just disconnects from politics," Ms. Gottemoeller noted. (Russia today has more cellphones than people!) Another is the genie of Russian nationalism, which can always pop up and derail democratization. Just down the street from my hotel, the Movement Against Illegal Immigration held a march denouncing Jews and immigrants.

Third is the price of oil and gas. Anyone who observes Russia can see that the price of oil and the pace of freedom here operate with an inverse correlation. As oil prices go down the pace of freedom goes up, because Russia has to open itself more to the world and empower its people to get ahead. As oil prices go up the pace of freedom goes down, because the government can get by drilling oil wells, rather than unleashing its people.

"When oil prices became higher, the reforms became slower," said Vladimir Ryzhkov, a liberal Russian Duma member from Altay. "Russia became a more closed country with a more state-oriented economy. Last year we saw record oil prices and not one reform. [That is the] reason Freedom House last year proclaimed Russia a 'non-free country. ' ... The question for you Americans is: When will prices go down? It is the only hope for us Russian democrats."

Mikhail Khodorkovsky (WSJ)

By Robert R. Amsterdam

The Wall Street Journal, February 9, 2007

The Kremlin this week showed that democracy, human rights and the rule of law are dead in Vladimir Putin's Russia. With extraordinarily cynical timing, new charges -- this time, money-laundering -- were brought against Mikhail Khodorkovsky, who once ran Russia's largest oil company, Yukos. These charges have nothing to do with upholding Russia's laws. They have everything to do with the fact that Mr. Khodorkovsky would have been eligible for parole later this year, having served half his eight-year sentence on a politically motivated tax evasion conviction handed down in 2005. Another show trial will surely propel the machinery of so-called justice toward another preordained guilty verdict.

The fresh case means that Mr. Khodorkovsky will be unable to support democratic opposition parties in December's Duma elections or the 2008 "presidential coronation." And it means that the Kremlin will continue to wield pervasive control over the energy sector in which he had done so much to promote market-based competition and growth.

Before his arrest in 2003, Mr. Khodorkovsky set out his vision for Russia. He encouraged the development of civil society and the growth of alternative political parties. He worked to provide schools across with access to the Internet and supported charitable and cultural programs. He publicly confronted the president about the need to stamp out corruption in Russia.

When it became clear that the state did not share his vision and was not going to tolerate dissent, Mr. Khodorkovsky did not flee. He cooperated with the justice system -- convinced of his innocence, and convinced, also, that he could challenge what seemed to be an attempt by corrupt officials to intimidate him. He did not foresee how ruthlessly the law would be disregarded in the Kremlin's drive to crush him. Nor did anyone quite foresee the blatant theft of Yukos assets.

By jailing Mr. Khodorkovsky and stealing Yukos, the Putin regime cleared the energy sector of any competitors. It enabled the Kremlin to use energy as a political weapon against Russia's immediate neighbors and the whole of Europe. Mr. Khodorkovsky and his company, in other words, had to be destroyed for Mr. Putin's non-market, state corporatism and energy imperialism to thrive. So now, no one will build competing pipelines; no one will advocate the breakup of state monopolies; no one will promote the corporate governance and transparency that are anathemas to the state-owned enterprises. The new charges against Mr. Khodorkovsky are, in fact, intended to provide a smokescreen for the Russian government's illegal sale, later this year, of the remaining assets of Yukos, valued at $33 billion, to those very companies.

The Russian regime has lost the moral authority to dispense justice. Its exploitation of prosecutorial and regulatory powers, though shielded by state immunity, has become criminal. Selective enforcement of tax and environmental laws is the favored means of stealing assets from both domestic and foreign owners. Extortion is entrenched as a method of acquisition by the state.

The Yukos saga was followed late last year by the shakedown of Royal Dutch Shell at its Sakhalin-2 project. With each such case, the Kremlin is less concerned about even keeping up pretenses. Moscow calculates it has space to maneuver around legal and moral obligations, whether with respect to existing treaties, or negotiations over developing the giant Shtokman gas field, or its commitments to supply gas and oil dependably without political interference.

When Mr. Khodorkovsky was interrogated about the new charges, he declared that he had no faith in Russian justice, and that he will refuse to cooperate with the prosecutors in another politically driven farce of a trial. This week he appealed to the world not for himself but for all Russians: "Their only chance is the timely voluntary transfer of power in Russia by the means of honest, fair and transparent elections. . . . [The new president] should have nothing in common with the giant corruption machine that has paralyzed Russia."

Even in a Siberian gulag, Mr. Khodorkovsky has the courage to say: Enough! His fate is far more important than most people in the West realize. Some Western leaders such as Angela Merkel of Germany and José Manuel Barroso of the European Commission have raised his case with the Russian president. The dictatorial feathers were not ruffled and both were summarily brushed off. And so, another Khodorkovsky trial will soon be upon us. Let's be sure that this time we all recognize that Mikhail Khodorkovsky's fight is for the future of Russia and its relationship with the rest of the world.

Mr. Amsterdam is international defense counsel for Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and is based in London after being deported from Russia.

Turkmenistan Awaits First 'Free' Elections (CSM)

By Fred Weir

DOJ_NMG_0130109

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

MOSCOW

The political ice may finally be cracking in the gas-rich, desert nation of Turkmenistan. Its 6 million people will get their first ever chance to vote in multicandidate elections this Sunday in polls to replace longtime strongman Saparmurat Niyazov, who died in December without naming an heir.

But the appearance of choice may be illusory, analysts say, making the Central Asian nation's first election more the stuff of hype than history.

Six contenders are vying openly for the post left vacant by the self-titled "Azim Turkmenbashi" (Great Father of the Turkmen), who ruled with an iron fist – and increasingly erratic style – for 21 years. Experts say that five of the candidates, mostly second-tier regional officials, are merely window dressing and victory has been pre-ordained for acting president Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, a former deputy premier who won the brief power struggle following Niyazov's death.

However, Mr. Berdymukhammedov has pledged to institute cautious liberal reforms, and there are signs that Turkmenistan's hitherto ironclad dependence on Russia's Gazprom to handle its gas exports might also change.

"The Turkmenbashi's death has shaken the regime, and at least opened up the possibility of positive changes," says Irina Zvigelskaya, an analyst with the official Institute of Oriental Studies in Moscow. "But, at this point, no one really knows what we're dealing with. The new leader could hardly be just like Niyazov, but there are no guarantees that he won't choose the same despotic model of rule."

But the potential for a departure from the old politics of Turkmenistan, which holds the world's fifth-largest gas reserves, has excited great interest in the global energy community.

In 2003 Niyazov signed a 25-year contract with Gazprom, affording the Russian gas giant near total control over Turkmenistan's gas exports. But last year, Niyazov signed a tentative deal with Beijing, under which large quantities of Turkmen gas would be sold to China beginning in 2009.

The US would like to see Turkmenistan ship its gas and oil across the Caspian Sea, where it could be loaded into the new Baku- Ceyhan pipeline and transported to Western markets. In the 1990s there was talk – which has never completely died down – of building a pipeline south, through Afghanistan, to deliver Turkmen gas to the hungry markets of the Indian subcontinent.

"Niyazov used to say that Turkmenistan has enough gas to feed Russia, China, and India, too, but geologists are not so sure," says Mikhail Krutikhin, editor of Russian Energy Weekly, a Moscow-based trade journal. "The new leaders of Turkmenistan will basically have to decide whether the gas should flow north to Russia, or east to China. I fear that Gazprom has not been paying enough attention to Turkmenistan lately, so the Chinese might win this race."

Some experts speculate that real power is in the hands of the chief of Niyazov's palace guard, Akmurad Rejepov, a shadowy former Soviet KGB official. Under the Constitution, the speaker of parliament, Ovezgeldy Atayev, should have become acting leader after Niyazov's demise. Instead, Mr. Atayev found himself in prison facing an unspecified "criminal investigation."

The Halk Maslahaty (Peoples' Council), a megaparliament of 3,000 members that met once a year under Niyazev, was hastily summoned to appoint Berdymukhammedov as acting president. It also approved the six candidates for the presidency – all of whom were required to swear allegiance to Niyazov's political policies.

Exiled opposition politicians who have tried to enter Turkmenistan have been turned away at the border. Few foreign journalists have been granted visas to cover the polls, and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which normally fields election observers, has decided to sit this one out due to "time constraints" on forming a delegation.

In an interview with Radio Free Europe, the chair of the European Union's interparliamentary mission to Turkmenistan, Albert Jan Maat, said that "these elections [are] only with candidates from the former government – you can't call them real elections – and that is not a start for a more open society."

Nevertheless, experts say it's reasonable to hope that the harsh repression and wild extravagance that marked the Turkmenbashi's rule may ease. Niyazov jailed thousands of opponents, expelled ethnic Russians, and jammed news broadcasts from Moscow. He slashed social services, abolished old age pensions, and ordered the number of school years for children reduced. He banned ballet and opera as "alien," and forbade men to wear beards or teenagers to play video games.

At the same time, he squandered the country's export earnings from gas and cotton on lavish monuments to himself and his deceased mother, and renamed the months of the year after himself, his mother, and various relatives. A year ago, fearful of palace plots, Niyazov ordered all doctors to swear a personal oath to himself instead of the Hippocratic Oath.

"Everything is known in advance. Berdymukhammedov will win," exiled Turkmen journalist Bytyr Mukhammedov told the Russian daily Moskovsky Komsomolets. The front-runner has been quoted by the official Turkmen press as pledging to boost social services, restore pensions, privatize some industries, permit people to build their own homes, restore transport links with Russia, and even allow citizens to access the Internet. "Changes are already being implemented, and I think the new regime will evolve slowly toward civilization," said Mr. Mukhammedov.

New Advocacy Group Aims To Point Up Atrocities In Africa (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

Veteran Africa activists, frustrated by the slow response from Sudan's government to international demands to ease the plight of refugees in Darfur, are regrouping to take their fight to the next level.

A new group, calling itself Enough, has joined the growing list of nongovernmental peacemaking organizations. Its aim, the founders said, is to tap into the grass-roots awareness and sense of rage generated by the Darfur crisis and create a social and political network that can identify potential wide-scale atrocities, particularly in Africa, and stop them before they occur.

The three co-founders are Gayle E. Smith, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, who was previously an officer with the State Department and the National Security Council; Africa expert John Prendergast, a senior adviser at the International Crisis Group who also served at State and the NSC in the Clinton administration; and Colin Thomas-Jensen, Africa research and advocacy manager for the International Crisis Group and a former official with the U.S. Agency for International Development.

"We've got people's attention on Darfur. While we have it, there are other raging fires such as Uganda and the Congo, and it is more cost-effective to act in concert," Smith said. "I am both excited and moved by the activism on Africa and what has happened in the last 30 years. . . . It is breathtaking."

In a survey by the Pew Research Center conducted in December, 51 percent of American respondents said they thought the United States had a responsibility to do something about ethnic violence in Darfur, and 53 percent were in favor of U.S. troops in Darfur as part of a multinational force to help end ethnic genocide there.

"It's a neat idea. When you build up such a large grass-roots base, it would be a shame to let it die away once a crisis is finished. It would be great to have a system to take care of future conflicts," said Amjad Atallah, president of Strategic Assessments Initiative and an adviser to the Save Darfur Coalition, an alliance of organizations committed to protecting civilians in Darfur.

"So much of the campaigning has been effective in raising awareness, which is crucial, but ineffective in affecting policy. We won't just focus on one crisis. We want to show the linkages and common roots between the crises in Congo, Northern Uganda and Sudan," Prendergast said Monday by e-mail from Uganda, where he is touring with actor Ryan Gosling.

Prendergast said the object was to feed the growing movement against genocide and make it more comprehensive. "Ultimately, our goal is to help reorganize our government's ability to prevent and respond to the commission of crimes against humanity as a fundamental objective of U.S. foreign policy, just as promoting trade and countering terrorism is today," he said.

The founders' experience in government and in relief work in Africa will add another dimension to the grass-roots activism that began on campuses nationwide. Stark images from Darfur of emaciated, gangly refugees on the edge between life and death have entered the American consciousness through a variety of documentaries and other television shows.

"We are going to develop a committed core of people, which is not so much a lobbying group as one that can drive up the political temperature," Prendergast said, spelling out the new group's agenda. "How do we restructure diplomatically? What we want to do is make existing movements smarter and build a better infrastructure within the government. How to restructure intelligence networks to set alarm bells in motion? How do we provide assistance to existing peacekeeping operations and, more importantly, protect civilians?"

Some ideas the group discussed include monthly analysis briefings, workshops on shaping the congressional budget process, and regional training for advocacy.

At the request of the Save Darfur Coalition, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) led a delegation last month to Sudan's capital, Khartoum, to meet with President Omar Hassan al-Bashir. The group hoped to tease out written commitments on the deployment of peacekeeping troops, the establishment of humanitarian delivery corridors, and the clear marking of government planes to avoid confusion between attack aircraft and relief drops.

S. Daniel Abrahams, a Slimfast magnate and philanthropist, offered his private jet, and the State Department gave its consent for the trip. A couple of days after the trip, a 60-day cease-fire collapsed.

Richardson said in an interview this week that some advances were made "in the right direction," such as a pledge to reduce the red tape delaying permits for Sudanese relief workers hoping to work in Darfur. Most previous diplomatic efforts with Bashir have failed.

DOJ_NMG_0130111

"I'm going to make Darfur an issue," said Richardson, who announced his bid for the presidency one week after returning from Sudan in January. "We need to start thinking about Africa and about repairing our relations with the Muslim world. Our obsession with Iraq has caused us to neglect poverty issues. "

"I think candidates of both parties at some point are going to be asked about Darfur," Smith said. "In 2004 there were questions about Darfur in the debate. We expect everyone running for president will get a question on Darfur."

More than 185 organizations are members of the Save Darfur Coalition, which has a highly efficient system for collecting online donations, obtaining grants and foundation money, and gathering sizable contributions from individuals and celebrities. Enough is likely to tap into the same pool of funding.

Richardson met with U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon to push the Sudan agenda, and he welcomed the intensified efforts of the civic groups. "It is very healthy to have such groups," he said. "There are a number of ethnic wars in Africa . . . unfolding tragedies. We cannot as a nation have any more Rwandas."

Frist Joins Evangelist Graham On Trip To South Sudan (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, February 9, 2007

JUBA, Sudan -- The jet took off Wednesday morning headed for Juba, the fledgling regional capital of southern Sudan and a place at the moment resembling a hot and sandy construction site.

In the pilot seat was Franklin Graham, son of evangelist Billy Graham. And in the entourage were several members of his Christian charity group, Samaritan's Purse, along with former Senate majority leader, onetime rumored presidential contender and, for now, surgeon and civilian Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

He had traveled to the group's far-flung health clinics before to operate on patients who, he granted, often had no idea who he was. The mission this time was a meeting with leaders of the semiautonomous region that only recently emerged from one of the bloodiest and longest-running civil wars on the continent.

But a U.S.-backed peace agreement between the southern Sudanese and the government in Khartoum is faltering badly as world attention has shifted to Darfur, the western region of the country where the government is accused of waging a campaign of violence that the United States and others have labeled genocide.

In the south, the conflict revolved mainly around oil-rich areas along a disputed border with the north. Like Darfur, it is layered with an ethnic dimension. But unlike Darfur, the conflict had a religious dimension and was cast at times as a war of persecution by the mostly Arab and Muslim government against the darker-skinned southerners, who mainly practice Christianity and indigenous religions.

It is that religious facet that has continued to draw in U.S. evangelical groups such as Samaritan's Purse, which has provided humanitarian relief in the region for a decade. Graham, who recounted with some relish diving into foxholes during wartime trips to the region, said his group has counted at least 500 destroyed churches amid a wider landscape of ruin. He was heading to Juba to tell leaders of his intention to rebuild all of them, he said.

The jet landed before noon in a cloud of sandy dust.

By then, about 90 flights had already buzzed into the small but busy airport, most carrying contractors who are building roads and government ministries from scratch, and living in encampments of tents that are so in demand that they rent at times for more than $150 a night.

A group of two dozen southern Sudanese leaders greeted Graham, Frist and the rest on the runway, and soon a convoy of trucks, SUVs and sirens was rumbling down the reddish dirt roads.

The first stop was the headquarters of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), the former rebel group that runs the region.

"We call it the wild west," Barnaba Marial Benjamin, the minister of regional cooperation, said to the visiting Americans. "You put down your tent under the tree, and you begin something."

Benjamin told Frist and Graham about all the roads that have been built -- "A miracle," he said -- but as the meeting continued, the news about the peace process was decidedly mixed.

Pagan Amum, secretary general of the SPLM, accused the ruling party in Khartoum of orchestrating an attempt to undermine the hard-won Comprehensive Peace Agreement in advance of a vote on secession scheduled for 2011.

Specifically, he said, the government is cheating the south out of oil revenue, building up its forces in the crucial, oil-rich Abyei province and dragging its feet on resolving the border demarcation, all in violation of the agreement reached two years ago. Amum also accused the government of funding militias to harass and drive away contractors.

"These are calculations for something bigger," he said. "It is part of a major plan."

DOJ_NMG_0130112

Among other things, Frist asked about the availability of clean water. Benjamin explained that water was a problem: bullet holes in water tanks, toxic asbestos pipes. But soon it was time to go, and after firm handshakes and thank-yous, the convoy took off again.

The line of white trucks and vans rolled through town, kicking up dust as people stopped a moment to stare, then went back to hauling wood planks, selling cinder blocks and digging trenches.

More than 100,000 refugees have returned to the south in the past year or so, including Miyong Kuon, who lived in Omaha during the war and was among the crowd following Graham's group. Though there is little in Juba to love besides sand and sky and heat, Kuon said it still felt like home. "Even if it's a tent, home is home," he said.

Kuon waited while Frist and Graham met with the southern Sudanese president, Salva Kiir Mayardit, a tall, bearded man who wore a black bowler-style hat.

After the meeting, Kiir told reporters that in his view, the central government "lacks the political will" to implement the peace agreement, but he also blamed "extremists in both camps" -- including his own -- for blocking progress.

"We are all convinced that going back to war will not be the solution," Kiir said.

Frist told the crowd that he would report back to whoever would listen that southern Sudanese were committed to peace but that more outside oversight was necessary to make it work. Then, the convoy took off again.

In the late afternoon, the group met with an SPLM general and finally with the energetic speaker of parliament, who urged the U.S. government to consider Darfur and southern Sudan as different manifestations of the same, problematic Khartoum government.

Graham told the speaker that God had not abandoned the people of southern Sudan.

Afterward, the group posed for photos amid half-constructed buildings and low, twisted trees. And about 5 p.m., the convoy headed back to the airport.

Chinese Leader's Almost Triumphal Trip To Africa (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 9, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA AND LUSAKA, ZAMBIA

Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Africa started out last week with the usual manly handshakes, red-carpet strolls, factory visits, and displays of African dance and music.

This tour – which includes Cameroon, Liberia, Sudan, Zambia, Namibia, South Africa, Mozambique, and the Seychelles, – serves to fulfill promises China made at a glitzy Beijing summit in November, where 48 African heads of state heard Mr. Hu pledge to double aid to Africa by 2009 and create an investment fund of $5 billion in the next three years.

By the end of 2006, China had already invested nearly $8 billion in Africa, mainly for extracting minerals and oil to fuel its booming economy, and during this trip, Hu has brought with him more loans and a veritable army of Chinese investors.

But the farther south Hu traveled this week, the more skepticism he met. Hu canceled a visit to Zambia's copper belt, fearing protests over low pay and poor working conditions at Chinese- run mines. In the lead-up to Zambia's Sept. 28 elections, runner-up presidential candidate Michael Sata promised to kick out the Chinese if he had won. In South Africa, President Thabo Mbeki recently warned his fellow African leaders not to allow Chinese investment to become a "colonial relationship."

At least one message of this trip: President Hu, the African honeymoon is over.

"Mbeki's speech reflects a deeper concern that is more addressed to Africans than to the Chinese," says Francis Kornegay, a senior researcher at the Center for Policy Studies in Johannesburg. "The Africans have to set the parameters of the relationship and know what they are getting out of the relationship."

Such caution on the part of a few African countries – concentrated in the south of the continent – doesn't mean that African leaders are ready to give China the boot. To the contrary, Hu's visit has been a rather triumphant follow-through on promises made during the Beijing summit.

At his first stop in Cameroon, Hu pledged $100 million in grants and soft loans. Last week, Hu and Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa launched a new copper-mining partnership, which, they say, will produce thousands of jobs, $800 million in investment – and plenty of copper for China's growing economy.

"It is in China's national interest and in Africa's interest to have a trading partnership," says Pieter Snyman, director of The Beijing Axis, a consultancy that helps South African companies do business with China. "African leaders find China to be more sympathetic to African needs than the West. Africa does not need just money or somebody to get infrastructure projects. It has to be a sustained relationship, and that's up to the Africans to get what they want out of it."

What Africans want, of course, differs from country to country. In Sudan, where Hu visited last week, leaders sought more investment in the oil industry and in refining. In South Africa, business and political leaders seemed eager to push China to accept more African imports into their markets. And in resource-rich but impoverished countries like Zambia, political leaders and workers alike were pushing for better wages, and a bigger cut in the profits from mining.

Anger in Zambia

"They are just using us – we are like tools. They come here to invest, but at the end of the month they just pay us peanuts," says Likezo Mukumbi, a security guard at a shopping complex in Zambia's capital, Lusaka. Mr. Mukumbi says the Zambian government should do more to ensure that the Chinese are treating Zambians fairly.

Sentiments like that fueled the presidential bid of Mr. Sata, a shrewd and charismatic former government minister, during September's national elections. Sata threatened to run "exploiter" Chinese investors out of town, drawing cheers from many of Zambia's urban poor. Sata said he would recognize Taiwan as an independent nation if elected, and drew a rebuke from China's ambassador in Zambia, who suggested that China would cut ties with Zambia if Sata was elected – calling into question China's avowed policy of noninterference in local politics.

Low wages and safety concerns at Chinese-run mines have drawn the ire of Zambian labor unions and mining communities. Concern built to outrage when an explosion at a Chinese-run Chambishi mine killed 51 Zambian miners in 2005. Hu's delegation canceled plans to visit Chambishi during his visit amid rumors of potential protests.

Mining accidents are not the only aspect of the Chinese presence that irks many Zambians. In recent years, an influx of Chinese traders and other small-businesspeople have begun operating in local markets, selling inexpensive Chinese clothes and other imports, and putting pressure on local entrepreneurs.

It is this same issue of competition that has begun to irk South African manufacturers and retailers, says Raymond Louw, editor of the Southern African Report, in Johannesburg. But unlike Zambia, the pressure has not built to the point where it spills out into street protests.

China's ability to launch business partnerships, and also to offer massive loans for infrastructure clearly gives it the advantage over multinational corporations, who come just to do business. It also comes without all the colonial baggage that British, French, and even US companies carry.

Avoiding colonialism

"Africa has a long history with colonial powers, and the colonial powers ripped off Africa, period," says a former South African diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Then along comes China, this emerging giant, and they play a very clever game. They want certain things from certain parts of the world, and they say, 'We will not interfere in local issues.' That is attractive to Africa; when you look at Zimbabwe and at Darfur, those are controversial places to do business, but the Chinese are there, and they don't interfere."

Like other African leaders, Zambian officials maintain that the Chinese government treats them with respect – and understands the social and political environment they deal with, as opposed to many Western donors.

"They know what it means to go to bed without a meal.... There is more understanding between the Chinese and ourselves," says Vernon Mwaanga, Zambia's minister of information and broadcasting.

Yet increased trade is bringing increased public discontent in places, and that's something African and Chinese leaders will have to address. Responding to South African fears about imports undercutting the local market, Hu last year cut textile imports to South Africa by one-third. Trade between the two countries still roared ahead another 36 percent this year.

Hu Jintao's trade safari

China's President Hu Jintao and a 130-strong delegation is concluding an eight-nation tour of the African continent with trips to Mozambique and the Seychelles on Friday and Saturday. As part of China's bid for Africa's mineral resources, Mr. Hu inked trade and economic assistance deals in each nation.

Here's what Hu did during his 12-day swing:

Cameroon: Canceled Cameroon's debt (amount unspecified), pledged $100 million in grants and soft loans, and signed agreements to build two schools and a hospital in the capital of Douala.

Liberia: Signed a memo canceling all of the $15 million of debt Liberia owed to China and announced a tax exemption on all Liberian exports to China.

Sudan: Signed seven documents on economic and technological cooperation and canceled debts amounting to $19 million.

Zambia: Inaugurated the Zambia-China Economic and Trade Cooperation Zone, including a massive mining partnership in the country's copper belt, to spur development in the smelting, construction, home-appliance, and food-processing industries.

Namibia: Signed a $139 million soft loan (of which $59 million was interest free), a grant, and dozens of scholarships. Made a four-point proposal to boost political and cultural ties between the two nations.

South Africa: In his first state visit and his ninth meeting with President Thabo Mbeki, Hu pledged a "new strategic partnership" including opening the Chinese market to local fruit exports and assistance to South African development programs.

DOJ_NMG_0130114

Mozambique: Expected to announce the cancellation of $15 million in debt Mozambique owes China.

Seychelles: This 110-island archipelago is of strategic importance to oil routes and military bases in the Indian Ocean – two areas China has a significant interest in developing.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Coast Guard Should Revisit Military Contract, Report Says (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — The Coast Guard's $24 billion ship- and plane-building deal with two of the nation's biggest military contractors is fundamentally flawed, an independent Department of Defense assessment commissioned by the Coast Guard has concluded.

The report, by the Defense Acquisition University, does not explicitly recommend terminating the five-year-old deal with the contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman. But it says that if the arrangement is extended — negotiations are already under way — it should be redrafted so that it is no longer presumed that Lockheed and Northrop will play dual roles as program manager and primary builder.

The prime contractor "should be directed to consider the products and services of companies other than" those made by Lockheed and Northrop, said the report, a copy of which was given to The New York Times.

The project, known as Deepwater, is running way over budget. At the same time, all four major classes of ships that are planned or are in production have had significant problems, the report notes.

Under the current deal, the Coast Guard buys ships and planes from Lockheed and Northrop from a preset menu, with prices already negotiated. That approach should be discontinued, the report recommends, and instead, the Coast Guard should rely on a "government run, full and open competition" for purchases of at least some ships.

Even with the existing menu, Lockheed and Northrop can request higher prices for the ships, planes or electronics based on price escalation clauses "that are far broader than those allowed in major systems acquisition contracts" in the Defense Department, the report said.

Brendan McPherson, a Coast Guard spokesman, said the agency was still reviewing the report.

"Unfortunately we can't change history," Mr. McPherson said. "But we can look at where we are going with Deepwater, and figure out ways to make it better."

The report will probably only intensify calls from Congress to radically change the terms of the deal.

"We're looking for some real answers from the Coast Guard," said Katharine Lister, a spokeswoman for Senator Maria Cantwell, Democrat of Washington and chairwoman of a Coast Guard oversight panel, which is holding a hearing on the program on Wednesday. "Shuffling management structures alone is not going to cut it."

A spokeswoman for the partnership formed by Lockheed and Northrop did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages left on Sunday.

Airspace Limits Sought For Patrol Of Canada Border (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Homeland Security Department officials say they will work with the Federal Aviation Administration to impose flight restrictions around the North Dakota air base from which they plan to fly a remotely piloted plane this year to patrol regions of the U.S.-Canada border.

"We are working with the FAA to get restrictions on the airspace [above Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota] during certain time windows when we fly, typically at night," said Gen. Michael Kostelnik, head of air and marine operations for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, the agency inside the Homeland Security Department that flies the pilotless aircraft, known by their military acronym UAV, for unmanned aerial vehicles.

DOJ_NMG_0130119

The UAV, a version of the military Predator B equipped with special cameras and other sensors, and with the ability to stay in the air for up to 30 hours, will be able to monitor remote and inaccessible regions of the border, officials say.

The flight restrictions, which will apply to small planes operating below 18,000 feet, are necessary because of the danger of collisions, but they will draw protests from those who own or fly private planes.

The agency already is flying one Predator B, built by General Atomics Aeronautical Systems, over the U.S.-Mexico border, where it uses the already-restricted airspace around Libby Army Air Field at Fort Huachuca, Ariz.

"But there are no restricted or prohibited areas near Grand Forks," points out Heidi Williams, the head of regulatory affairs for the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, and the group "would oppose any new restricted airspace created solely for UAV border patrols."

Gen. Kostelnik last week said that within three years, Grand Forks also would become the home of a National Guard UAV air wing, flying the less-sophisticated Predator A.

"We are working with the FAA to help them understand what the implications are of the growing use of UAVs," he said.

The Homeland Security UAV at Grand Forks also will require special FAA certification to fly above 18,000 feet in "positive control airspace," through which U.S. air traffic controllers guide commercial flights.

Customs and Border Protection will obtain "certificates of authorization to operate [the Predator B] in certain corridors in the national airspace" for the purpose of border patrols, Gen. Kostelnik said.

He added that the Predator B was "one of the most sophisticated aircraft on the face of the planet," and that it would fly "mainly in the evenings and at night" in places with little existing air traffic.

"I'm not interested in flying this thing ... in metropolitan areas," he said.

Customs and Border Protection will have four UAVs by the end of the year, he added. The second will join the one already flying in the Southwest in April, the third will be delivered to Grand Forks by Oct. 1, and the last, delivered by the end of the year, likely will be deployed in a maritime role.

He said a prototype drone with sea-viewing radar would be tested in Florida to assess "its look-down capabilities, [and] its performance against targets we go after down there, and explore interface issues with other [air and marine] assets we have deployed."

WHATEVER IT TAKES (NewYorker)

By Jane Mayer

The New Yorker, February 19, 2007

The politics of the man behind "24."

The office desk of Joel Surnow—the co-creator and executive producer of "24," the popular counterterrorism drama on Fox—faces a wall dominated by an American flag in a glass case. A small label reveals that the flag once flew over Baghdad, after the American invasion of Iraq, in 2003. A few years ago, Surnow received it as a gift from an Army regiment stationed in Iraq; the soldiers had shared a collection of "24" DVDs, he told me, until it was destroyed by an enemy bomb. "The military loves our show," he said recently. Surnow is fifty-two, and has the gangly, coiled energy of an athlete; his hair is close-cropped, and he has a "soul patch"—a smidgen of beard beneath his lower lip. When he was young, he worked as a carpet salesman with his father. The trick to selling anything, he learned, is to carry yourself with confidence and get the customer to like you within the first five minutes. He's got it down. "People in the Administration love the series, too," he said. "It's a patriotic show. They should love it."

Surnow's production company, Real Time Entertainment, is in the San Fernando Valley, and occupies a former pencil factory: a bland, two-story industrial building on an abject strip of parking lots and fast-food restaurants. Surnow, a cigar enthusiast, has converted a room down the hall from his office into a salon with burled-wood humidors and a full bar; his friend Rush Limbaugh, the conservative talk-radio host, sometimes joins him there for a smoke. (Not long ago, Surnow threw Limbaugh a party and presented him with a custom-made "24" smoking jacket.) The ground floor of the factory has a large soundstage on which many of "24" 's interior scenes are shot, including those set at the perpetually tense Los Angeles bureau of the Counter Terrorist Unit, or C.T.U.—a fictional federal agency that pursues America's enemies with steely resourcefulness.

Each season of "24," which has been airing on Fox since 2001, depicts a single, panic-laced day in which Jack Bauer—a heroic C.T.U. agent, played by Kiefer Sutherland—must unravel and undermine a conspiracy that imperils the nation. Terrorists are poised to set off nuclear bombs or bioweapons, or in some other way annihilate entire cities. The twisting story line forces Bauer and his colleagues to make a series of grim choices that pit liberty against security. Frequently, the dilemma is stark: a resistant suspect can either be accorded due process—allowing a terrorist plot to proceed—or be tortured in pursuit of a lead.

Bauer invariably chooses coercion. With unnerving efficiency, suspects are beaten, suffocated, electrocuted, drugged, assaulted with knives, or more exotically abused; almost without fail, these suspects divulge critical secrets.

The show's appeal, however, lies less in its violence than in its giddily literal rendering of a classic thriller trope: the "ticking time bomb" plot. Each hour-long episode represents an hour in the life of the characters, and every minute that passes onscreen brings the United States a minute closer to doomsday. (Surnow came up with this concept, which he calls the show's "trick.") As many as half a dozen interlocking stories unfold simultaneously—frequently on a split screen—and a digital clock appears before and after every commercial break, marking each second with an ominous clang. The result is a riveting sensation of narrative velocity.

Bob Cochran, who created the show with Surnow, admitted, "Most terrorism experts will tell you that the 'ticking time bomb' situation never occurs in real life, or very rarely. But on our show it happens every week." According to Darius Rejali, a professor of political science at Reed College and the author of the forthcoming book "Torture and Democracy," the conceit of the ticking time bomb first appeared in Jean Lartéguy's 1960 novel "Les Centurions," written during the brutal French occupation of Algeria. The book's hero, after beating a female Arab dissident into submission, uncovers an imminent plot to explode bombs all over Algeria and must race against the clock to stop it. Rejali, who has examined the available records of the conflict, told me that the story has no basis in fact. In his view, the story line of "Les Centurions" provided French liberals a more palatable rationale for torture than the racist explanations supplied by others (such as the notion that the Algerians, inherently simpleminded, understood only brute force). Lartéguy's scenario exploited an insecurity shared by many liberal societies—that their enlightened legal systems had made them vulnerable to security threats.

"24," which last year won an Emmy Award for Outstanding Drama Series, packs an improbable amount of intrigue into twenty-four hours, and its outlandishness marks it clearly as a fantasy, an heir to the baroque potboilers of Tom Clancy and Vince Flynn. Nevertheless, the show obviously plays off the anxieties that have beset the country since September 11th, and it sends a political message. The series, Surnow told me, is "ripped out of the Zeitgeist of what people's fears are—their paranoia that we're going to be attacked," and it "makes people look at what we're dealing with" in terms of threats to national security. "There are not a lot of measures short of extreme measures that will get it done," he said, adding, "America wants the war on terror fought by Jack Bauer. He's a patriot."

For all its fictional liberties, "24" depicts the fight against Islamist extremism much as the Bush Administration has defined it: as an all-consuming struggle for America's survival that demands the toughest of tactics. Not long after September 11th, Vice-President Dick Cheney alluded vaguely to the fact that America must begin working through the "dark side" in countering terrorism. On "24," the dark side is on full view. Surnow, who has jokingly called himself a "right-wing nut job," shares his show's hard-line perspective. Speaking of torture, he said, "Isn't it obvious that if there was a nuke in New York City that was about to blow—or any other city in this country—that, even if you were going to go to jail, it would be the right thing to do?"

Since September 11th, depictions of torture have become much more common on American television. Before the attacks, fewer than four acts of torture appeared on prime-time television each year, according to Human Rights First, a nonprofit organization. Now there are more than a hundred, and, as David Danzig, a project director at Human Rights First, noted, "the torturers have changed. It used to be almost exclusively the villains who tortured. Today, torture is often perpetrated by the heroes." The Parents' Television Council, a nonpartisan watchdog group, has counted what it says are sixty-seven torture scenes during the first five seasons of "24"—more than one every other show. Melissa Caldwell, the council's senior director of programs, said, " '24' is the worst offender on television: the most frequent, most graphic, and the leader in the trend of showing the protagonists using torture."

The show's villains usually inflict the more gruesome tortures: their victims are hung on hooks, like carcasses in a butcher shop; poked with smoking-hot scalpels; or abraded with sanding machines. In many episodes, however, heroic American officials act as tormentors, even though torture is illegal under U.S. law. (The United Nations Convention Against Torture, which took on the force of federal law when it was ratified by the Senate in 1994, specifies that "no exceptional circumstances, whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.") In one episode, a fictional President commands a member of his Secret Service to torture a suspected traitor: his national-security adviser. The victim is jolted with defibrillator paddles while his feet are submerged in a tub filled with water. As the voltage is turned up, the President, who is depicted as a scrupulous leader, watches the suspect suffer on a video feed. The viewer, who knows that the adviser is guilty and harbors secrets, becomes complicit in hoping that the torture works. A few minutes before the suspect gives in, the President utters the show's credo, "Everyone breaks eventually." (Virtually the sole exception to this rule is Jack Bauer. The current season begins with Bauer being released from a Chinese prison, after two years of ceaseless torture; his back is scarred and his hands are burnt, but a Communist official who transfers Bauer to U.S. custody says that he "never broke his silence.")

C.T.U. agents have used some of the same controversial interrogation methods that the U.S. has employed on some Al Qaeda suspects. In one instance, Bauer denies painkillers to a female terrorist who is suffering from a bullet wound, just as American officials have acknowledged doing in the case of Abu Zubaydah—one of the highest-ranking Al Qaeda operatives in U.S. custody. "I need to use every advantage I've got," Bauer explains to the victim's distressed sister.

The show sometimes toys with the audience's discomfort about abusive interrogations. In Season Two, Bauer threatens to murder a terrorist's wife and children, one by one, before the prisoner's eyes. The suspect watches, on closed-circuit television, what appears to be an execution-style slaying of his son. Threatened with the murder of additional family members, the father gives up vital information—but Bauer appears to have gone too far. It turns out, though, that the killing of the child was staged. Bauer, the show implies, hasn't crossed the line after all. Yet, under U.S. and international law, a mock execution is considered psychological torture, and is illegal.

On one occasion, Bauer loses his nerve about inflicting torture, but the show implicitly rebukes his qualms. In the episode, Bauer attempts to break a suspected terrorist by plunging a knife in his shoulder; the victim's screams clearly disquiet him. Bauer says to an associate, unconvincingly, that he has looked into the victim's eyes and knows that "he's not going to tell us anything." The other man takes over, fiercely gouging the suspect's knee—at which point the suspect yells out details of a plot to explode a suitcase nuke in Los Angeles.

Throughout the series, secondary characters raise moral objections to abusive interrogation tactics. Yet the show never engages in a serious dialogue on the subject. Nobody argues that torture doesn't work, or that it undermines America's foreign-policy strategy. Instead, the doubters tend to be softhearted dupes. A tremulous liberal, who defends a Middle Eastern neighbor from vigilantism, is killed when the neighbor turns out to be a terrorist. When a civil-liberties-minded lawyer makes a high-toned argument to a Presidential aide against unwarranted detentions—"You continue to arrest innocent people, you're giving the terrorists exactly what they want," she says—the aide sarcastically responds, "Well! You've got the makings of a splendid law-review article here. I'll pass it on to the President."

In another episode, a human-rights lawyer from a fictional organization called Amnesty Global tells Bauer, who wants to rough up an uncharged terror suspect, that he will violate the Constitution. Bauer responds, "I don't wanna bypass the Constitution, but these are extraordinary circumstances." He appeals to the President, arguing that any interrogation permitted by the law won't be sufficiently harsh. "If we want to procure any information from this suspect, we're going to have to do it behind closed doors," he says.

"You're talking about torturing this man?" the President says.

"I'm talking about doing what's necessary to stop this warhead from being used against us," Bauer answers.

When the President wavers, Bauer temporarily quits his job so that he can avoid defying the chain of command, and breaks the suspect's fingers. The suspect still won't talk, so Bauer puts a knife to his throat; this elicits the desired information. He then knocks the suspect out with a punch, telling him, "This will help you with the pain."

Howard Gordon, who is the series' "show runner," or lead writer, told me that he concocts many of the torture scenes himself. "Honest to God, I'd call them improvisations in sadism," he said. Several copies of the C.I.A.'s 1963 KUBARK interrogation manual can be found at the "24" offices, but Gordon said that, "for the most part, our imaginations are the source. Sometimes these ideas are inspired by a scene's location or come from props—what's on the set." He explained that much of the horror is conjured by the viewer. "To see a scalpel and see it move below the frame of the screen is a lot scarier than watching the whole thing. When you get a camera moving fast, and someone screaming, it really works." In recent years, he said, "we've resorted a lot to a pharmacological sort of thing." A character named Burke—a federal employee of the C.T.U. who carries a briefcase filled with elephantine hypodermic needles—has proved indispensable. "He'll inject chemicals that cause horrible pain that can knock down your defenses—a sort of sodium pentothal plus," Gordon said. "When we're stuck, we say, 'Call Burke!' " He added, "The truth is, there's a certain amount of fatigue. It's getting hard not to repeat the same torture techniques over and over."

Gordon, who is a "moderate Democrat," said that it worries him when "critics say that we've enabled and reflected the public's appetite for torture. Nobody wants to be the handmaid to a relaxed policy that accepts torture as a legitimate means of interrogation." He went on, "But the premise of '24' is the ticking time bomb. It takes an unusual situation and turns it into the meat and potatoes of the show." He paused. "I think people can differentiate between a television show and reality."

This past November, U.S. Army Brigadier General Patrick Finnegan, the dean of the United States Military Academy at West Point, flew to Southern California to meet with the creative team behind "24." Finnegan, who was accompanied by three of the most experienced military and F.B.I. interrogators in the country, arrived on the set as the crew was filming. At first, Finnegan—wearing an immaculate Army uniform, his chest covered in ribbons and medals—aroused confusion: he was taken for an actor and was asked by someone what time his "call" was.

In fact, Finnegan and the others had come to voice their concern that the show's central political premise—that the letter of American law must be sacrificed for the country's security—was having a toxic effect. In their view, the show promoted unethical and illegal behavior and had adversely affected the training and performance of real American soldiers. "I'd like them to stop," Finnegan said of the show's producers. "They should do a show where torture backfires."

The meeting, which lasted a couple of hours, had been arranged by David Danzig, the Human Rights First official. Several top producers of "24" were present, but Surnow was conspicuously absent. Surnow explained to me, "I just can't sit in a room that long. I'm too A.D.D.—I can't sit still." He told the group that the meeting conflicted with a planned conference call with Roger Ailes, the chairman of the Fox News Channel. (Another participant in the conference call attended the meeting.) Ailes wanted to discuss a project that Surnow has been planning for months: the début, on February 18th, of "The Half Hour News Hour," a conservative satirical treatment of the week's news; Surnow sees the show as offering a counterpoint to the liberal slant of "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart."

Before the meeting, Stuart Herrington, one of the three veteran interrogators, had prepared a list of seventeen effective techniques, none of which were abusive. He and the others described various tactics, such as giving suspects a postcard to send home, thereby learning the name and address of their next of kin. After Howard Gordon, the lead writer, listened to some of Herrington's suggestions, he slammed his fist on the table and joked, "You're hired!" He also excitedly asked the West Point delegation if they knew of any effective truth serums.

At other moments, the discussion was more strained. Finnegan told the producers that "24," by suggesting that the U.S. government perpetrates myriad forms of torture, hurts the country's image internationally. Finnegan, who is a lawyer, has for a number of years taught a course on the laws of war to West Point seniors—cadets who would soon be commanders in the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan. He always tries, he said, to get his students to sort out not just what is legal but what is right. However, it had become increasingly hard to convince some cadets that America had to respect the rule of law and human rights, even when terrorists did not. One reason for the growing resistance, he suggested, was misperceptions spread by "24," which was exceptionally popular with his students. As he told me, "The kids see it, and say, 'If torture is wrong, what about "24"?' " He continued, "The disturbing thing is that although torture may cause Jack Bauer some angst, it is always the patriotic thing to do."

Gary Solis, a retired law professor who designed and taught the Law of War for Commanders curriculum at West Point, told me that he had similar arguments with his students. He said that, under both U.S. and international law, "Jack Bauer is a criminal. In real life, he would be prosecuted." Yet the motto of many of his students was identical to Jack Bauer's: "Whatever it takes." His students were particularly impressed by a scene in which Bauer barges into a room where a stubborn suspect is being held, shoots him in one leg, and threatens to shoot the other if he doesn't talk. In less than ten seconds, the suspect reveals that his associates plan to assassinate the Secretary of Defense. Solis told me, "I tried to impress on them that this technique would open the wrong doors, but it was like trying to stomp out an anthill."

The "24" producers told the military and law-enforcement experts that they were careful not to glamorize torture; they noted that Bauer never enjoys inflicting pain, and that it had clearly exacted a psychological toll on the character. (As Gordon put it to me, "Jack is basically damned.") Finnegan and the others disagreed, pointing out that Bauer remains coolly rational after committing barbarous acts, including the decapitation of a state's witness with a hacksaw. Joe Navarro, one of the F.B.I.'s top experts in questioning techniques, attended the meeting; he told me, "Only a psychopath can torture and be unaffected. You don't want people like that in your organization. They are untrustworthy, and tend to have grotesque other problems."

Cochran, who has a law degree, listened politely to the delegation's complaints. He told me that he supports the use of torture "in narrow circumstances" and believes that it can be justified under the Constitution. "The Doctrine of Necessity says you can occasionally break the law to prevent greater harm," he said. "I think that could supersede the Convention Against Torture." (Few legal scholars agree with this argument.) At the meeting, Cochran demanded to know what the interrogators would do if they faced the imminent threat of a nuclear blast in New York City, and had custody of a suspect who knew how to stop it. One interrogator said that he would apply physical coercion only if he received a personal directive from the President. But Navarro, who estimates that he has conducted some twelve thousand interrogations, replied that torture was not an effective response. "These are very determined people, and they won't turn just because you pull a fingernail out," he told me. And Finnegan argued that torturing fanatical Islamist terrorists is particularly pointless. "They almost welcome torture," he said. "They expect it. They want to be martyred." A ticking time bomb, he pointed out, would make a suspect only more unwilling to talk. "They know if they can simply hold out several hours, all the more glory—the ticking time bomb will go off!"

The notion that physical coercion in interrogations is unreliable, although widespread among military intelligence officers and F.B.I. agents, has been firmly rejected by the Bush Administration. Last September, President Bush defended the C.I.A.'s use of "an alternative set of procedures." In order to "save innocent lives," he said, the agency needed to be able to use

"enhanced" measures to extract "vital information" from "dangerous" detainees who were aware of "terrorist plans we could not get anywhere else."

Although reports of abuses by U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have angered much of the world, the response of Americans has been more tepid. Finnegan attributes the fact that "we are generally more comfortable and more accepting of this," in part, to the popularity of "24," which has a weekly audience of fifteen million viewers, and has reached millions more through DVD sales. The third expert at the meeting was Tony Lagouranis, a former Army interrogator in the war in Iraq. He told the show's staff that DVDs of shows such as "24" circulate widely among soldiers stationed in Iraq. Lagouranis said to me, "People watch the shows, and then walk into the interrogation booths and do the same things they've just seen." He recalled that some men he had worked with in Iraq watched a television program in which a suspect was forced to hear tortured screams from a neighboring cell; the men later tried to persuade their Iraqi translator to act the part of a torture "victim," in a similar intimidation ploy. Lagouranis intervened: such scenarios constitute psychological torture.

"In Iraq, I never saw pain produce intelligence," Lagouranis told me. "I worked with someone who used waterboarding"—an interrogation method involving the repeated near-drowning of a suspect. "I used severe hypothermia, dogs, and sleep deprivation. I saw suspects after soldiers had gone into their homes and broken their bones, or made them sit on a Humvee's hot exhaust pipes until they got third-degree burns. Nothing happened." Some people, he said, "gave confessions. But they just told us what we already knew. It never opened up a stream of new information." If anything, he said, "physical pain can strengthen the resolve to clam up."

Last December, the Intelligence Science Board, an advisory panel to the U.S. intelligence community, released a report declaring that "most observers, even those within professional circles, have unfortunately been influenced by the media's colorful (and artificial) view of interrogation as almost always involving hostility." In a clear reference to "24," the report noted:

Prime-time television increasingly offers up plot lines involving the incineration of metropolitan Los Angeles by an atomic weapon or its depopulation by an aerosol nerve toxin. The characters do not have the time to reflect upon, much less to utilize, what real professionals know to be the "science and art" of "educing information." They want results. Now. The public thinks the same way. They want, and rightly expect, precisely the kind of "protection" that only a skilled intelligence professional can provide. Unfortunately, they have no idea how such a person is supposed to act "in real life."

Lagouranis told the "24" team what the U.S. military and the F.B.I. teach real intelligence professionals: "rapport-building," the slow process of winning over informants, is the method that generally works best. There are also nonviolent ruses, he explained, and ways to take suspects by surprise. The "24" staff seemed interested in the narrative possibilities of such techniques; Lagouranis recalled, "They told us that they'd love to incorporate ruses and rapport-building." At the same time, he said, Cochran and the others from "24" worried that such approaches would "take too much time" on an hour-long television show.

The delegation of interrogators left the meeting with the feeling that the story lines on "24" would be changed little, if at all. "It shows they have a social conscience that they'd even meet with us at all," Navarro said. "They were receptive. But they have a format that works. They have won a lot of awards. Why would they want to play with a No. 1 show?" Lagouranis said of the "24" team, "They were a bit prickly. They have this money-making machine, and we were telling them it's immoral."

Afterward, Danzig and Finnegan had an on-set exchange with Kiefer Sutherland, who is reportedly paid ten million dollars a year to play Jack Bauer. Sutherland, the grandson of Tommy Douglas, a former socialist leader in Canada, has described his own political views as anti-torture, and "leaning toward the left." According to Danzig, Sutherland was "really upset, really intense" and stressed that he tries to tell people that the show "is just entertainment." But Sutherland, who claimed to be bored with playing torture scenes, admitted that he worried about the "unintended consequences of the show." Danzig proposed that Sutherland participate in a panel at West Point or appear in a training film in which he made clear that the show's torture scenes are not to be emulated. (Surnow, when asked whether he would participate in the video, responded, "No way." Gordon, however, agreed to be filmed.) Sutherland declined to answer questions for this article, but, in a recent television interview with Charlie Rose, his ambivalence about his character's methods was palpable. He condemned the abuse of U.S.-held detainees at Abu Ghraib prison, in Iraq, as "absolutely criminal," particularly for a country that tells others that "democracy and freedom" are the "way to go." He also said, "You can torture someone and they'll basically tell you exactly what you want to hear. . . . Torture is not a way of procuring information." But things operate differently, he said, on television: "24," he said, is "a fantastical show. . . . Torture is a dramatic device."

The creators of "24" deny that the show presents only a conservative viewpoint. They mention its many prominent Democratic fans—including Barbra Streisand and Bill Clinton—and the diversity of political views among its writers and producers. Indeed, the story lines sometimes have a liberal tilt. The conspiracy plot of Season Five, for example, turns on oligarchic businessmen who go to despicable lengths to protect their oil interests; the same theme anchors liberal-paranoia thrillers such as "Syriana." This season, a White House directive that flags all federal employees of Middle Eastern descent as potential traitors has been presented as a gross overreaction, and a White House official who favors police-state tactics has come off as scheming and ignoble. Yet David Nevins, the former Fox Television network official who, in 2000, bought the pilot on the spot after hearing a pitch from Surnow and Cochran, and who maintains an executive role in "24," is candid about the show's core message. "There's definitely a political attitude of the show, which is that extreme measures are sometimes necessary for the greater good," he says. "The show doesn't have much patience for the niceties of civil liberties or due process. It's clearly coming from somewhere. Joel's politics suffuse the whole show."

Surnow, for his part, revels in his minority status inside the left-leaning entertainment industry. "Conservatives are the new oppressed class," he joked in his office. "Isn't it bizarre that in Hollywood it's easier to come out as gay than as conservative?" His success with "24," he said, has protected him from the more righteous elements of the Hollywood establishment. "Right now, they have to be nice to me," he said. "But if the show tanks I'm sure they'll kill me." He spoke of his new conservative comedy show as an even bigger risk than "24." "I'll be front and center on the new show," he said, then joked, "I'm ruining my chances of ever working again in Hollywood."

Although he was raised in Beverly Hills—he graduated in 1972 from Beverly Hills High—Surnow said that he has always felt like an outsider. His classmates were mostly wealthy, but his father was an itinerant carpet salesman who came to California from Detroit. He cold-called potential customers, most of whom lived in Compton and Watts. Surnow was much younger than his two brothers, and he grew up virtually as an only child, living in a one-bedroom apartment in an unfashionable area south of Olympic Boulevard, where he slept on a foldout cot. If his father made a sale, he'd come home and give him the thumbs-up. But Surnow said that nine out of ten nights ended in failure. "If he made three sales a month, we could stay where we lived," he recalled. His mother, who worked as a saleswoman in a clothing store, "fought depression her whole life." Surnow, who describes his parents as "wonderful people," said, "I was a latchkey kid. . . . I raised myself." He played tennis on his high-school team but gave it up after repeatedly losing to players who could afford private lessons.

Roger Director, a television producer and longtime friend, said that he "loves" Surnow. But, he went on, "He feels looked down upon by the world, and that kind of emotional dynamic underpins a lot of things. It's kind of 'Joel against the world.' It's as if he feels, I had to fight and claw for everything I got. It's a tough world, and no one's looking out for you." As a result, Director said, "Joel's not sentimental. He has a hard-hearted thing."

Surnow's parents were F.D.R. Democrats. He recalled, "It was just assumed, especially in the Jewish community"—to which his family belonged. "But when you grow up you start to challenge your parents' assumptions. 'Am I Jewish? Am I a Democrat?' " Many of his peers at the University of California at Berkeley, where he attended college, were liberals or radicals. "They were all socialists and Marxists, but living off their family money," he recalled. "It seemed to me there was some obvious hypocrisy here. It was absurd." Although he wasn't consciously political, he said, "I felt like I wasn't like these people." In 1985, he divorced his wife, a medical student, who was Jewish, and with whom he has two daughters. (His relationships with them are strained.) Four years later, he remarried. His wife, who used to work in film development, is Catholic; they have three daughters, whom they send to Catholic schools. He likes to bring his girls to the set and rushes home for his wife's pork-chop dinners. "I got to know who I was and who I wasn't," he said. "I wasn't the perfect Jewish kid who is married, with a Jewish family." Instead, he said, "I decided I like Catholics. They're so grounded. I sort of reoriented myself."

While studying at Berkeley, Surnow worked as an usher at the Pacific Film Archive, where he saw at least five hundred movies. A fan of crime dramas such as "Mean Streets" and "The Godfather," he discovered foreign films as well. "That was my awakening," he said. In 1975, Surnow enrolled at the U.C.L.A. film school. Soon after graduation, he began writing for film; he then switched to television. He was only modestly successful, and had many "lost years," when he considered giving up and taking over his father's carpet business. His breakthrough came when he began writing for "Miami Vice," in 1984. "It just clicked—I just got it!" he recalled. "It was just like when you don't know how to speak a language and suddenly you do. I knew how to tell a story." By the end of the year, Universal, which owned the show, put Surnow in charge of his own series, "The Equalizer," about a C.I.A. agent turned vigilante. The series was a success, but, Surnow told me, "I was way too arrogant. I sort of pissed off the network." Battles for creative control have followed Surnow to "24," where, Nevins said admiringly, he continues to push for "unconventional and dangerous choices."

Surnow's tough stretches in Hollywood, he said, taught him that there were "two kinds of people" in entertainment: "those who want to be geniuses, and those who want to work." At first, he said, "I wanted to be a genius. But at a certain point I realized I just desperately wanted to work." Brian Grazer, an executive producer of "24," who has primarily produced films, said that "TV guys either get broken by the system, or they get so tough that they have no warmth at all." Surnow, he said, is "a devoted family man" and "a really close friend." But when Grazer first met Surnow, he recalled, "I nearly walked out. He was really glib and insulting. I was shocked. He's a tough guy. He's a meat-eating alpha male. He's a monster!" He observed, "Maybe Jack Bauer has some parts of him."

During three decades as a journeyman screenwriter, Surnow grew increasingly conservative. He "hated welfare," which he saw as government handouts. Liberal courts also angered him. He loved Ronald Reagan's "strength" and disdained Jimmy Carter's "belief that people would be nice to us just because we were humane. That never works." He said of Reagan, "I can hardly think of him without breaking into tears. I just felt Ronald Reagan was the father that this country needed. . . . He made me feel good that I was in his family."

Surnow said that he found the Clinton years obnoxious. "Hollywood under Clinton—it was like he was their guy," he said. "He was the yuppie, baby-boomer narcissist that all of Hollywood related to." During those years, Surnow recalled, he had countless arguments with liberal colleagues, some of whom stopped speaking to him. "My feeling is that the liberals' ideas are wrong," he said. "But they think I'm evil." Last year, he contributed two thousand dollars to the losing campaign of Pennsylvania's hard-line Republican senator Rick Santorum, because he "liked his position on immigration." His favorite bumper sticker, he said, is "Except for Ending Slavery, Fascism, Nazism & Communism, War Has Never Solved Anything."

Although he is a supporter of President Bush—he told me that "America is in its glory days"—Surnow is critical of the way the war in Iraq has been conducted. An "isolationist" with "no faith in nation-building," he thinks that "we could have been out of this thing three years ago." After deposing Saddam Hussein, he argued, America should have "just handed it to the Baathists and . . . put in some other monster who's going to keep these people in line but who's not going to be aggressive to us." In his view, America "is sort of the parent of the world, so we have to be stern but fair to people who are rebellious to us. We don't spoil them. That's not to say you abuse them, either. But you have to know who the adult in the room is."

Surnow's rightward turn was encouraged by one of his best friends, Cyrus Nowrasteh, a hard-core conservative who, in 2006, wrote and produced "The Path to 9/11," a controversial ABC miniseries that presented President Clinton as having largely ignored the threat posed by Al Qaeda. (The show was denounced as defamatory by Democrats and by members of the 9/11 Commission; their complaints led ABC to call the program a "dramatization," not a "documentary.") Surnow and Nowrasteh met in 1985, when they worked together on "The Equalizer." Nowrasteh, the son of a deposed adviser to the Shah of Iran, grew up in Madison, Wisconsin, where, like Surnow, he was alienated by the radicalism around him. He told me that he and Surnow, in addition to sharing an admiration for Reagan, found "L.A. a stultifying, stifling place because everyone thinks alike." Nowrasteh said that he and Surnow regard "24" as a kind of wish fulfillment for America. "Every American wishes we had someone out there quietly taking care of business," he said. "It's a deep, dark ugly world out there. Maybe this is what Ollie North was trying to do. It would be nice to have a secret government that can get the answers and take care of business—even kill people. Jack Bauer fulfills that fantasy."

In recent years, Surnow and Nowrasteh have participated in the Liberty Film Festival, a group dedicated to promoting conservatism through mass entertainment. Surnow told me that he would like to counter the prevailing image of Senator Joseph McCarthy as a demagogue and a liar. Surnow and his friend Ann Coulter—the conservative pundit, and author of the pro-McCarthy book "Treason"—talked about creating a conservative response to George Clooney's recent film "Good Night, and Good Luck." Surnow said, "I thought it would really provoke people to do a movie that depicted Joe McCarthy as an American hero or, maybe, someone with a good cause who maybe went too far." He likened the Communist sympathizers of the nineteen-fifties to terrorists: "The State Department in the fifties was infiltrated by people who were like Al Qaeda." But, he said, he shelved the project. "The blacklist is Hollywood's orthodoxy," he said. "It's not a movie I could get done now."

A year and a half ago, Surnow and Manny Coto, a "24" writer with similar political views, talked about starting a conservative television network. "There's a gay network, a black network—there should be a conservative network," Surnow told me. But as he and Coto explored the idea they realized that "we weren't distribution guys—we were content guys." Instead, the men developed "The Half Hour News Hour," the conservative satire show. " 'The Daily Show' tips left," Surnow said. "So we thought, Let's do one that tips right." Jon Stewart's program appears on Comedy Central, an entertainment channel. But, after Surnow got Rush Limbaugh to introduce him to Roger Ailes, Fox News agreed to air two episodes. The program, which will follow the fake-news format popularized by "Saturday Night Live," will be written by conservative humorists, including Sandy Frank and Ned Rice. Surnow said of the show, "There are so many targets, from global warming to banning tag on the playground. There's a lot of low-hanging fruit."

Last March, Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas and his wife, Virginia, joined Surnow and Howard Gordon for a private dinner at Rush Limbaugh's Florida home. The gathering inspired Virginia Thomas—who works at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank—to organize a panel discussion on "24." The symposium, sponsored by the foundation and held in June, was entitled " '24' and America's Image in Fighting Terrorism: Fact, Fiction, or Does It Matter?" Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who participated in the discussion, praised the show's depiction of the war on terrorism as

"trying to make the best choice with a series of bad options." He went on, "Frankly, it reflects real life." Chertoff, who is a devoted viewer of "24," subsequently began an e-mail correspondence with Gordon, and the two have since socialized in Los Angeles. "It's been very heady," Gordon said of Washington's enthusiasm for the show. Roger Director, Surnow's friend, joked that the conservative writers at "24" have become "like a Hollywood television annex to the White House. It's like an auxiliary wing."

The same day as the Heritage Foundation event, a private luncheon was held in the Wardrobe Room of the White House for Surnow and several others from the show. (The event was not publicized.) Among the attendees were Karl Rove, the deputy chief of staff; Tony Snow, the White House spokesman; Mary Cheney, the Vice-President's daughter; and Lynn Cheney, the Vice-President's wife, who, Surnow said, is "an extreme '24' fan." After the meal, Surnow recalled, he and his colleagues spent more than an hour visiting with Rove in his office. "People have this image of him as this snake-oil-dirty, secretive guy, but in his soul he's a history professor," Surnow said. He was less impressed with the Situation Room, which, unlike the sleek high-tech version at C.T.U., "looked like some old tearoom in a Victorian house."

The Heritage Foundation panel was moderated by Limbaugh. At one point, he praised the show's creators, dropped his voice to a stage whisper, and added, to the audience's applause, "And most of them are conservative." When I spoke with Limbaugh, though, he reinforced the show's public posture of neutrality. "People think that they've got a bunch of right-wing writers and producers at '24,' and they're subtly sending out a message," he said. "I don't think that's happening. They're businessmen, and they don't have an agenda." Asked about the show's treatment of torture, he responded, "Torture? It's just a television show! Get a grip."

In fact, many prominent conservatives speak of "24" as if it were real. John Yoo, the former Justice Department lawyer who helped frame the Bush Administration's "torture memo"—which, in 2002, authorized the abusive treatment of detainees—invokes the show in his book "War by Other Means." He asks, "What if, as the popular Fox television program '24' recently portrayed, a high-level terrorist leader is caught who knows the location of a nuclear weapon?" Laura Ingraham, the talk-radio host, has cited the show's popularity as proof that Americans favor brutality. "They love Jack Bauer," she noted on Fox News. "In my mind, that's as close to a national referendum that it's O.K. to use tough tactics against high-level Al Qaeda operatives as we're going to get." Surnow once appeared as a guest on Ingraham's show; she told him that, while she was undergoing chemotherapy for breast cancer, "it was soothing to see Jack Bauer torture these terrorists, and I felt better." Surnow joked, "We love to torture terrorists—it's good for you!"

As a foe of political correctness, Surnow seems to be unburdened by the controversy his show has stirred. "24," he acknowledged, has been criticized as racially insensitive, because it frequently depicts Arab-Americans as terrorists. He said in response, "Our only politics are that terrorists are bad. In some circles, that's political." As he led me through the Situation Room set on the Real Time soundstage, I asked him if "24" has plans to use the waterboarding interrogation method, which has been defended by Vice-President Cheney but is considered torture by the U.S. military. Surnow laughed and said, "Yes! But only with bottled water—it's Hollywood!"

In a more sober tone, he said, "We've had all of these torture experts come by recently, and they say, 'You don't realize how many people are affected by this. Be careful.' They say torture doesn't work. But I don't believe that. I don't think it's honest to say that if someone you love was being held, and you had five minutes to save them, you wouldn't do it. Tell me, what would you do? If someone had one of my children, or my wife, I would hope I'd do it. There is nothing—nothing—I wouldn't do." He went on, "Young interrogators don't need our show. What the human mind can imagine is so much greater than what we show on TV. No one needs us to tell them what to do. It's not like somebody goes, 'Oh, look what they're doing, I'll do that.' Is it?"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Escaping The Watch List (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

David Taylor, a 58-year-old grandfather of five from the Boston area, never could have imagined such a nightmare. About three years ago, airport officials told him he appeared to be on a special terrorism watch list used by the Transportation Security Administration to flag some passengers for extra security screening. After that, he began to spend "what felt like a lot of my life" trying to fix the trouble, calling everyone from Ed Markey, his representative; to Washington megacontractors; to the Library of Congress. He even sent the TSA the original version of his birth certificate. For security reasons, TSA doesn't tell people who appeal their case whether their identity is ultimately cleared. "All I know is I haven't had problems for the last year or so," Taylor says now.

DOJ_NMG_0130127

Taylor has no idea why-or even if-he was ever on the watch list or whether there's some other David Taylor out there who's a threat. But there may be fewer of those Kafka-esque stories if the Department of Homeland Security has its way. DHS is engaged in an aggressive effort to clean out extraneous names from the watch lists. It's also launching a website to help people appeal identity mix-ups. But Congress has its own ideas about fixing the screening system, and critics say the process has an awfully long way to go.

The problem, of course, is relatively new. Before 9/11, just 16 names were on the no-fly list, meaning people with those names couldn't board U.S. airplanes. Today, the TSA maintains a presumably larger no-fly list, as well as a selectee list, which designates people who get special security screening. The numbers of names on the lists are classified, although CBS News's 60 Minutes found 119,000 names on the two lists last March. But those are just a subset of the master list of potential terrorists that President George W. Bush asked intelligence agencies to cobble together in 2003. That list has been held in National Counterterrorism Center and has been reported to total some 325,000 names. Parts of it are passed along to the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center, which uses some of the names to make up the TSA's lists.

"Scrub." The TSA lists are supposed to include only people deemed threats to aviation, but problems are legendary. Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy and Catherine Stevens, wife of Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens, are among those who have been snagged. Kip Hawley, the head of the TSA, revealed last month that his agency has been giving its lists "a thorough scrub." About six months ago, his agency for the first time sent full-time TSA investigators to the FBI to check each name. Hawley says when the process is finished in a couple of months, "we'll have cut the [no-fly] list in half."

The redress process has also improved. At one point, people petitioning to get off the list had to submit notarized copies of documents like birth certificates to the TSA; today, a copy of a passport and some forms on a website will do. A once months-long process now takes on average less than 10 days. But more than 20,000 people sent in personal information to try to clear their identities in 2006 alone. People who have proved they have a similar name to someone on the watch list-but are not the actual target-are put on a special "cleared" list that goes to airports.

Terror's Next Target? (USNEWS)

By Stephen Flynn

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Retired U.S. Coast Guard officer Stephen Flynn is a prominent homeland-security expert and a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. He frequently testifies before Congress on port- and border-security issues and authored the bestselling book, America the Vulnerable, in 2004. He also served as an adviser to the U.S. Commission on National Security/21st Century, a task force led by former Sens. Gary Hart and Warren Rudman that issued seminal reports on terrorism, including one just before 9/11. In a new book, The Edge of Disaster: Rebuilding a Resilient Nation, Flynn argues that ailing infrastructure like weakened dams, levees, and power grids-as well as America's underinvestment in homeland security-makes the country susceptible to a catastrophe that could kill thousands.

CONSIDER THIS. It's a warm Friday evening in June, and nearly 40,000 baseball fans are gathered at Philadelphia's Citizens Bank Park to watch the home team play the New York Mets. Most of the stadium's 21,000 parking spaces are filled, and, just a few hundred yards away, Interstate 95 is crowded with travelers heading for Atlantic City and the Jersey Shore. Just 2 miles due west, workers on the night shift are arriving at the 1,000-acre Sunoco oil refinery on the banks of the Schuylkill River. A light breeze is blowing toward the east-ideal conditions for a terrorist operation.

Three young men gather in a vacant lot in Camden, N.J., just across the Delaware River. The leader is a British national who spent much of 2004 in Iraq. Angered by the U.S. invasion, he traveled across Europe to Turkey and slipped into the country to join other insurgents. A second-generation Pakistani with a mechanical engineering degree, he received training in bomb-making from an Iranian tutor in Iraq and participated in two attacks on Iraqi oil refineries.

In the spring of 2005, a few months after returning home, the same man traveled to the United States. Having never run afoul of the law in England, his name was not on any terrorist watch list. Upon arrival, he answered the standard entry questions and was fingerprinted. With a letter of introduction from a radical British sheik, he found his way to a Jersey City mosque, where he met two Americans: an Egyptian college student recruited at a campus speaking event and the student's older cousin.

Working with a local imam, the Americans had hatched a plan to use a commercial tanker truck to target the Sunoco refinery. It's hardly a novel technique: Terrorists used a tanker truck in the bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia on June 25, 1996, which killed 19 servicemen and wounded 372 people. In Iraq, trucks have been used in many suicide attacks, including the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters.

Thousands of tanker trucks operate in the tri-state area of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. The older cousin holds a commercial trucker's license and an authorization from the Department of Homeland Security to carry hazardous materials, a certification available to almost anyone with no criminal record or history of being committed to a mental institution. He works as a driver for an independent gasoline distributor. His cousin, the student, is also an apprentice painter with one of the thousand contractors working on the Sunoco facility each day.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq War Debate Shifts To The House (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the House this week launches its first major debate over the Iraq war since the November elections, Democrats are counting on many Republicans to join them in passing a resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup.

Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest, a Maryland Republican, predicts that 30 to 60 of his colleagues will back the nonbinding resolution, which would be the strongest repudiation of Bush's Iraq policy from Republicans since the war began nearly four years ago.

Opponents of the troop increase include Republicans who, until now, have stood with the president. Amid continuing turmoil in Baghdad and rising casualty figures, anxiety about the White House strategy in Iraq has been building among GOP lawmakers, and many of them blame it for their party's loss of control of Congress.

"Many of us have just watched this thing unfold and see nothing changing," said Gilchrest, whose largely rural district has lost 23 service members in Iraq and Afghanistan. "You face the families and you have to have something to tell them."

The debate, likely to be highly emotional, begins Tuesday and is expected to last three or four days. Each of the House's 435 members will be given five minutes to speak.

The resolution will express support for the U.S. military personnel in harm's way, while opposing adding 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq. A Senate vote on a similar resolution has been held up in a partisan dispute over debate rules. Eight GOP senators have expressed support for a resolution critical of the White House plan.

The House debate is expected to be followed by more aggressive efforts by Congress' new Democratic majority to challenge the administration, including attempts to restrict funding for the war and set dates for troop withdrawals — though some of these actions may divide the party's rank and file.

"It's time for a new policy," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." "This is now four years that we've been at this effort, and 3 1/2 years after the president said the mission — whatever the mission was — was accomplished."

In a preview of the debate, Hoyer's GOP counterpart, House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, appearing on the same program, acknowledged that the resolution would draw some GOP support but challenged Democrats to offer an alternative strategy.

"If you don't like the president's plan, Steny, what is your plan for success?" Boehner asked, predicting dire consequences if the U.S. failed to shore up Iraq. "Who doesn't believe that if we withdraw and leave that chaos in the Middle East, that the terrorists won't follow us here to the United States?"

In an interview, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said, "I call it the status quo resolution. It basically says 'Don't do something' without saying what we should do."

Others say it is an important symbolic vote — one that, if it is backed by a substantial number of the president's usually loyal GOP supporters, would increase pressure on the administration to reconsider its Iraq strategy.

Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, said the vote is "the opening act of a debate that will unfold over the next two years, right into the 2008 election."

Republican leaders want a vote on alternative resolutions that would oppose cutting funds for the war effort and would set up a bipartisan panel to oversee whether Bush's strategy was working and whether Iraqis were moving to assume greater responsibility for security of their country.

But Hoyer said he wanted to avoid the kind of procedural fight that had tied up the Senate. "We want a very straightforward, clear answer to the question: 'Do you support the president's escalation?' " he said.

The resolution will have at least one GOP co-sponsor, North Carolina Rep. Walter B. Jones, a conservative who publicly broke with his party over the war in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0130129

For many other Republicans, deciding how to vote on the resolution will be tough: Do they stick with an unpopular president over a war that is losing public support? Or do they break from their party leaders and risk angering some of their GOP supporters?

Among the Republicans who have come out against the buildup are Reps. James T. Walsh of New York, who narrowly won reelection, and Phil English of Pennsylvania, whose district has been the site of antiwar protests, as well as Roscoe G. Bartlett of Maryland, John J. Duncan Jr. of Tennessee and Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio. It was not known how many of them would vote for the resolution.

English, who won reelection with 53.6% of the vote (his lowest winning percentage since 1996), acknowledged that he had received calls from Republicans in his district angry over his break with the president. But, he said, "if they're looking for someone to be a more predictable supporter of the Republican line, they're probably not looking for someone they can get elected."

A number of House Republicans are pushing for a resolution that would urge the president to more closely follow the recommendations of the bipartisan, independent Iraq Study Group, but one of those recommendations — opening talks with Iran and Syria — has already been rejected by the White House.

Democrats, meanwhile, appear increasingly unified behind the resolution being prepared by their leaders. Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Oakland), a leader of the strongest antiwar wing of the party, last week urged support for the nonbinding resolution, even though she and others are pushing for more aggressive steps to end the war.

Rep. Hoyer: Vote On Iraq Will Be Limited (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

A House vote on Iraq this week will be limited to the question of supporting President Bush's troop escalation, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said Sunday.

Hoyer's comment drew a vehement objection from House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who said House Democrats had promised to allow a vote this week on a Republican alternative opposing a cutoff of money for the war.

Hoyer, D-Md., said such a vote would occur later.

"Live up to your word," Boehner told Hoyer. Democrats, Boehner said, "won't even let us have a substitute. ... Give us a vote this week."

The lawmakers appeared on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

Hoyer Puts Republicans In A Bind Over War (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jim VandeHei

The Politico, February 12, 2007

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said Sunday the upcoming debate over the Iraq war will be confined to four straight days of arguing over President Bush's escalation of the military campaign.

Hoyer used an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" to break a promise he made publicly late last week to allow Republicans a vote of their choice pertaining to the war effort. In doing so, Hoyer dramatically increased tensions in the war over war and thrust Republicans into a defensive crouch heading into this week's showdown over troop levels.

"We believe the American public wants a straightforward answer to the question, 'Do you agree with the president's proposal?'" Hoyer said.

Hoyer, a Democrat from Maryland, said Republicans will be prohibited from forcing a vote on an alternative resolution opposing cutting off funding for U.S. troops in Iraq.

On the same show, House Minority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, accused Hoyer of stifling dissent and backtracking on the pledge by Democratic leaders to build a more democratic process in the House. "Live up to your word," Boehner said.

But Democrats want to limit a four-day debate, which begins Tuesday, to Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to quell violence.

Boehner looked irritated for part of the show -- and with good reason. Hoyer's decision, which will be criticized as another example of Democrats breaking their election-year promise to hold open and fair debates in the House, undercuts the GOP strategy.

Last week, Hoyer initially said Republicans would be allowed to offer an alternative measure on the floor before a House vote on the Democrats nonbinding resolution. "The Republicans will be given either a substitute or a motion to recommit so that they can propose whatever substantive alternative that they choose," Hoyer told reporters Thursday. "That will also be debated."

He backtracked later that day in floor statements to Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.

DOJ_NMG_0130130

"Frankly, because we feel this is such a critically important question and that the clarity of the question and the clarity of the response is so important that we are trying to carefully consider how we can assure that there is no confusion as to the answer that this House gives," Hoyer told Blunt in their weekly colloquy.

Republicans pointed out that inconsistency in a press release last week that was largely unnoticed because Hoyer's exact language was muddled.

Republicans had hoped to make this debate about the troops -- not the surge -- and force Democrats to go on record as refusing to ever cut off funds for soldiers in harm's way. But by shifting strategies, Hoyer has put the GOP in a tough spot.

The debate will be a symbolic one. It will center on a nonbinding resolution, which is essentially a press release with a recorded vote, that will not force the White House or Congress to do anything.

It will, however, shine the congressional spotlight on the Iraq war. Unlike the Senate, which has yet to create even a binding agreement on how to debate a nonbinding resolution, the House is firmly set for what promises to be the most explosive debate over the war since its authorization in 2002.

What remains unclear is whether this is part of a broader effort by anti-war Democrats to force an end to the military campaign. Many Democrats want to use the upcoming debate over the budget, which actually carries the weight of law, to bring the war to a halt by cutting off funding.

"What we're going to do this week is the first step in your effort to cut off funds for our troops in harm's way," Boehner said.

Either way, it will be a tough week for the White House. Many Republicans are planning speeches that are harshly critical of President Bush's handling of the Iraq war -- but stop short of outright opposition to the escalation. Virtually every Democrat plans to attack Bush, Republicans and the war.

Other Sunday Show News

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., appearing on Fox News Sunday earlier in the day, bristled at the suggestion that Republicans had stalled the debate over Bush's troop surge.

"The portrayal has been totally inaccurate," McConnell said. "The majority was trying to dictate the terms of the debate. We were not trying to obstruct the terms of the debate."

McConnell's No. 2, Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., agreed with the leader during an interview on CBS's "Face the Nation."

"We want a debate, not a mandate," he said.

On the same show, Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., a presidential hopeful, criticized the Congress as whole for falling back on procedural arguments when confronted with such a major issue.

"Last week we debated about debating," Dodd said. "We in Congress looked like we were wringing our hands on the issue … I thought we made a mistake by not having a real vote with real teeth in it."

I was under the impression that we if airdrop thousands of pairs of blue jeans and hostess? twinkies onto the people, everyone would be happy.

I don't know what the debate's going to do in the meantime. But... lets just see...

by Ardie on 02.11.2007 at 10:43 PM

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer has done the right thing. You don't honor your promises with scoundrels. The Democrats should take some advice from Lady Macbeth:

To beguile the time, look like the time; bear welcome in your eye, your hand, your tongue: look like the innocent flower, but be the serpent under ?t. -- Macbeth?Act I, v, 30-71

Good work Steny! I didn't vote for Democrats so we could all be one happy family. I voted for Democrats so they could crush the Republicans and bring our troops home?and impeach Bush and Cheney.

by Stall Shifter on 02.11.2007 at 10:01 PM

This is going to be an interesting week on the House floor. The arguments will all be very partisan and a non binding resolution will be passed. That's like kissing your sister after coming in coming in second.

The discussion should be formative in that it leads to another course of action such as a surge toward diplomatic efforts with Iran and Syria and/or redeployment and a plan for an orderly withdrawal. (Suggested by the Iraq Study Group) That probably won't happen. It's more likely that Bush will send another Carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf and bomb the hell out of Iran based on incorrect intelligence. It's deja vu all over again. I have seen this movie before, Condi will go the UN and show satellite photos of nuclear sites and a link will be made with Al Qaeda yatta yatta yatta. World War three here we go.

Our mission in Iraq was accomplished long ago, I heard the speech on the carrier deck. Now it's up to the powers in the mid east to assist in stabilization of a new Iraq government.

I think we can do a better job of supporting the troops by getting them the hell out of the middle of a civil war they have zero chance of ever controlling. The Shia and Sunni can battle it out and decide what kind of a government we will be dealing with. When the dust clears we will have a new government too. Hopefully one that has more foresight than the old one. (That is unless Bush declares Martial Law and suspends elections)

by bootaan on 02.11.2007 at 09:03 PM

I think Republicans are scared of that loosing the congress last year, might proceed to a bigger defeat in 2008.

by bleacherdave on 02.11.2007 at 08:39 PM

It is not clear that Congress can legally de-fund only the Iraq war. The budgetary scalpel may not be that sharp.

by Scarlet on 02.11.2007 at 05:11 PM

drbillybob: I understand your position, but think you misunderstand the situation at hand.

It is true, Congress could put an end to the funding of the war, but where does that leave us? Where does it leave our troops? Where does that leave our country? Our future?

To stop funding for the war would be to stop funding for our troops - that is not an option for neither the Republicans nor the Democrats. The democrats admire our troops, respect them, and would never abandon them because of poor and thoughtless decisions that were made by our "President." Unfortunately they have to stand up for their opinions - and America is hoping that the Democrats will be able to stop the horrible decision that Bush has made in it's tracks.

Did you not pay attention to the November '06 election, billybob? America spoke. You must not have been listening.

by drbillybob on 02.11.2007 at 03:59 PM

Scarlet, although I'm sure many sympathize with your sentiments, your logic is lacking. You say that:

<< Sadly, the truth remains that what Bush says goes - he has manipulated and rewritten law to make it so. >>

<< And now if the Dems try to fight it they'll just get the "you don't support our troops!" argument, whilst trying to get America out of this mess. >>

This is nonsense. Congress does have a role here. They are choosing to grandstand rather than act. Bush cannot continue without funding - get it? They are complicit. So don't blame Bush for what your elected representatives now control. and

by Scarlet on 02.11.2007 at 03:41 PM

Yes, unfortunately this is just the beginning; the beginning of a 'great escalation' not only in US troop volume, but in the Iraqi insurgency. Bush even said it himself in his SOTU speech: "So we're deploying reinforcements of more than 20,000 additional soldiers and Marines to Iraq. . . . Tonight I ask the Congress to authorize an increase in the size of our active Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 in the next five years." (Washington Post)

So this? This is just the beginning. And as Americans, what are we stuck with? Should we just suck it up and expect to be at war for at least the next decade? Should we fight and demand our troops be sent home risking the reality that our congress will not listen? Should we trust our ignorant President and allow him to get away with making more horrendous decisions? Sadly, the truth remains that what Bush says goes - he has manipulated and rewritten law to make it so. And now if the Dems try to fight it they'll just get the "you don't support our troops!" argument, whilst trying to get America out of this mess.

The reality is we're stuck on the brink of WWIII and we can't do a God damn thing about it.

by drbillybob on 02.11.2007 at 03:30 PM

If Senators truly believe that the Iraq War is lost or that the costs will be too high, then please vote to cut funding and bring 'em home now! If Senators believe that there is still a chance to salvage a strategic democratic foothold in the heart of the muslim world that could greatly benefit the western world, then support the President with fervor.

Unfortunately, there is no middle ground here. Non-binding resolutions such as this simply encourage our enemy and demoralize our military. And all for a cheap political CYA stunt - disgusting!

Is this the "new leadership" the Democrats promised? No thanks!

by recordguy on 02.11.2007 at 02:34 PM

The issue for the debate is simple; is the President's plan, whether one chooses to call it an escalation, a surge, or the best security solution for Iraq, the best course of action to take in Iraq at this time. The President's proposal is the only one on the table. It's already begun and even if the Congress votes to stop funding there is enough money in the budget to funnel towards this plan, so it's going to happen no matter what. But Congress needs to go on the record as either opposing or defending the plan.

The issue is not whether or not Congress supports the troops. No one in Congress, much less the entire U.S., doesn't want what's best for the troops. But, is using the troops in this plan the best thing for them, or are there alternatives. In my opinion, this plan is at best Vietnam all over again, and at worst, the beginning of a much greater escalation.

The President and his supporters know that to do anything less than continue on in Iraq is an admission of failure. And, unfortunately, his detractors know that to reduce our forces will be seen as acceptance of failure, hence no real attempt to cut war funding will occur for some time; welcome to American politics in the 21st century.

So, the troops will soldier on, useless talk in D.C. and on the airwaves will drone on continuously and it will be business as usual for the rest of us. Hopefully, and I mean hopefully, by primary time, things will either get much better in Iraq or much worse; an extreme one way or the other. It is only then that real action will be allowed to occur.

Personally, I feel Iraq is lost. And, to bleed to death by a million small cuts is no better than to bleed to death by one massive cut. Dead is dead.

House Readies For Iraq Debate (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

As House Democratic leaders are slated to unveil today a succinct resolution condemning President Bush's proposed escalation of U.S. troops in Iraq, Republican lawmakers are readying an aggressive response from the chamber's floor throughout the three-day debate over the measure.

Democratic sources said language in what is expected to be an austere resolution — consisting of only two provisions: one expressing general support for the military personnel and a second condemning Bush's proposed increase of 21,500 troops — would be the primary subject of weekend discussions, as lawmakers seek to garner bipartisan support while still clearly reproaching the Bush administration.

"We want to make it as direct and concise as possible," said a Democratic leadership aide, who asked not to be named. Democrats have indicated the measure will not specifically reference "escalation," in an effort to sway GOP lawmakers to support the measure.

"We want to make it a clear vote on the president's plan," the aide added.

Under the Democrats' proposed schedule, each Member will receive five minutes of floor time during the debate, scheduled to begin Tuesday, although aides said a specific lineup for Democratic lawmakers remained largely undecided prior to the weekend.

While the Democratic leadership is expected to spotlight several freshman lawmakers who also are military veterans, other internal factions are seeking blocks of time as well, including the fiscally conservative Blue Dogs and the Progressive Caucus, which has endorsed funding a six-month redeployment plan.

The Democrats' debate time will be jointly controlled by Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.).

The party expected to be largely unified on the resolution, even as portions of the Caucus seek additional measures targeting funding for the Iraq War as well as fiscal accountability, asserting that the measure is the first of several large discussions on the war.

"There's always tomorrow. We don't have to put it all in the first crack we get," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.).

Although Democratic leaders indicated late last week that the Republican minority would be allowed to offer a substitute measure — the resolution is expected to be a closed rule with no possibility for amendments — no decision had been finalized as of press time Friday.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Thursday that Democrats had yet to determine whether to allow an alternate proposal, citing the sensitive nature of the resolution.

"We feel this is such a critically important question and that the clarity of the question and the clarity of the response is so important that we are trying to carefully consider how we can assure that there is no confusion as to the answer that this House gives," Hoyer said.

One Democratic aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said Democrats were concerned that a Republican substitute, such as legislation sponsored by Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.), could shift the focus of the debate away from the increase in troops.

"We want this to be a clean message opposing escalation," the aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0130133

A Democratic lawmaker, who asked not to be named, asserted that many rank-and-file Members were lobbying against allowing Republicans to offer a substitute resolution, asserting it could “fracture” the majority.

Republicans, who had yet to determine Friday whether to bring new legislation or an existing bill should a substitute be allowed, sharply criticized the Democrats.

“It looks like Democrats are going for a very carefully choreographed debate with strictly defined parameters for a predetermined outcome. I don’t think you can even call that a debate,” said Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Nevertheless, House Republicans have prepared a response plan for next week’s debate, including plans to blanket television and radio with interviews, as well as rapid-response messaging that will track the floor debate and a “resource center” for Members to provide research and debate material.

In addition, the GOP plan will focus on several themes, including Iraq’s context in the larger war on terror and the consequences of losing the Iraq War, with lawmakers expected to assert that withdrawal could destabilize the entire region as well as invite terrorist attacks in the United States.

According to an outline of the plan, Republicans also will focus on arguments that the resolution will weaken troop morale and assert that Democrats have a responsibility to halt funding if they disagree with the president’s proposed strategy.

Boehner will open debate for the Republicans, although the remaining lineup is not yet determined. Ranking GOP lawmakers on the Intelligence, Armed Services, Homeland Security and Foreign Affairs committees will share control of the party’s debate time.

GOP Expects Defections As House Debates Iraq Resolution (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Three days of intense debate over the Iraq war begins in the House today, with Democrats planning to propose a narrowly worded rebuke of President Bush's troop buildup and Republicans girding for broad defections on their side.

Both parties will jockey for prime time before the C-SPAN cameras, with leaders claiming the best time slots and rank-and-file members trying to make the most of the five minutes each will be allotted. If all 435 House members use their five minutes, debate will last 36 hours. It is likely to begin by late morning and run until midnight tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday. A vote is expected Friday.

After watching their counterparts in the Senate stall and sputter last week, unable to agree on ground rules for a debate on Iraq, House leaders are forging ahead, determined to send a statement to the White House to condemn a troop buildup.

Democrats will file a nonbinding resolution against the Bush plan while Republicans will try to broaden the dispute and seed doubt in the Democratic approach. Although Senate Republicans were able to block debate on a resolution condemning Bush's war policies last week, it will be much easier for Democrats in the House to bring a measure to the floor.

The GOP, whose members have conceded they are likely to lose, is treating the debate like a mini-political campaign, deploying a rapid-response team to counter Democrats' statements, aggressively trying to get its leaders on television and radio, and creating a "resource center" off the House floor where members can fill their arms with maps, research material, videos or other visual aids to use during their floor time.

"We may lose the vote, but we'll win the debate," said Kevin Smith, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Other Republicans are not so sure they will win even that much. If Democrats stick to their plan of narrowly focusing debate on the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, the more contentious issues that Republican leaders want to highlight could fail to resonate.

"What we have now is a dispute in tactics," said Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.), who once supported the administration but is opposed to the troop increase. "This is a situation where we've been dealt a bad hand, where we've made a lot of mistakes, where we should have addressed the problems in Baghdad a long time ago, and now a surge on the scale the president has proposed is unlikely to move us forward."

One House Republican close to the GOP leadership spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to be blunt. "This next week is going to be a very tough one for us to get through," he said. "The Democrats know that. We can sit back and hope they overplay their hand, but I don't think they will."

Although the order of speakers has not yet been set, Democrats and Republicans are vying for the most desired slots at a time when attention in Washington will focus on the House. Lawmakers from the West Coast do not want to speak early in the morning, when their constituents are asleep; those from the East do not want to appear at 11:25 p.m. And nearly everyone wants to talk in time to make the evening news and beat the daily newspapers' deadlines.

The last time an Iraq resolution came before the House was in June, when the Republicans controlled Congress. After two days of largely partisan debate, the House easily approved a measure declaring that the United States must complete "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq," without setting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal" of troops. Forty-two Democrats bucked their leadership to join a virtually united GOP.

But this debate will be different, lawmakers from both parties agree.

Democrats get to draft the resolution, and the war -- already unpopular in June -- is now clearly opposed by most voters. The party is united, even the left wing, which ultimately wants troop withdrawal from Iraq but is content to see the resolution as a first step.

House Republicans say as few as 20 or as many as 60 Republicans could vote with the Democrats, regardless of the wishes of the Republican leadership and the White House.

"Every time I go to another funeral, every time I go to Walter Reed, people are really gracious, but what do you say? What are we doing over there now?" asked Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (R-Md.), whose Eastern Shore district has lost 23 service members in the war.

GOP leaders and conservatives may apply some pressure to stay off the Democratic resolution, but, Gilchrest added: "My internal soul goes a lot beyond my minuscule political career."

By its nature, the House is quicker to bend to public opinion than the Senate; House members are never more than two years away from an election. Gilchrest voted with the Republican leadership in June, but last month he was one of eight House Republicans who signed a letter stating that the deployment of additional U.S. troops to the sectarian fighting in Iraq would only make matters worse.

A senior Republican aide said the GOP leadership knows that Republicans from districts where the war is unpopular will have to vote with the Democrats to protect themselves. "And that's okay," he said, adding that Republican leaders will not tell their members to stick with the party line.

Gilchrest collected 29 Republican signatures on his own letter pleading with Bush to open diplomatic dialogue with Syria and Iran to find a way out of Iraq, then personally handed the letter to Bush at a bill-signing ceremony in the Oval Office. He is now working with Democratic Reps. Gregory W. Meeks (N.Y.), James P. McGovern (Mass.) and Solomon P. Ortiz (Tex.) to further that diplomatic push.

For some Republicans, the Democratic takeover of Congress has been liberating. A barrage of recent hearings into malfeasance under the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq, the stretched state of the military and the cost of the war have brought to light new information while underscoring congressional acquiescence under GOP control, said Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.), a longtime war critic.

"My party did not want to do anything to embarrass the administration," he said.

House Democrats To Push Resolution Opposing Increase In Troop Levels (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democrats, taking a lesson from the stalemate in the Senate, are pressing ahead with an Iraq debate this week, narrowly confined to a resolution opposing President Bush's decision to increase troop levels.

As now drafted, the measure expresses support for American forces without delving into the more sensitive issue of whether Congress may restrict war funds in the future. At the same time, hoping to attract Republican votes, the resolution is expected to avoid the use of the word "escalation" to describe the increased U.S. commitment of at least 21,500 troops.

FIGHT FOR IRAQ

Instead, the draft language speaks simply of rejecting "the decision of President George W. Bush announced on January 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

The final language is expected to be completed Monday in anticipation of floor debate beginning Tuesday and running up to a vote likely on Friday. Democrats said this will give both parties adequate time to express themselves. But Republicans have no assurance yet of having an opportunity to offer an alternative of their own.

DOJ_NMG_0130135

"As we discussed this, we saw the problems that the Senate was confronted with," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) said on NBC News "Meet the Press." "We believe the American people want a straightforward answer to the question: Do you agree with the president's proposal? Republican president has made a proposal, we're going to respond to that. We want to respond to it with great clarity."

Senate debate stalled last week when Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) demanded a vote against cutting war funding before permitting action on a bipartisan resolution challenging the increased troop levels. House Republicans would almost certainly offer similar language as their alternative resolution, but the Democratic leadership would prefer to postpone the funding issue until Congress addresses a $93.4 billion emergency spending request for the war next month.

Pressed by Minority Leader John Boehner (R. Ohio) who also appeared on the broadcast, Mr. Hoyer said there would be such an opportunity "within the next 30, 45 days." But he wouldn't commit yet to giving Republicans the right to offer such an alternative this week.

The maneuvering in both houses of Congress underscores the rolling, often incremental nature of the war debate. All of the resolutions now are non-binding policy statements, but the stakes rise when lawmakers turn to the war funding package next month, and then in June to a much larger $623.1 billion request to fund the Pentagon's core budget and overseas military operations for fiscal 2008.

Opponents of the troop increase have essentially won the first round. House Republicans concede that the Democratic resolution will pass this week with possibly 30 Republican votes. While there has been no Senate vote, Republican leaders agree that a majority of senators support a bipartisan resolution -- crafted by former Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.) -- opposing the troop increase.

It is precisely because of this loss that Republicans and the White House want to skip ahead quickly to the second and higher stake round: the $93.4 billion spending bill. That is why there is so much Republican emphasis on resolutions opposing any reduction in funds, and why Democrats are still struggling to come up with restrictions that are do-able.

The House Appropriations Committee will meet Mar. 7 on the request, and in testimony Friday, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the departing Army chief of staff, conceded that the Pentagon was struggling to meet the schedule set for the troop increase.

"We're sending in piecemeal troops because…we don't have them," said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), the chairman of the defense subcommittee. "I'm sure you'd like to send 21,000 tomorrow. But wouldn't you agree we can't send 21,000 tomorrow, General?"

"We're doing it on the schedule that was asked for," Gen. Schoomaker said. "It is a challenge to do it. No question about it."

As a result, the full complement of soldiers for the so-called "surge" isn't expected to be in Iraq until May. Moreover, maintaining the higher overall troop levels will likely require that the military extend the tours of some of the brigades in Iraq now.

The Pentagon has begun to concede that instead of 21,500, the more likely number of troops needed -- when support personnel are counted -- will be closer to 25,000. That would bring the total U.S. troop levels in Iraq to about 160,000; if that were maintained just through the end of this calendar year, it could strain even the revised fiscal 2008 budget numbers.

A $3.82 billion request for Iraqi security forces -- in the spring supplemental -- will almost certainly be a target for some cuts or conditions attached by Congress.

Among the other options affecting U.S. troops more directly would be a provision barring the use of new funds to extend the deployment of Army and Marine troops beyond 365 and 210 days, respectively. If that were combined with a second provision that prevented sending troops back to Iraq until they had had promised time at home, it could make it harder to carry out the increase now and over time make it harder for the military to maintain the "post-surge" 160,000 troop level.

Iraq Debate Shifts To The House (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON

The Senate deadlocked just 90 minutes into a debate last week over President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq. Now the action shifts to the House, where Democrats aim for an up-or-down vote on his policy.

As in the Senate, that resolution would be nonbinding on Mr. Bush, but no one would know it, judging from the intense disputes – within and between political parties – over the terms of disagreement. Democrats say Senate Republicans blocked the vote primarily to protect the president. Republicans say Democrats rigged the rules to suppress minority rights.

At issue is more than a test of wills. It's how to frame the terms of opposition to a war that has lost public support and strained US relations with the rest of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0130136

The vote – or nonvote – on the resolution is also politically toxic. Opposition to the war helped sweep Republicans out of control in the House and Senate in 2006. But if the issue is mishandled, it could do the same to Democrats – or topple even more GOP careers – in 2008.

The Senate's version of a resolution against a proposed surge of 21,500 US troops in Iraq evolved into five pages of "whereas" clauses, many added to bring another vote or two on board.

By contrast, House Democrats say they intend to keep it simple. Their resolution, to be announced Monday, is expected to have two parts: One affirms that Congress will continue to support US troops who have been committed to the war in Iraq; the other affirms that members do not agree with the proposed escalation.

"This is an up-or-down vote on the policy enunciated by the president. We owe it to our constituents to have that," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democratic caucus chair, after a caucus meeting on Iraq last week. The House is planning three days of debate, with each member allowed five minutes to speak.

Meanwhile, House GOP leaders call the coming vote "a meaningless political stunt ... that demoralizes US troops." Like Senate Republicans, they are pushing Democrats to allow a separate up-or-down vote on a resolution not to cut off war funding.

"If Democrats are serious about ending the war, they should bring a real resolution to the floor about whether to cut funding," House Republican leader John Boehner said last week.

Senate Republicans also insist that senators have an opportunity to vote on a resolution not to cut off funding to the troops. Democratic majority leader Harry Reid refused to allow that vote. In return, all but two Republicans voted to block the resolution against the troop surge (proposed by Sens. John Warner (R) of Virginia and Carl Levin (D) of Michigan), which Democrats wanted to proceed.

"Democrats and antiwar Republicans are sending political signals with this vote," says Randall Woods, a historian at the University of Arkansas, who writes on congressional antiwar politics. "They need to show the American people that they are voicing opposition to the war, yet not appear soft on national security," he says. "They're fighting for their [political] lives."

As in previous war votes, the language of the resolutions has been crafted to maximize political peril for the opposition. But for the first time since US forces went into Iraq in 2003, Democrats are setting the timing and terms of war votes, and they are determined to not rush into a vote they are likely to lose.

It's a tactic Republicans have used in the past to embarrass Democrats who oppose Bush's war strategy – and one that some GOP leaders now say they regret.

When Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a longtime friend of the military, broke with the White House in November 2005 and proposed an immediate, phased withdrawal of US forces from Iraq, House GOP leaders rushed a recorded vote to express the sense of the House that the deployment of US forces in Iraq "be terminated immediately." The language was crafted to embarrass Representative Murtha and to squelch any antiwar momentum from his high-profile reversal on the war. As expected, the vote failed, 3-403.

Some Republican leaders now say that strategy of forced, preemptive votes was a mistake. "It was clearly a ploy. Everybody in American knew it was a ploy, and we paid a price in November," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R) of Florida, the new House Republican conference chairman, last week.

Meanwhile, Murtha, who now chairs the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, is laying groundwork for a vote on funding as early as mid-March, when the House is expected to take up Bush's $99.6 billion war funding request for fiscal 2007. He says he aims to build a robust case for redirecting spending to adequately equip and train US forces, rather than to fund a troop surge.

"Our concern is the proper supply and backup to the troops already in theater, as we transform this mission to one where we can be successful," says Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D) of Ohio, a member of the defense subcommittee.

Why Are The Pacifists So Passive? (NYT)

By Lynn Chu And John Yoo

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BEFORE the November elections, many Democratic candidates and legal academics insisted that the Iraq war was illegal and that only Congress, not the president, had the power to manage it under the Constitution. Interestingly, now that Democrats control Capitol Hill, they are fretting that if Congress tried to cut back on funds or troop levels, it might be, well, unconstitutional. Democrats are suddenly acknowledging that the commander in chief and executive branch may be better off without their micromanagement, after all.

Of course, they haven't been silent about the war: both the House and Senate last week were political circuses, juggling various bills that proposed to "rein in" the president. But behind all the bluster, the one thing all the major Democratic proposals have in common is that they are purely symbolic resolutions, with all the force of a postcard. (Two other Democratic Senate proposals that have actual teeth — one by Russell Feingold to cut off money for the war, another by Barack Obama to mandate troop reductions — were ignored by the leadership.)

The fact is, Congress has every power to end the war — if it really wanted to. It has the power of the purse. Its British forebears in Parliament micromanaged the monarchy quite a bit, for instance by making money (the "sinews of war") contingent on attacking one country and making peace with another. And there is more direct precedent: In 1973, Congress affirmatively acted to cut off funds for Vietnam. It also cut off money for the Nicaraguan contras with the Boland Amendment in 1982.

Not only could Congress cut off money, it could require scheduled troop withdrawals, shrink or eliminate units, or freeze weapons supplies. It could even repeal or amend the authorization to use force it passed in 2002.

A pullout, however, would have no chance of success, because its supporters are likely to lack the two-thirds majority necessary to override a presidential veto. But to stop President Bush's proposed troop surge, Congress doesn't have to do anything. It can just sit back and fail to enact the periodic supplemental spending measures required to keep the war going. Congress has wielded considerable power by just threatening such measures, as with President James K. Polk in the Mexican-American War and President Ronald Reagan in Lebanon after the 1983 barracks bombing.

The Constitution doesn't pick winners. It leaves it to the three branches to use their unique powers to struggle for supremacy. James Madison, the leading intellectual force behind the Constitution, rebutted Patrick Henry's firebrand attack on executive war powers during the Virginia ratifying convention by reminding him that Congress could control any renegade president by stopping the flow of money.

But with power comes responsibility. The truth is that this Congress is not sure what to do in Iraq. Its hesitation reflects America's uncertainty and divisions. Antiwar bluster is high at the moment, echoing popular frustration and grim news from Baghdad.

Our elected representatives know, however, that policy can't be made by poll. Most also understand that that leaving Iraq to a sectarian power struggle would break our word and lead to slaughter. A failed state in Iraq would breed more terrorism, not less, by becoming a haven for more radical training camps.

Most in Congress, in fact, are not eager to replay Vietnam. The United States has had far fewer casualties in this conflict. Our national security interests here are high. If we falter now, it would be read as a "defeat" and embolden more terrorist attacks on us. Once again the world would begin to doubt American strength. This would undermine our ability to conduct credible diplomacy, while electrifying Islamists to further jihad.

The truth is that the Democrats in Congress would rather sit back and let the president take the heat in war than do anything risky. That way they get to prepare for the next election while pointing fingers of blame and spinning conspiracy theories. It is odd to see the Democratic Party turning toward isolationism, bonding with paleoconservatives, and so bitterly averse to the ideals of democratic nation building.

War is not about instant gratification in a hail of klieg lights, our truncated Gulf war notwithstanding. In an interdependent, globalized world, we can't shrug our shoulders and shirk in the war on terrorism. America made a fundamental change in foreign policy after the 9/11 attacks: to support and spread democracy. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, should understand this well. She made her national reputation as a junior representative in the 1980s criticizing the Chinese dictatorship after the Tiananmen Square massacre.

Perhaps it was inevitable that the public would soon tire of war and engage in overheated accusations of bad faith. It is quite right that Congress review, and consider, from its unique perspective, what changes, if any, it now wants to make. If Congress really believes the Bush administration has set us on the wrong course, it can act tomorrow to cut the sinews of war in Iraq. But its failure to do so seems an acknowledgment that the consequences would be far worse than what we face now.

Ex-Pentagon Official Defends Iraq Stance (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 12, 2007

A former Pentagon official on Sunday defended his prewar assessment of a relationship between Iraq and al-Qaida, calling it a much-needed critique of the CIA's intelligence on the subject.

"It's healthy to criticize the CIA's intelligence," said former Pentagon policy chief Douglas Feith. "What the people in the Pentagon were doing was right. It was good government."

DOJ_NMG_0130139

Feith was responding to a report by the Defense Department inspector general that Feith's office "did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to senior decision makers."

The IG's report found that there was no support for the Pentagon's claim of a "mature symbiotic relationship" in all areas between Iraq and al-Qaida.

"No one in my office ever claimed there was an operational relationship," Feith said on "Fox News Sunday." "There was a relationship."

The review found that the actions of Feith's office were not illegal or unauthorized — but they were an inappropriate "alternative" analysis that did not reflect the consensus of the intelligence community or include caveats about the information's reliability.

Feith said this amounted to circular logic from the Pentagon's internal watchdog.

"The people in my office were doing a criticism of the intelligence community consensus," Feith said. "By definition, that criticism varied. If it didn't vary, they wouldn't have done the criticism."

The 2004 report from the Sept. 11 commission found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Saddam and Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

When asked if his office ever made the case against going to war with Saddam, Feith said, "The answer is emphatically yes."

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the Pentagon, through Feith's office, intentionally made the case for war in 2002 based on faulty analysis.

"They did it very deliberately," said Reed, D-R.I. "They used that analysis. It was leaked to the media. It was reported in newspapers. It took on a credibility beyond the facts that the intelligence community had." Reed also appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Feith Calls Faulty Prewar Claims 'Good Government' (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A former top Pentagon official on Sunday defended as "good government" his office's prewar findings of a significant relationship between Iraq and al-Qaida, while a congressional Democrat suggested that his actions were not only inappropriate but possibly illegal.

Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of Defense for policy, appeared on "Fox News Sunday" to explain his actions and that of his Office of Special Plans, following the release Friday of a highly critical report by the Pentagon's inspector general.

The report concluded that Feith, a leading architect of the policies that led to the Iraq war, briefed senior Bush administration officials on the purportedly strong links between al-Qaida and Iraq that did not accurately reflect the views of the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies. It also said Feith and his aides sought to discredit and bypass those intelligence officials because they were strongly discounting alleged ties between the terrorist network and Saddam Hussein's regime.

The inspector general's review found that the actions of Feith's office were not illegal or unauthorized, describing them as an inappropriate "alternative" analysis.

Critics have used the inspector general's report to bolster their claims that Feith and other Pentagon aides loyal to then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "cherry-picked" intelligence suggesting an al-Qaida/Iraq link as part of a politically motivated effort to sell the Iraq war to the American public, U.S. allies and the United Nations.

Sunday, however, Feith sought to portray his actions and those of his staffers as part of the normal give-and-take of government in the months leading up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. He indicated that, at the time, he thought the CIA in particular was missing important ties between al-Qaida and Saddam's regime.

"It's healthy to criticize the CIA's intelligence," Feith told "Fox News Sunday." "What the people in the Pentagon were doing was right. It was good government."

The inspector general's report concluded that there was virtually no support for the Pentagon policy office's assessment that "intelligence indicates cooperation in all categories" and a "mature symbiotic relationship" between al-Qaida and Iraq at the time Feith's office was presenting those findings to top White House officials.

Feith's office also claimed that an alleged April 2001 meeting in Prague, Czech Repbublic, between Sept. 11 lead hijacker Mohamed Atta and an Iraqi agent was a known contact; it has since been widely discredited by the 9/11 Commission and the Senate intelligence committee.

"All of that was wrong, wasn't it?" "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace asked Feith, referring to his office's conclusions.

"No, not at all," Feith responded. "There was substantial intelligence.... There was a lot of information out there."

Feith also said that "no one in my office ever claimed there was an operational relationship" between Iraq and al-Qaida. That claim was immediately questioned by some administration critics.

"It's an abject lie, and it completely ignores what is in the documented public record," Larry C. Johnson, a former State Department and CIA counterterrorism official, said in an interview Sunday. "I think the problem is across the board that we have convenient memory loss. No one wants to go back and hold people accountable to what they were doing."

On his blog, noquarter.typepad.com, Johnson wrote Sunday that Feith repeatedly had claimed such a relationship, particularly in a still-classified memo dated Oct. 27, 2003, that was sent to the leadership of the Senate Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. The 16-page memo was later leaked to a conservative magazine, which reported on it extensively. The resulting article was later cited by Cheney as "the best source of information" on al-Qaida/Iraq ties.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., a member of the intelligence panel, told CNN's "Late Edition" that not only were Feith's actions "inappropriate," but that "there are serious questions about whether Mr. Feith broke the 1947 statute that requires that our committee be informed" of his office's activities.

On NBC's "Meet the Press," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said he and other top House Democrats had sent a letter earlier in the day asking Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte for proof that they had taken steps to prevent "a similar occurrence in the future."

Hoyer said Feith's activities were a calculated effort to subvert the intelligence advice given to President Bush before the war, but that he didn't know whether it had led to "miscalculations."

"But the fact of the matter is, what was done was wrong," Hoyer said. "We want to get to the bottom of it."

Feith left the Pentagon in August 2005 and is now a visiting professor of national-security policy at Georgetown University.

Senator Ahab (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

In a reasonable world, Douglas Feith would have received an apology late last week from Senator Carl Levin. But the obsessive Democrat won't let go of his story that the Bush Administration "politicized" pre-war Iraq intelligence no matter how many times the facts disprove it. Senator Ahab is now going even further and suggesting behavior standards that would make the U.S. intelligence bureaucracy less accountable to elected officials; this could get Americans killed.

The familiar accusation against Mr. Feith is that the former Undersecretary of Defense was responsible for all the government's intelligence failures on Iraq because his office had the temerity to review and critique intelligence on the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda. His alleged pressure to find a strong link is said to have so influenced apparently weak-kneed CIA analysts that they made a false case for war. Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller went so far as to accuse Mr. Feith of "running a private intelligence failure [sic], which is not lawful."

This preposterous narrative has already been debunked many times -- notably in a bipartisan report from the Senate Intelligence Committee itself. That 2004 report found that not only had CIA analysts not been pressured to change their views but that Mr. Feith's review had sometimes "actually improved the Central Intelligence Agency's products." A year later the Robb-Silberman commission also found no evidence that prewar intelligence had been politicized. And last week the Defense Department's Inspector General delivered to Congress a report that likewise exonerates Mr. Feith of doing anything unlawful and acknowledges that his actions were authorized by the Secretary or Deputy Secretary of Defense.

But instead of moving on to more important things, Mr. Levin is still chasing his great white whale. He's grabbed on to an odd bit of editorializing by the Inspector General that Mr. Feith "was inappropriately performing Intelligence Activities . . . that should be performed by the Intelligence Community."

"Inappropriately"? What on Earth does that mean? The charge is so vague that it has the air of a political sop that Acting Inspector General Thomas Gimble tossed to Mr. Levin to avoid being hauled in front of the Senate and accused of a cover-up. The myth persists that Inspectors General are King Solomons who are above politics, but in this case Mr. Gimble split the baby, and in a way that could harm U.S. security.

He and Mr. Levin are essentially saying that officials appointed by an elected President aren't allowed to question the "consensus" of the "intelligence community." Yet the work of Mr. Feith's office on al Qaeda had nothing to do with what everyone now concedes was the main intelligence failure on Iraq, which was the lack of WMD stockpiles. Former CIA Director George Tenet said it was a "slam dunk" that Saddam Hussein had such stockpiles, and it was this intelligence "consensus" that the Bush Administration relied on in making its main case for war. Any links between al Qaeda and Iraq is a separate issue that was barely mentioned in the run-up to war.

Make no mistake, the people "politicizing" intelligence here are Senators Levin and Rockefeller, whose smears against Mr. Feith will have a chilling effect on anyone who wants to question "consensus" judgments in the future. This is dangerous, because if recent experience has taught us anything it is that we need far more such questioning.

It was the intelligence community that underestimated Saddam's nuclear capabilities before the first Gulf War, only to overestimate them later. It was the CIA "consensus" that also vastly overestimated the strength of the Soviet economy even as Moscow was about to sue for peace. Before 9/11 it was also the intelligence consensus -- led by former CIA Near East chief analyst Paul Pillar -- that terrorism was a minor and manageable problem. Too bad Mr. Feith and his team weren't around to scrub those judgments.

We learned much of what we know about intelligence from the late, great Cold War strategists, Albert and Roberta Wohlstetter. And what they taught was that in the intelligence business almost nothing is certain. Albert Wohlstetter especially disliked "national intelligence estimates," which were always the product of lowest-common-denominator judgments -- or group-think. These judgments, in turn, often lead to public pronouncements that claim a degree of certainty that simply doesn't exist -- and then to charges of "politicizing" intelligence when those judgments turn out not to be true.

Messrs. Levin and Rockefeller may enjoy scoring partisan points. But their nasty obsession with Mr. Feith will have the effect of endorsing more group-think as the last, best word in intelligence -- and will lead to more Iraqs and more 9/11s.

U.S. Says Arms Link Iranians To Iraqi Shiites (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — After weeks of internal debate, senior United States military officials on Sunday literally put on the table their first public evidence of the contentious assertion that Iran supplies Shiite extremist groups in Iraq with some of the most lethal weapons in the war. They said those weapons had been used to kill more than 170 Americans in the past three years.

Never before displayed in public, the weapons included squat canisters designed to explode and spit out molten balls of copper that cut through armor. The canisters, called explosively formed penetrators or E.F.P.s, are perhaps the most feared weapon faced by American and Iraqi troops here.

In a news briefing held under strict security, the officials spread out on two small tables an E.F.P. and an array of mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades with visible serial numbers that the officials said link the weapons directly to Iranian arms factories. The officials also asserted, without providing direct evidence, that Iranian leaders had authorized smuggling those weapons into Iraq for use against the Americans. The officials said such an assertion was an inference based on general intelligence assessments.

That inference, and the anonymity of the officials who made it, seemed likely to generate skepticism among those suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to find a scapegoat for its problems in Iraq, and perhaps even trying to lay the groundwork for war with Iran.

Officials at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad said they had no comment on the American accusations, the latest in a back-and-forth between the countries as tension has escalated over Tehran's rising influence in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East and suspicions about its nuclear energy program. And while the Americans displayed what they said was the physical evidence of their claims about Iran's role in Iraq, they also left many questions unanswered, including proof that the Iranian government was directing the delivery of weapons.

The officials were repeatedly pressed on why they insisted on anonymity in such an important matter affecting the security of American and Iraqi troops. A senior United States military official gave a partial answer, saying that without anonymity, a senior Defense Department analyst who participated in the briefing could not have contributed.

The officials also were defensive about the timing of disclosing such incriminating evidence, since they had known about it as early as 2004. They said E.F.P. attacks had nearly doubled in 2006 compared with the previous year and a half.

"The reason we're talking about this right now is the vast increase in the number of E.F.P.s being found," one official said. American-led forces in Iraq, the official said, "are not trying to hype this up to be more than it is."

Whatever doubts were created about the timing and circumstances of the weapons disclosures, the direct physical evidence presented on Sunday was extraordinary.

The officials said the E.F.P. weapons arrived in Iraq in the form of what they described as a "kit" containing high-grade metals and highly machined parts — like a shaped, concave lid that folds into a molten ball while hurtling toward its target.

For the first time, American officials provided a specific casualty total from these weapons, saying they had killed more than 170 Americans and wounded 620 since June 2004, when one of the devices first killed a service member.

DOJ_NMG_0130142

But then the officials went much further, asserting without specific evidence that the Iranian security apparatus, called the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps - Quds Force controlled delivery of the materials to Iraq. And in a further inference, the officials asserted that the Quds Force, sometimes called the I.R.G.C. - Quds, could be involved only with Iranian government complicity

"We have been able to determine that this material, especially on the E.F.P. level, is coming from the I.R.G.C. - Quds Force," said the senior defense analyst. That, the analyst said, meant direction for the operation was "coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

At least one shipment of E.F.P.s was captured as it was smuggled from Iran into southern Iraq in 2005, the officials said. Caches and arrays of E.F.P.s, as well as mortars and other weapons traceable to Iran, have been repeatedly found inside Iraq in areas dominated by militias known to have ties to Iran, the officials said. One cache of antitank rocket-propelled grenades and other items was seized as recently as Jan. 23, the officials said.

The precise machining of E.F.P. components, the officials said, also links the weapons to Iran. "We have no evidence that this has ever been done in Iraq," the senior military official said.

The officials also gave fresh details on recent American raids in Baghdad and the northern city of Erbil in which Quds Force members were picked up and accused of working with extremist groups to plan attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

Some of the five Iranians still being detained after they were picked up in Erbil on Jan. 11 had been flushing documents down a toilet when they were found, the defense analyst said, and they had recently been engaged in "changing their appearance" — apparently shaving their heads, though for what reason the analyst did not know.

An earlier raid in Baghdad was carried out, the officials said, after American forces received word that the No. 2 Quds Force official, whom they identified as Mohsin Chizari, was unexpectedly in Iraq. When Mr. Chizari was picked up in a raid in December, he was carrying false identification, the officials said.

He was later released to the Iraqi government with another Iranian official who was picked up at the same time. The Iraqis asked both Iranians to leave the country.

The senior defense analyst said there was no direct link between the detained Iranians and the physical evidence presented on Sunday. But the analyst said, "the overall tenor" of the evidence was that Mr. Chizari was implicated in bringing E.F.P.s into Iraq.

The briefing also presented new information on what the Americans call the smuggling routes. There are three main routes, officials said: the Mandelli border crossing, east of Baghdad; the Mehran crossing, in the marshes to the south; and in the southern city of Basra.

Paid Iraqis, rather than Iranians themselves, carry the materials across the border, the officials said.

The senior military official blamed recent press reports for, he said, overstating the importance of the weapons presentation, which had been delayed. Part of the delay reflected a view among officials in Washington that the original presentation was insufficiently strong. Officials here did not address that element of the internal debate.

The senior American military official did make it clear that declassifying the material took place only after weeks of analysis on what information could be useful to hostile forces — information that has mostly been kept out of the public eye since the E.F.P.s began turning up in Iraq. "We publicly have not acknowledged E.F.P.s for the past two years," the senior military official said.

Laid out on the tables themselves were the tailfins of dozens of apparently used mortar shells, as well as intact mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades, cases for some of the weaponry, the E.F.P., and two identification cards the officials said were taken in the Erbil raid.

The shells had serial numbers in English in order to comply with international standards for arms, the officials said. One grenade, for instance, was marked with the serial number P.G.7-AT-1 followed by LOT:5-31-2006. The officials said that the serial numbers clearly identified the grenade as being of Iranian manufacture and the date showed that it had been made in 2006.

Commanders in Baghdad are acutely aware of the deadly E.F.P.s. Col. Steve Townsend, commander of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team in Baghdad, said his unit has encountered about a dozen E.F.P.s in the past two months.

Iran's role in Iraq has been discussed in recent months in public and private testimony by senior intelligence officials. In testimony last month, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said "there's a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq, so that our other options in the region, against other activities the Iranians might have, would be limited."

DOJ_NMG_0130143

Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat who chairs the Senate Intelligence Committee, said last month that he believed that Iranian operatives inside Iraq were supporting Shiite militias and working against American troops.

But he also asserted that the White House had a poor understanding of Iranian calculations and added that he was concerned that the Bush administration was building a case for a more confrontational policy toward Tehran.

Military Ties Iran To Arms In Iraq (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 -- Senior U.S. military officials in Iraq sought Sunday to link Iran to deadly armor-piercing explosives and other weapons that they said are being used to kill U.S. and Iraqi troops with increasing regularity.

During a long-awaited presentation, held in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the officials displayed mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades and a powerful cylindrical bomb, capable of blasting through an armored Humvee, that they said were manufactured in Iran and supplied to Shiite militias in Iraq for attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops.

"Iran is a significant contributor to attacks on coalition forces, and also supports violence against the Iraqi security forces and the Iraqi people," said a senior defense official, who was joined by a defense analyst and an explosives expert, both also from the military.

The officials said they would speak only on the condition of anonymity, so the explosives expert and the analyst, who would normally not speak to the news media, could provide information directly. The analyst's exact title and full name were not revealed to reporters. The officials released a PowerPoint presentation including photographs of the weaponry, but did not allow media representatives to record, photograph or videotape the briefing or the materials on display.

An official at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad called the U.S. accusations "fabricated" and "baseless."

"We deny such charges. We ask those who are claiming such evidence: Show the documents in public," said the official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity. "We cannot compensate for the American failure and fiasco in Iraq. . . . It is not our policy to be involved in any hostile operations against coalition forces here."

The U.S. officials said weapons were smuggled into the country by the Quds Force, an elite unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard that U.S. officials believe is under the control of Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. The officials in Baghdad said that Iranians recently detained in Iraq by U.S. forces belong to the Quds Force.

With so much official U.S. buildup about the purported evidence of Iranian influence in Iraq, the briefing was also notable for what was not said or shown. The officials offered no evidence to substantiate allegations that the "highest levels" of the Iranian government had sanctioned support for attacks against U.S. troops. Also, the military briefers were not joined by U.S. diplomats or representatives of the CIA or the office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Although the administration has made many assertions about Iran's nuclear program, its role in Iraq and its ties to groups on the State Department's terrorism list, the U.S. government has never publicly offered evidence proving the allegations. The briefing was the first time during the Bush administration that officials had sought to make a public intelligence case against Iran.

Iraq's deputy foreign minister, Labeed M. Abbawi, said in an interview Sunday that the Iraqi government remains in the dark about the full U.S. investigation into Iranian activities in Iraq. "It is difficult for us here in the diplomatic circles just to accept whatever the American forces say is evidence," he said.

"If they have anything really conclusive, then they should come out and say it openly, then we will pick it up from there and use diplomatic channels" to discuss it with Iran, he said. "The method or the way it's being done should be changed, to have more cooperation with us."

U.S. military officials in Iraq had previously described the use of "explosively shaped charges" to target vehicles, but Sunday's briefing was the first time they displayed pieces of what they called an "explosively formed penetrator" or EFP.

The one such device shown at the briefing was a cylinder of PVC pipe about eight inches long and about six inches in diameter. The officials said the devices are deadly because the explosion sends a slug of malleable metal, often copper, at velocities high enough to penetrate the armor of tanks and Humvees. Their components require precision machining that Iraq has shown no evidence of being able to perform, the officials said.

The first known attack using such weapons in Iraq occurred in May 2004, and the rate of attacks using them has nearly doubled in 2006, the officials said. They have also been used in southern Lebanon, the explosives expert said. The Lebanese Shiite organization Hezbollah receives military support from Iran.

The defense analyst said Iranians used Iraqi smugglers to bring the weapons into Iraq. "The smoking gun of an Iranian standing over an American with a gun, it's never going to happen," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130144

The officials said the weapons are often supplied to what the officials called "rogue" elements of the Mahdi Army, the powerful Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. One official said there was no "widespread involvement" of the Iraqi government in supplying the weaponry.

A group of Iraqis coming into southern Iraq from Iran were detained by Iraqi border forces in 2005, the defense analyst said, and "they had the materials, EFPs and whatnot, on them."

The officials provided further details on the case of two Iranians captured during a December raid on the compound of a leading Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and five Iranians seized in the raid of a liaison office in the northern city of Irbil in January.

The raid at Hakim's compound netted Mohsen Chirazi, whom U.S. officials described as a high-ranking Quds Force operations chief, as well as documents with information about sniper rifles and mortars, the officials said. The senior defense official said that when U.S. officials discussed the allegations with Hakim's representatives, their explanation was that "it is normal for different groups to acquire armaments for protection purposes."

Following protests from Iraqi officials, the U.S. released Chirazi and the other Iranian captured with him. Hakim visited President Bush at the White House in December.

In the January raid of the Iranian liaison office, which provides consular services in Irbil, U.S. forces captured five Iranians. U.S. officials said they were Quds Force operatives who carried no passports and had fake identification cards. At the time of the raid they were trying to alter their appearance by shaving their heads -- U.S. forces found a bag of hair -- and they were flushing documents down a toilet, the officials said. Explosive residue was found on the hands of at least one of the Iranians, they said.

The Iraqi government has called for their release as well. Iraq's foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, has said that the liaison office was operating under the approval of the Kurdish regional government and that Iraq was in the process of formalizing it as a diplomatic consulate.

The weapons displayed for reporters on two tables on Sunday -- rocket-propelled grenades, football-shaped mortar shells, the shaped explosive charge and about 40 tail fins of exploded mortar shells -- showed specific signs of Iranian manufacture, the officials said. The mortar tail fins, for example, were made from a single fused piece of metal, while other countries make mortar shells that have removable parts, the explosives expert said.

Two rocket-propelled grenades, with the markings "P.G. 7-AT-1," were said to be made exclusively in Iran.

The process of the briefing, delayed by more than two weeks, was unusual. President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said in a recent meeting with reporters that the original media presentation had overstated the evidence against Iran and needed to be toned down.

At the Green Zone briefing Sunday, the senior defense official said charts and graphs outlining the scope of attacks with shaped charges had been removed from the presentation by the intelligence community. "The reason we're talking about this right now is the vast increase in the number of EFPs being found," he said. The U.S. forces in Iraq "are not trying to hype this up to be more than it is."

Military: Iran Ships Weapons To Shiite Extremists (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Sunday that armor-piercing roadside bombs sent by Iran to Shiite extremists have killed 170 American and coalition troops in Iraq.

U.S. military officials, who declined requests to be identified, said shipments of weapons and ammunition to Iraq's Shiite militias were being directed at the highest levels of the Iranian government.

FROM THE U.S. MILITARY: Pictures, descriptions of Iranian support to insurgents (PDF)

In a briefing, U.S. officials showed reporters part of a device they described as a sophisticated roadside bomb, along with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades they said were made in Iran. Later, one of the officials, an intelligence analyst, said it would be impossible to find a "smoking gun" conclusively proving Iranian government involvement.

Sunday's briefing by the three military officials was the most detailed attempt to show that Iran supports militants in Iraq. It followed similar remarks Friday by U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Gates said serial numbers and markings found on explosives provide "pretty good" evidence that Iran is supplying either weapons or expertise to extremists in Iraq.

U.S. and coalition forces have not captured any Iranian agents in possession of the armor-piercing roadside bombs. The U.S. officials at the briefing said Iraqis are usually used to transport the explosives from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130145

The Mahdi Army militia is among the Shiite extremist groups that have obtained the powerful bombs. The Mahdi Army is aligned with anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose political organization is part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

Al-Maliki has moved to distance himself from al-Sadr in recent weeks and has said he does not want Iraq to become a proxy battlefield for the United States and Iran.

U.S. commanders have been increasingly vocal about allegations of Iranian support for Shiite militias and extremists in Iraq. Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, said recently that Iran was providing training, weapons, ammunition and money to militants in Iraq.

The military said sophisticated weapons from Iran give militants an edge in their fight against American and Iraqi forces.

The Iranian Embassy in Baghdad could not be reached for comment, but Tehran has denied the allegations in recent statements.

Sunday's military briefing had been delayed several times, as higher-ups in Washington vetted the evidence, the U.S. officials said. The Bush administration was widely criticized after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq for flawed intelligence alleging Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

The officials said that among several Iranians picked up in recent raids was an operations officer from Iran's al-Quds Brigade, a unit in the Iranian Revolutionary Guards responsible for training insurgents and terrorists. The U.S. military identified him as Mohsin Chizari.

The Revolutionary Guards and al-Quds force report to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

U.S. forces raided a compound in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month, detaining five Iranians, all of whom were al-Quds members, the U.S. military said. Those captured tried to flush documents down the toilet and alter their appearance by shaving their heads, the U.S. officials said.

American officers are particularly worried about the armor-piercing bombs that can shoot a large slug of molten metal through the thick armor of a Humvee or Abrams tank.

Unlike many roadside bombs in Iraq that are cobbled together from artillery shells, so-called explosively formed penetrators are machined in factories.

"It is not just technology you can crank off the street," Lt. Col. Steven Miska, deputy commander of a U.S. brigade in Baghdad, said in an interview last week.

The military officials said the number of explosively formed penetrators, or EFPs, used in Iraq increased dramatically last year after first being detected there in 2004. The number of EFP attacks nearly doubled last year. EFPs also have been used against Israeli forces in Lebanon by Iranian-backed Hezbollah militants, who fought a 34-day war with Israel last summer.

The U.S. military says it has also discovered conventional weapons and ammunition in Iraq tied to Iran. In an interview last week, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said U.S. forces have discovered mortar rounds that were Iranian-made. They're distinctive because most tail-fins on 81mm mortars screw off, but Iranian-made shells do not, he said.

The U.S. officials said Sunday that much of the Iranian weaponry found in Iraq was manufactured last year, indicating the munitions were recently shipped into Iraq and were not Saddam-era weapons.

Odierno said in a recent interview that the Iraqi government has been confronted with U.S. allegations of Iranian support for militants in Iraq.

Iran's Leaders Arming Iraqis, U.S. Says (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, February 12, 2007

U.S. military officials on Sunday accused the highest levels of the Iranian leadership of arming Shiite militants in Iraq with sophisticated armor-piercing roadside bombs that have killed more than 170 troops from the American-led coalition.

The military command in Baghdad denied, however, that any newly smuggled Iranian weapons were behind the five U.S. military helicopter crashes since Jan. 20 — four that were shot out of the sky by insurgent gunfire.

A fifth crash has tentatively been blamed on mechanical failure. In the same period, two private security company helicopters also have crashed but the cause was unclear.

The deadly and highly sophisticated weapons the U.S. military said it traced to Iran are known as "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs.

The presentation was the result of weeks of preparation and revisions as U.S. officials put together a package of material to support the Bush administration's claims of Iranian intercession on behalf of militant Iraqis fighting American forces.

DOJ_NMG_0130146

Senior U.S. military officials in Baghdad said the display was prompted by the military's concern for "force protection," which, they said, was guaranteed under the United Nations resolution that authorizes American soldiers to be in Iraq.

Three senior military officials who explained the display said the "machining process" used in the construction of the deadly bombs had been traced to Iran.

The experts, who spoke to a large gathering of reporters on condition that they not be further identified, said the supply trail began with Iran's Revolutionary Guards Quds Force, which also is accused of arming the Hezbollah guerrilla army in Lebanon. The officials said the EFP weapon was first tested there.

The officials said the Revolutionary Guard and its Quds force report directly to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The briefing on Iran was revised heavily after officials decided it was not ready for release as planned last month.

Senior U.S. officials in Washington — cautious after the drubbing the administration took for the faulty intelligence leading to the 2003 Iraq invasion — had held back because they were unhappy with the original presentation.

The display appeared to be part of the White House drive that has empowered U.S. forces in Iraq to use all means to curb Iranian influence in the country, including killing Iranian agents.

It included a power-point slide program and a handful of mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades which the military officials said were made in Iran.

The centerpiece of the display, however, was a gray metal pipe about 10 inches long and 6 inches in diameter, the exterior casing of what the military said was an EFP, the roadside bomb that shoots out fist-sized wads of nearly molten copper that can penetrate the armor on an Abrams tank.

"A normal roadside bomb is like a shotgun blast. But these are like a rifle. They're focused and they're aimed. ... It's going to take anything out in its way, go in one side and out the other," said 1st Lt. Zane Galvach, 25, of Dayton, Ohio, a soldier with the Army's 2nd Division, based in Baghdad.

Skeptical congressional Democrats said the Bush administration should move cautiously before accusing Iran of fomenting a campaign of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

Senate Intelligence Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

On the Republican side, Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi said he did not think the United States was trying to make a case for attacking Iran. Lott said the U.S. should try to stop the flow of munitions through Iran to Iraq but that "you do that by interdiction ... you don't do it by invasion."

The EFPs, as well as Iranian-made mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades, have been supplied to what the military officials termed "rogue elements" of the Mahdi Army militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. He is a key backer of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The U.S. officials glossed over armaments having reached the other major Shiite militia organization, the Badr Brigade. It is the military wing of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political organization, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, whose leaders also have close ties to the U.S.

Many key government figures and members of the Shiite political establishment have deep ties to Iran, having spent decades there in exile during Saddam Hussein's rule. The Badr Brigade was formed and trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guard.

An intelligence analyst in the group said Iran was working through "multiple surrogates" — mainly in the Mahdi Army — to smuggle the EFPs into Iraq. He said most of the components are entering the country at crossing points near Amarah, the Iranian border city of Meran and the Basra area of southern Iraq.

The analyst said Iraq's Shiite-led government had been briefed on Iran's involvement and Iraqi officials had asked the Iranians to stop. Al-Maliki has said he told both the U.S. and Iran that he does not want his country turned into a proxy battlefield.

"We know more than we can show," said one of the senior officials, when pressed for tangible evidence that the EFPs were made in Iran.

U.S. officials have alleged for years that weapons were entering the country from Iran but had until Sunday stopped short of alleging involvement by top Iranian leaders.

During the briefing, a senior defense official said that one of the six Iranians detained in January in the northern city of Irbil was the operational commander of the Quds Force.

He was identified as Mohsin Chizari, who was apprehended after slipping back into Iraq after a 10-month absence, the officer said.

The Iranians were caught trying to flush documents down the toilet, he said. They had also tried to change their appearance by shaving their heads. Bags of their hair were found during the raid, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130147

The dates of manufacture on weapons found so far indicate they were made after fall of Saddam Hussein — mostly in 2006, the officials said.

In a separate briefing, Maj. Gen. Jim Simmons, deputy commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said that since December 2004, U.S. helicopter pilots have been shot at on average about 100 times a month and been hit on an average of 17 times in the same period.

He disclosed for the first time that a Black Hawk helicopter had been hit by small arms fire near the western city of Hit. The craft crash-landed but there were no casualties. Simmons was on board.

The major general said Iraqi militants are known to have SA-7, SA-14 and SA-16 shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles but none of the most recent five military crashes were caused by those weapons. He said some previous crashes had been a result of such missiles but would not elaborate.

North of Baghdad, a suicide truck bomber crashed into a police station near Tikrit, killing at least 30 policemen. A total of 76 people were killed or found dead across Iraq. The U.S. Central Command said a soldier was shot and killed Sunday in volatile Diyala province northeast of the capital. A second soldier was reported killed Sunday in western Baghdad.

Iran Arms Iraqi Insurgents (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Iran is supplying deadly shoulder-fired missiles and armor-piercing bombs to Iraqi insurgents, along with TNT, triggering devices, rockets and other weapons that are killing and injuring hundreds of U.S. and allied troops, a U.S. military intelligence report made public yesterday says.

The detailed briefing report, titled "Iranian Support for Lethal Activity in Iraq," stated that Iranian Misagh-1 portable anti-aircraft missiles were found after a failed attempt to shoot down a plane at Baghdad's airport in 2004.

Disclosure of the Iranian provision of anti-aircraft missiles comes as six U.S. helicopters have been shot down by insurgents in the past three weeks. It is not known whether Iranian missiles were used in the attacks.

The armor-piercing bombs have killed at least 170 American and allied troops in Iraq, defense officials told reporters in Baghdad, where the report was released.

"More than 170 U.S. and coalition troops have been killed by these things, and 620 wounded. There was a significant increase in their use over the past six months," one defense official said.

"The weapons had characteristics unique to being manufactured in Iran. ... Iran is the only country in the region that produces these weapons," said a defense official who briefed reporters in Baghdad, adding that Tehran was using Shi'ite cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army as a surrogate in Iraq.

The report stated that the Iranians involved in supporting Iraqi extremists are members of the Qods Force of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps, Tehran's Islamist paramilitary shock troops. The Qods Force is known to back terrorists throughout the Middle East, according to the 16-page report.

A senior defense official said the Iranian terrorist support is "coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

Much of the intelligence in the report was obtained in the past several months, including an identity card of a Qods Force member who was captured along with four other Iranian agents in a raid on the group's office in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month. The identity card bore the logo of the Qods Force.

"Over the last 60 days, Iranian and Iraqi detainees have told us that the Qods Force provides support to extremist groups in the form of money and weapons," the report said. "Their information included references to Iranian provision of weapons to Iraqi militants engaged in anti-coalition violence, as well as weapons and training to these same militants."

The briefing is the first Bush administration effort to expose details of Iranian support for extremists that has been a growing problem, especially with the introduction in 2004 of what the military is calling "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, that were shown in the report to have blown through the armor plating on the side of a U.S. Humvee.

"There is a growing body of evidence pointing to Iranian supply of EFPs to Iraqi extremist groups. Additional evidence suggests that Iran is also providing training and other forms of weaponry to extremist groups," the report said.

But congressional Democrats on yesterday's political talk shows were immediately skeptical on many points.

"Explosives seem to be flowing into Iraq from Iran, but does it stem from a deliberate government policy or rogue elements within the Iranian government?" asked Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat and Armed Services Committee member, on Fox News.

Both Democratic Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Ron Wyden of Oregon said they feared the Bush administration had doctored the intelligence to support a belligerent policy against Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130148

"I'm worried about that. That's how we got into the mess in Iraq," Mr. Dodd said on CBS, with Mr. Wyden telling CNN that "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

But Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, dismissed such suggestions, saying that the United States is using military interdiction to block Iranian interference in Iraq, while continuing diplomatic dialogue with Tehran.

"We are talking to them in a variety of ways. Just because you don't have a grand meeting doesn't mean you're not communicating," Mr. Lott said. "Diplomacy is an arcane world that I guess you have to be in to really understand. But I don't think the American people ought to be concerned that some precipitous action is fixing to occur."

The report contains a map showing the route used by Iranian agents to funnel cash and weapons into Iraq.

"Money and weapons are escorted across the border using different vehicles that only travel at night," the report said, noting the shipments happen "regularly."

"The money is transported through Mehran, Iran," the report said. "Named individuals provided two of the IEDs from Iran that can go through armor."

The shaped charges were described in the report as can-shaped high-explosives that send out a melted-metal projectile that can penetrate armor plating. It is a new type of improvised explosive devices, the deadly roadside bombs that have caused most of the deaths among U.S. and allied forces in Iraq since 2003.

In addition to shaped charges, the report shows that the Iranians have supplied cash and triggering devices for bombs, including a relatively sophisticated "passive infrared trigger" that was recovered by U.S. forces near the southern city of Basra and traced to Iran.

Large amounts of TNT were also recovered and found to have Farsi writing, an indication they were manufactured in Iran. Additionally, 88 mm mortar rounds found in Iraq were traced to Iran by serial numbers and shown to have been manufactured as late as September.

"Comparison of the seized mortar container markings to known Iranian samples indicates they are of Iranian production," the report said.

Iranian armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades also are being sent to Iraq, according to the report. New PG-7AT-1 grenades were found in Baqouba in November and in Baghdad in January.

Senior administration officials in the past have complained of the Iranian weapons support, but until now they have been reluctant to make the details public.

The report was held up for more than a week as the result of an internal dispute between intelligence and policy officials. Senior U.S. intelligence officials within the office of the director of national intelligence sought to play down the intelligence of Iranian involvement, fearing the report will be used as a basis to launch an attack on Iran.

Policy and military leaders pressed to have the report made public to expose Iranian duplicity. Tehran officials have said publicly that they want to see a stable Iraq while they are covertly supporting insurgents through the Qods Force activities.

U.S. Officials Offer Evidence Of Iran's Hand In Iraqi Unrest (LAT)

Baghdad — U.S. defense and intelligence officials today rolled out what they said was solid evidence that Iran was providing bombs to target U.S. and Iraqi troops and accused Iran's supreme leader of orchestrating the smuggling of such devices over the Iran-Iraq border.

At a briefing held under unusually secretive conditions here, the U.S. officials, who refused to be identified by name and did not allow cameras or recording devices inside a conference room, offered up tables laden with hardware and a slide show of documentation that they said bolstered the U.S. contentions of Iranian involvement in Iraqi unrest.

One of the officials, a military explosives expert, sat cradling the remnants of what he said was an Iranian-made explosively-formed penetrator, or EFP, on the table in front of him. The officer said that the device, which looked like a large coffee can stuffed with a gray, sandy substance, has been responsible for the deaths of at least 170 U.S. and other forces since first surfacing in Iraq in June 2004.

Also on display at the press conference were about three dozen tailfins of 60-milimeter and 81-milimeter mortars; two anti-tank rockets; shipping containers for mortars; a chunk of metal said to have been rocketed out of an Iranian-made explosive; and the identification cards, tucked into clear, plastic baggies, of two men arrested by U.S. agents in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month.

The intelligence analyst said the men were Iranian agents who were trying to change their appearance and flush documents down the toilet when U.S. officials burst in on them. The hardware, they said, was identifiable as Iranian because of the method in which it was manufactured, or because of unique markings.

The unveiling came amid discomfort from Iraqi government officials, who have made clear they don't want to be in a diplomatic cross-fire between the United States and Iran, leading supporters of the Iraqi government who are mutual antagonists. Since December, U.S. officials have arrested several Iranian officials in Iraq. Last week, Iran accused the United States of being behind the abduction of an Iranian diplomat on the streets of Baghdad.

The latest U.S. accusations against Iran, targeting Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, was certain to heighten tensions between Washington and Tehran. According to the U.S. official here, agents of Iran's Quds Force, a unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, were involved in the smuggling of explosives into Iraq.

"They report directly to the supreme leader," said the U.S. intelligence official of the Quds agents. Another official said the material provided at the briefing was only a sample of evidence that existed but that because of intelligence concerns, nothing more could be provided.

Violence persisted in the capital and other parts of Iraq today (Sunday). At least 15 people died when a suicide bomber rammed a pickup truck into a police station in Dour, a Sunni town north of Baghdad. Witnesses said the explosives were hidden beneath hay in the truck and that the force of the blast damaged a hospital, post office, two schools and other buildings near the station.

The attack occurred shortly at about 9 a.m., just as Iraqi police were gathering for work, and destroyed the police station, said one witness, adding that the street was littered afterward with shrapnel and body parts.

In other attacks Sunday, gunmen raked a police station in the southern town of Muthena with gunfire, killing one civilian, and a car bomb went off in Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood, killing one person.

The violence came despite U.S. and Iraqi promises of a new security plan to stabilize Iraq, a plan that Nouri said Sunday would escalate this week with sweeps throughout Baghdad.

Dems Skeptical Of Starting Row With Iran (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Skeptical congressional Democrats said Sunday the Bush administration should move cautiously before accusing Iran of fomenting a campaign of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

The members of Congress spoke on the morning talk shows as the U.S. military said it believes orders came from the highest levels of the Iranian government to send components for sophisticated roadside bombs in Iraq.

The military told reporters in Baghdad that between June 2004 and last week, more than 170 Americans had been killed by the bombs, which the military calls "explosively formed projectiles." Those weapons are capable of destroying an Abrams tank.

Explosives seem to be flowing into Iraq from Iran, but does it stem from a deliberate government policy or rogue elements within the Iranian government? asked Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., who serves on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said that ultimately Iran wants a stable Iraq and that the United States needs to engage in diplomacy.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said the administration could be laying the groundwork for an attack on Iran and that "I'm worried about that. That's how we got into the mess in Iraq," by relying on what Dodd called "doctored information."

Senate Intelligence Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

On the Republican side, Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi said he does not think the United States is trying to make a case for attacking Iran. Lott said the U.S. should try to stop the flow of munitions through Iran to Iraq but that "you do that by interdiction ... you don't do it by invasion."

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, spoke in more aggressive tones, saying that "we have to do everything within our power to stop" any cross-border flow.

Reed spoke on "Fox News Sunday," Kerry on ABC's "This Week," and Dodd and Lott on CBS's "Face the Nation" and Cornyn and Wyden on CNN's "Late Edition."

No News From Iran's Leader On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0130150

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 11 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed in a speech marking the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution here on Sunday that Iran would not stop its nuclear program despite a United Nations deadline next week.

But he stopped short of making a promised announcement about "good news" in the country's nuclear progress, raising speculation that domestic political pressure and technological glitches may have put off a milestone in the government's efforts to begin mass enrichment of uranium.

In his speech, to a crowd estimated at more than 100,000 people who had gathered in Azadi Square in Tehran, he fell back on a formula that has become familiar as international sanctions and pressure have increased: vowing that Iran would never give up its right to enrich uranium, but promising that its program was for peaceful purposes only.

"We are ready for talks but will not suspend our program," he said.

In addition, he accused Western governments of making false promises of aid to lure Iran into giving up its program at a moment when it holds great promise.

"There is deception behind their demand for us to suspend our nuclear enrichment program; they want to force us to suspend the program and not let us resume it under an excuse," he said, adding that the last time the country halted its nuclear activities it took more than two years to restart the process.

The looming nuclear issue, and the events of a year in which Iran has worked to assert its importance on the world stage in other areas, added a note of historic importance to an anniversary celebration that in years past had often taken on the air of forced celebration.

This year, demonstrators converged to hear Mr. Ahmadinejad speak. Many held banners proclaiming Iran's nuclear aims, including the slogan: "Suspension, never, not even for one second!"

Mr. Ahmadinejad presented Iran's program as a fait accompli that the West would have to deal with, saying, "Our nuclear program is not a legal or a technical issue anymore, it has become a political one."

But the news of major success that he repeatedly promised last week did not appear in his presentation, nor in a parallel speech given by Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, at an international security conference in Munich. Instead, the president said the news would be announced sometime in the next two months, and he referred to the rally on Sunday as a "great nuclear celebration."

It was unclear whether Mr. Ahmadinejad's conspicuous silence reflected technical problems or political caution or some combination of the two.

Technically, Iran is on the edge of crossing a nuclear line it has envisioned for decades: moving beyond the experimental phase of its enrichment program, begun in secret in 1985 and continued in fits and starts since then, and progressing to industrial-scale production. It was widely believed that Mr. Ahmadinejad was planning to announce that step, claiming opening success in an effort to install 3,000 enrichment centrifuges in two cavernous halls at its desert nuclear plant near Natanz.

The plant is eventually meant to hold 54,000 centrifuges, allowing the enrichment of uranium by the ton for reactor fuel rods — or, if the Bush administration's fears are true, nuclear weapons.

But one outstanding question is whether the frenetic activity at the desert plant is real, a bluff or a little of both — whether Tehran has really mastered the centrifuge basics or is involved in a political show to strengthen its bargaining position in the global standoff over its nuclear program. The known technical facts suggest that it may be too soon for any immediate leap to an industrial capacity, some international nuclear experts say.

There has also been growing domestic political pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad to tone down his defiant rhetoric, especially after the recent imposition of sanctions by the United Nations.

Last week, reformist members of Parliament said they were ready to hold talks with their American counterparts in an effort to reduce tensions.

"It is time for the Parliaments of the two countries to use their legal power and authority to help bring understanding and cooperation between the two governments," said Akbar Alami, a reformist member of Parliament, the daily newspaper Aftab-e-Yazd reported Saturday.

Mr. Alami pointed to the rhetoric of Mr. Ahmadinejad and President Bush and said that both had been provoking animosity between the countries.

In between Mr. Ahmadinejad's alternately defiant and jubilant notes on Sunday, he also tried a reassuring one, taking pains to say that Iran would comply with International Atomic Energy Agency regulations and would not leave the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. "All our activities are watched by I.A.E.A. cameras," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130151

In Munich, Mr. Larijani, Iran's nuclear negotiator, echoed those assurances, telling an audience of military and disarmament experts that "we believe in a solution through negotiations and dialogue" and asserting that Iran was ready to restart talks over its nuclear program.

"If the other side is determined in doing so," he said, "I am sure within a few months all issues will be finalized and the way will be paved for long-term cooperation both in regional aspects and in energy."

But Iran still faces a Security Council deadline that looms much sooner than a few months down the road. The Council has set Feb. 24 as the deadline for the government to suspend its uranium enrichment program or face tougher sanctions.

In his speech, Mr. Larijani said sanctions were counterproductive.

Afterward, he met for more than an hour with Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, who had been involved in the negotiations with Iran. Mr. Larijani later met with Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister.

Iranians Voice Support For Tehran's Bid For Nuclear Energy (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

Tens of thousands of flag-waving Iranians converged on Azadi Square on Sunday to voice support for Iran's bid for nuclear energy, as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed to press forward with the nation's uranium enrichment program.

"When we suspend our activities, they will never let us resume them," the president told a crowd of cheering, chanting supporters who alternately sang patriotic anthems and burned Uncle Sam-hatted effigies of President Bush.

In his hourlong speech on the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution, when crowds each year assemble to commemorate the overthrow of Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, it was expected that Ahmadinejad would announce progress on Iran's uranium enrichment program.

Iran is said to be in the beginning stages of installing industrial-scale uranium enrichment centrifuges at an underground site at Natanz, but Ahmadinejad disclosed no advancements Sunday. Western nonproliferation specialists say the start-up has been hindered by technical problems, including difficulties operating the above-ground test centrifuges.

Iran has also hinted that it may try to set up P-2 centrifuges, which are more advanced than those being installed at Natanz, but there was no announcement of that, either. Ahmadinejad hinted that reports of new technological gains of an unspecified nature would be forthcoming between now and April 9.

Iranian officials have asserted a right to develop a civilian nuclear power program, but the U.S. and other leading Western nations believe that Iran is aiming to construct a nuclear weapon.

For all the flag-waving, fist-clenching and chants of "Death to America," the crowd seemed somewhat subdued, as did the president. Hundreds wandered off in the middle of Ahmadinejad's speech, and the subtext to the president's address was that Iran intended to cooperate and was prepared for talks if the U.S. did not unilaterally set the terms.

"Why are your nuclear sites operating 24 hours a day, and we have to stop ours? We are ready to negotiate, but in a fair atmosphere," the president said. "Why do we have to suspend [enrichment] before negotiations?"

He said Iran was committed to continuing full cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency, including access by IAEA inspectors to Iran's nuclear sites.

In Germany, meanwhile, chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani struck a similarly conciliatory tone, asserting that Iran was prepared to settle all outstanding issues with the IAEA over the next three weeks.

"Today we announce to you that the political will of Iran is aimed at the negotiated settlement of the case, and we don't want to aggravate the situation in our region," Larijani told a gathering of the world's top security officials in Munich.

He added that Iran was seeking harmonious relations with its neighbors in the Middle East.

"That Iran is willing to threaten Israel is wrong," Larijani said. "We pose no threat and if we are conducting nuclear research and development we are no threat to Israel. We have no intention of aggression against any country."

Ahmadinejad's speech was the highlight of a day here that also included schoolchildren singing patriotic songs (including a recently penned anthem, "Nuclear power for peaceful goal, today it's the song of Iranians," and "The threat of the United States is not useful anymore.")

One woman waved a caricature of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with huge lips pursed into an angry snarl. Bush was depicted with big ears and a cowboy hat stamped with the Star of David.

Streets on several sides of Azadi Square throughout Sunday morning were turned into rivers of people making their way toward the anniversary rally, most of them bused in by the government from government offices, factories and schools. But some came on their own, a few stopping to buy Spiderman and Barbie balloons along the way.

DOJ_NMG_0130152

"Please tell Mr. Bush, stay in your place, because you cannot do anything against this nation. If he tries to harm us, he will regret it," said Fatimeh Youssefi, who came with her granddaughter, both clutching chadors tightly around their chins. "We will defend our country to the day we are dead as martyrs."

"It's our duty to come here for our country and our revolution, and to say that nuclear energy is our right," said Mehdi Besharati, a 49-year-old government employee. "Why is it that the other countries can have nuclear energy, but we can't?"

Ahmadinejad also used the occasion to warn the U.S. about its continued presence in Iraq, although he did not address U.S. claims that Shiite-run Iran is aiding Shiite militias in the neighboring state.

"There's no more dictator, so why are you staying there? Iraq has a national parliament now. Why are you staying? Why are you making a new war between Sunni and Shia?" he said.

"The Iranian nation is brothers of the Iraqi nation. Millions of Iranians each year travel to Iraq. The security of Iraq is our security. If there is no safety in Iraq, it means there is no safety in the entire neighborhood," he said.

"You tried to ask us to make a solution in Iraq. We accepted, but you didn't accept our suggestions, and now you've made more and more problems."

Iran Softens Tone, Declares Readiness To Resume Talks (WP)

By Craig Whitlock And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 11 -- Facing the prospect of broader international sanctions, Iran's president and national security chief on Sunday offered to resume negotiations over their country's nuclear program and eased up on some of the contentious rhetoric of the past, including threats to destroy Israel.

In Munich, Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, briefly met with European diplomats for the first time since talks collapsed in September and said Iran was willing to return to formal discussions.

He also said his country had "no intention of aggression against any country," adding that Iran "posed no threat to Israel" in particular, despite past vows from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to wipe Israel "off the map."

Meanwhile in Tehran, Ahmadinejad also said that Iran was willing to resume negotiations, although both he and Larijani rejected a condition for talks set by the U.N. Security Council that Iran first freeze its uranium enrichment program. "We are prepared for dialogue but won't suspend our activities," Ahmadinejad said.

In an address commemorating the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution that overthrew the shah of Iran, Ahmadinejad said his government had made recent progress in its nuclear development but did not give specifics. Some diplomats and analysts had expected him to announce that Iran had made a breakthrough in its efforts to enrich uranium.

U.S. and European officials expressed doubt about the sincerity of Iran's stated willingness to talk. "Offering to negotiate but saying suspension's off the table raises a real question about the sincerity of what he said," U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt told reporters in Germany after Larijani's appearance at the Munich Conference on Security Policy, an annual gathering of top defense officials and diplomats from around the world.

In Paris, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said it would be "unacceptable" to hold negotiations unless Iran first agrees to freeze its nuclear activities. "We have to be exceedingly clear and very rigorous on this proposition," he said.

Larijani met briefly in Munich with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. Although no breakthroughs were reported, it was the first time the two sides had met since talks between Iran and European diplomats broke off last fall over Iran's refusal to end its uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes, but U.S. and European officials say Tehran is pushing to develop atomic weapons in violation of international treaties.

On Friday, the International Atomic Energy Agency suspended some technical aid to Iran, which is under a Feb. 21 deadline from the Security Council to stop enriching uranium or face more international sanctions.

With the deadline looming, Iranian officials have sounded less strident of late. Although Ahmadinejad has garnered worldwide headlines for threatening to destroy Israel and for calling the Holocaust a "myth," diplomats and analysts said he has lost domestic political support in recent months and is under pressure to moderate his tone and positions.

In Munich, where Hitler and the Nazis first tasted power, Larijani tried to sidestep questions about his government's views on the Holocaust, during which the Third Reich orchestrated the killing of an estimated 6 million Jews and about 5 million other Europeans. It is a crime in Germany to deny that the Holocaust happened.

"There is an overreaction to the matter of the Holocaust," Larijani said. "It's a historical matter. I can't see why such sensitivities are being given to such a simple case."

DOJ_NMG_0130153

Larijani also said Iran was a force for regional stability in the Middle East and had no designs on any of its neighbors, including Iraq and Israel. "We pose no threat, and if we are conducting nuclear research and development, we are no threat to Israel," he said.

Instead, Larijani blamed the United States for bringing chaos to the Middle East and South Asia, noting that it had invaded two of Iran's neighbors, Iraq and Afghanistan. He echoed some of the criticism leveled a day earlier in Munich by Russian President Vladimir Putin, who harshly accused the United States of making the world more dangerous than at any point during the Cold War.

In his own speech at the Munich conference Sunday, U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates used both humor and pointed remarks to parry Putin's speech. "One Cold War was quite enough," Gates told the audience of about 200 defense and foreign ministers and other officials from about two dozen countries.

Alluding to the fact that both he and Putin are former intelligence officials, Gates said, "I guess old spies have a habit of blunt speaking."

But he added, "I've been to reeducation camp" -- a reference to the four years he spent as president of Texas A&M University before becoming the Pentagon chief.

Gates, who has been defense secretary for just two months, noted that he has accepted an invitation from Putin to visit Russia.

Gates devoted most of his speech to urging NATO members to contribute to the force fighting Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan.

"It is vitally important that the success Afghanistan has achieved not be allowed to slip away through neglect or lack of political will or resolve," Gates said.

Iran Raises Hopes Of Nuclear Settlement (FT)

By Gareth Smyth, Stephen Fidler And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Iran's top security official on Sunday held out hope for a "negotiated settlement" on Tehran's nuclear programme and said the programme would pose no threat to Israel or any other country.

Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also told an international security conference in Munich that his government was willing to discuss technical limitations on uranium enrichment, to ensure it could not make the highly enriched uranium needed for a nuclear weapon.

In remarks that deviated from a prepared text, he also said Iran was open to talks on a multinational arrangement for uranium enrichment. But he suggested Tehran still considered it had the right to conduct its own uranium enrichment.

Despite international fears that Iranian rhetoric would be ratcheted up Sunday as hundreds of thousands rallied in Tehran to mark the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution, the country's leaders said they were open to compromise over the programme although they would not abandon it.

After discussions with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy supremo, Mr Larijani struck an optimistic note. "An important point is that I felt that Europe has the necessary will for a settlement of this case and there is the political will on our side to have a negotiated settlement." Earlier, he told the conference: "There are solutions to address your concern: we don't want you to be concerned."

European officials said the meeting was too brief to ascertain whether Mr Larijani's comments represented a potential breakthrough.

Meanwhile, on Sunday a US defence official in Baghdad said 170 coalition troops had been killed by Iranian-made roadside bombs, as US anger rises at Tehran's alleged involvement in the war. The official said there was "a growing body" of evidence of Iranian weapons being smuggled into Iraq and used to kill their soldiers.

Last week in Seville, Robert Gates, US defence secretary, said Washington had "pretty good" evidence that Iran was providing militias in Iraq with sophisticated explosive devices called " explosively formed projectiles". He said the evidence included serial numbers and markings on fragments of exploded devices. Tehran denies the charge and blames US soldiers for the violence and for inflaming tensions between Shia and once-dominant Sunni.

But Mr Gates dismissed suggestions that the recent increase in anti-Iranian rhetoric from US officials was a prelude to war. After the Iranian supreme leader threatened on Thursday to respond to any US attack on Iran, Mr Gates that day responded that it was "just another day in the Persian Gulf".

Asked later whether his response was aimed at ratcheting down the American rhetoric, he replied: "In the last few weeks there's been an effort in Washington actually to tone down everybody else. I don't know how many times the president,

DOJ_NMG_0130154

[Secretary of State Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran, that the second carrier group [recently dispatched to the Gulf] is there to reassure our allies, as well as to send a signal that we've been in the Persian Gulf for decades and we intend to stay there. And I think these are fairly modest statements, frankly."

At a rally in Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad also adopted a less combative tone, saying Iran was ready for "dialogue" and would remain within the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which prohibits the development of atomic weapons. But he also stressed that Iran "would never accept . . . humiliation" by suspending nuclear activities, which the UN Security Council has demanded by this month. "A huge power like Iran cannot be threatened with sanctions," he told cheering crowds.

Iran's reformists and pragmatic conservatives have in recent weeks been trying to pressurise Ayatollah Khamenei to make Mr Ahmadi-Nejad adopt a more measured approach.

But one analyst told the FT he detected in Sunday's speech little evidence of a significant shift in Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's views. "He was as tough as ever," said Nasser Hadian, professor of politics at Tehran University.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said Iran had already achieved "its inalienable right", an apparent reference to proficiency in fuel-cycle technology, and promised further news of "great" progress.

The president did not, as had been expected by some western diplomats, announce an expansion of the number of centrifuges – the device used to enrich uranium – at its Natanz plant. Neither did he announce that gas had been introduced to the centrifuges, as some had predicted.

A report from Mohammad ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is due to be presented to the UN watchdog's board on February 21. Mr ElBaradei has tried to get negotiations under way by calling for a "time out", in which Iran would suspend enrichment simultaneously with the start of talks.

Iran Hits Softer Note Over Nukes (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad marked the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution in Tehran Sunday by telling a mass rally that anyone who gave up "one iota" of the controversial nuclear program would be the "most hated man in Iran."

But a far more conciliatory – and unexpected – message was offered to Western security chiefs meeting in Munich by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, who said that Iran is ready to resolve within three weeks all issues with the UN nuclear watchdog agency. "The political will of Iran is aimed at the negotiated settlement of the case and we don't want to aggravate the situation in our region," Mr. Larijani said.

Iran's nuclear messages come just days before a Feb. 21 deadline set by the UN Security Council for Iran to stop uranium enrichment or face broader sanctions than the limited restrictions imposed by a resolution in late December.

Larijani's words indicate that despite Mr. Ahmadinejad's tough rhetoric – or perhaps because of it – Tehran has grasped how sensitive Iran's position has become, analysts say. But diplomats reacted with skepticism, even as they tried to find a compromise on the issue of enrichment.

Larijani's offer came as senior US officials in Baghdad presented what they called a "growing body" of evidence of high-level Iranian interference in Iraq, with lethal weapons and agents. Showing bomb fragments and mortar fins to journalists, the intelligence analysts charged that sophisticated roadside bombs known as "explosively formed penetrators" (EFPs) had been made in Iran and smuggled into Iraq, where they have killed 170 coalition troops since 2004.

The US analysts further charged that special units of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, known as the Al Qods forces, had been actively plying Shiite militias in Iraq with training, cash, and high-tech explosives to use against US forces. Of five Iranian "diplomats" detained by US forces last month in Arbil, the officials allege, one is head of Al Qods operations in Iraq.

In Germany, Mr. Larijani said the nuclear issue could be solved with "constructive dialogue," adding that Iran's program – which Tehran claims is limited to creating nuclear power, not weapons – is "no threat to Israel. We have no intention of aggression against any country."

The Iranian nuclear messages come just days before a Feb. 21 deadline set by the UN Security Council for Iran to stop uranium enrichment, or face broader sanctions than the limited restriction imposed by a unanimous resolution in late December. Ahmadinejad has in the past rejected the sanctions resolution as a "torn paper," and Sunday ruled out any suspension. Rallygoers echoed the president, chanting that nuclear power is Iran's "right."

Iran has vowed to complete building a cascade of 3,000 centrifuges by the end of this year, and to begin "industrial scale" enrichment of uranium to fuel power plants, which could also – at least in theory – produce enough material for a one weapon within a year.

But problems have beset the work of two 164-centrifuge pilot cascades already operating; 50 centrifuges "blew up" last spring, Iranian officials say. Rumors circulated this week in Tehran that the president would announce that Iran was installing the first 1,000 centrifuges at the underground site of Natanz, to defy UN demands.

"Image is outpacing reality when it comes to [Iranian] technology. The schedule is politically driven," says Michael Levi, a nuclear physicist and nonproliferation expert at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

"If Iran's near-term goal is to establish political facts on the ground, then the success of the technology is only of marginal importance," says Mr. Levi, who visited Iran last spring, a week after Ahmadinejad declared Iran a member of the nuclear club, after it produced a few grams of low-enriched uranium.

"People are too quick to infer that, because Iran is scaling up [enrichment] operations, that it has mastered lower-level operations," says Levi. "If this were a science fair project, that might make sense. But this is, number one, about shaping the international political environment."

Defiant tone, compliant actions

Senior Iranian officials had said to expect a major announcement of progress Sunday. But while Ahmadinejad made typically defiant tones, he also made it clear that Iran intended to follow safeguard rules as a signatory of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Inspectors of the UN International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in the past week set up monitoring cameras in the Natanz enrichment facility, and canceled 18 cooperation programs with Iran on Friday that could have had dual civilian- military use, in accordance with the Security Council resolution.

"The problems [Iranians] are having don't seem to be showstoppers. Their centrifuges crash more than they did when the Dutch built similar machines ... [but] they are further along," says David Albright, a physicist and former IAEA inspector in Iraq, who has long followed the Iran case as president of the Institute for Science and International Security.

"Our 'worst case' assessment that they could have a bomb in 2009 hasn't changed," says Mr. Albright, noting that Iran would first have to make a definitive decision to go for a weapon – a step that Albright and other analysts believe that Iran has not yet made – and that "things would have to go well for them," which so far they have not.

"At some point, Iran has got to play its hand on how much it knows, if it is going to install these 3,000 machines this year," says Albright. "It's got to start hooking them together in cascades, and then turn them on and see if they work. I think we are going to learn a lot more in the next month or two about their capabilities."

When Iran first announced last spring that it had enriched uranium to 4.8 percent – high enough for nuclear fuel, but far short of the more than 80 or 90 percent necessary to make weapons-grade material – it declared plans to build its 3,000-centrifuge cascade by the end of 2006.

But technical difficulties and a fluid political dynamic inside Iran that has been partly influenced by surprise at the unanimous Security Council resolution against the Islamic Republic, are affecting Iran's nuclear timeline.

"The biggest impact on [Iran] is fear of what could happen in the future, and more pressure on countries not to invest in Iran. It's embarrassing; they are a very proud nation, and don't like being called a pariah by the Security Council," says Albright. "But is that going to slow down their nuclear program? I don't think so."

Rising tension with the West has been defined by Ahmadinejad's uncompromising language on the nuclear issue, and by denying the Holocaust and calling for the destruction of Israel.

The White House has also ratcheted up its rhetoric in recent weeks, accusing Iran of supplying anti-US militias and insurgents in Iraq with weapons. It has also taken concrete military steps – such as sending a second aircraft carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf, mine sweepers to key oil export routes, and Patriot anti-missile batteries to regional allies.

US officials are preparing a new Security Council resolution that would broaden economic sanctions if Iran fails to meet the Feb. 21 deadline. One addition could be holding Iran in violation of prohibitions of harboring terrorists, The Washington Post reports, because of several key Al Qaeda members officially held under "house arrest" in Iran since late 2001.

But there are growing signals in Iran, too, that pragmatic conservatives – and even Iran's supreme religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who refused a meeting requested by Ahmadinejad two weeks ago – have been trying to rein in the president on foreign policy issues.

Ahmedinejad may be more isolated

Ahmadinejad has been further weakened by the failure of his allies in December municipal and Experts Assembly elections. Conservative newspapers have criticized him for bringing Iran closer to war, and more than 100 parliament deputies last week took him to task for foreign policy adventures.

"A lot of [Iranians] think the new sanctions on Iran and the new rising tension between Iran and the US is mainly because of Mr. Ahmadinejad's statements about the Holocaust and so on," says Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in Tehran. "Everyone thinks the situation is more sensitive than before, and that they should be careful about their statements.... You can see that [Ahmadinejad] these days is more silent."

But a modest muting of such rhetoric does not mean that Iran's nuclear program has lost its popularity, or its utility to Iran's theocratic regime. A placard bearing Ayatollah Khamenei's image at the rally Sunday read: "Achieving indigenous nuclear science is an epochmaking and civilization-building move."

"If the US does not want to give the [Islamic] system security guarantees [that it won't attack Iran], they have no other choice in Tehran but to be as strong as possible," says Mr. Laylaz. "They are going to protect themselves by providing this [nuclear] shield."

Attacking Iran would be a catastrophic mistake, even if all the allegations now being made about Iranian actions in Iraq are true.

But it wouldn't be the first catastrophic mistake this administration has made, and there are indications that, at the very least, a powerful faction in the administration is spoiling for a fight.

Before we get to the apparent war-mongering, let's talk about the basics. Are there people in Iran providing aid to factions in Iraq, factions that sometimes kill Americans as well as other Iraqis? Yes, probably. But you can say the same about Saudi Arabia, which is believed to be a major source of financial support for Sunni insurgents — and Sunnis, not Iranian-backed Shiites, are still responsible for most American combat deaths.

The Bush administration, however, with its close personal and financial ties to the Saudis, has always downplayed Saudi connections to America's enemies. Iran, on the other hand, which had no connection to 9/11, and was actually quite helpful to the United States in the months after the terrorist attack, somehow found itself linked with its bitter enemy Saddam Hussein as part of the "axis of evil."

So the administration has always had it in for the Iranian regime. Now, let's do an O. J. Simpson: if you were determined to start a war with Iran, how would you do it?

First, you'd set up a special intelligence unit to cook up rationales for war. A good model would be the Pentagon's now-infamous Office of Special Plans, led by Abram Shulsky, that helped sell the Iraq war with false claims about links to Al Qaeda.

Sure enough, last year Donald Rumsfeld set up a new "Iranian directorate" inside the Pentagon's policy shop. And last September Warren Strobel and John Walcott of McClatchy Newspapers — who were among the few journalists to warn that the administration was hyping evidence on Iraqi W.M.D. — reported that "current and former officials said the Pentagon's Iranian directorate has been headed by Abram Shulsky."

Next, you'd go for a repeat of the highly successful strategy by which scare stories about the Iraqi threat were disseminated to the public.

This time, however, the assertions wouldn't be about W.M.D.; they'd be that Iranian actions are endangering U.S. forces in Iraq. Why? Because there's no way Congress will approve another war resolution. But if you can claim that Iran is doing evil in Iraq, you can assert that you don't need authorization to attack — that Congress has already empowered the administration to do whatever is necessary to stabilize Iraq. And by the time the lawyers are finished arguing — well, the war would be in full swing.

Finally, you'd build up forces in the area, both to prepare for the strike and, if necessary, to provoke a casus belli. There's precedent for the idea of provocation: in a January 2003 meeting with Prime Minster Tony Blair, The New York Times reported last year, President Bush "talked about several ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire."

In the end, Mr. Bush decided that he didn't need a confrontation to start that particular war. But war with Iran is a harder sell, so sending several aircraft carrier groups into the narrow waters of the Persian Gulf, where a Gulf of Tonkin-type incident could all too easily happen, might be just the thing.

O.K., I hope I'm worrying too much. Those carrier groups could be going to the Persian Gulf just as a warning.

But you have to wonder about the other stuff. Why would the Pentagon put someone who got everything wrong on Iraq in charge of intelligence on Iran? Why wasn't any official willing to take personal responsibility for the reliability of alleged evidence of Iranian mischief, as opposed to being an anonymous source? If the evidence is solid enough to bear close scrutiny, why were all cameras and recording devices, including cellphones, banned from yesterday's Baghdad briefing?

It's still hard to believe that they're really planning to attack Iran, when it's so obvious that another war would be a recipe for even bigger disaster. But remember who's calling the shots: Dick Cheney thinks we've had "enormous successes" in Iraq.

U.S. Troops Enter Eastern Baghdad As New Push Begins (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — American troops locked down a large industrial area of eastern Baghdad on Sunday while Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, without indicating how he would do it, vowed to speed the deployment of Iraqi forces throughout the war-ravaged capital.

American commanders described the operation in the area, the Rusafa district, as an early taste of the large-scale sweeps expected in eastern Baghdad to take back some measure of control from militias. Soldiers from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from Ft. Lewis, Wash., were fired on by insurgents with automatic rifles. The soldiers detained 10 Iraqis while searching for a car-bomb manufacturing site in the area, a violent sectarian fault line between a Shiite enclave and the insurgent-ridden Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil.

The operations in eastern Baghdad are to be a centerpiece of the so-called surge of 21,000 troops that many here view as a last-ditch effort to save the country from all-out civil war. Eastern Baghdad "is a focal point for us right now," said Brig. Gen. John Campbell, deputy commander of coalition troops in Baghdad. American-led forces say they have conducted 3,400 patrols and detained 140 suspects in the past week.

Mr. Maliki, who is under immense pressure from his Shiite backers who say their neighborhoods are becoming increasingly vulnerable to attacks by Sunni insurgents, said Sunday that he had ordered an accelerated deployment of Iraqi soldiers and policemen to areas considered sanctuaries for insurgents and militias. "It will not start in just one area, but in all areas at the same time," he said.

But it remains unclear just how fast that deployment will take place, because only a portion of the Iraqi forces called for under the new Baghdad security plan are in position. And if the Iraqis who accompanied American soldiers during the 14-hour mission on Sunday were an accurate barometer, most are skeptical that the latest plan will make much difference. Similar operations in the past have largely failed.

"With all these security plans before this one, nothing has happened," said an Iraqi lawyer who spoke to a few soldiers near the Bab al-Sheik police station after he finished dealing with one of his cases.

The American brigade commander, Col. Steve Townsend, whose unit is part of the Second Infantry Division, said later that he believed most Iraqis would welcome more American troops. "I don't think the security plan is a hard sell," he said. "I just think that at this point they are a bit jaded."

After his soldiers stopped in a Shiite neighborhood close to Fadhil, one middle-aged Iraqi man told them, "The government is tired, and we are tired too." He explained that people were reluctant to identify insurgents because "then they go and kill them after that."

As he spoke, the crackle of automatic gunfire erupted to the southwest, and Americans and nearby Iraqis dove behind vehicles. Taking cover behind his 19-ton Stryker armored vehicle, Colonel Townsend looked through the sight of his rifle and drew a bead on several suspicious men.

"See the radio antenna?" he asked one of his soldiers, as they both looked through sights. "Two fingers from that. A cluster of heads." But they did not return fire, because it was not clear who fired the shots.

Nearby, the Iraqis seemed unruffled. "They always fire from over there," one of the onlookers said. "Over there" was in the direction of Fadhil. Residents in the largely Shiite districts around Fadhil described that densely packed Sunni neighborhood as a place most would never go to.

"They drive their cars out from there, kidnap their victims, and return back to Fadhil," said Brig. Gen. Latif Muhammed, a police commander who oversees areas near Fadhil.

Residents in and around Fadhil said they hoped the presence of American soldiers would quiet the fighting that has trapped some in their homes for weeks. They said their streets and alleys have become a frontline battleground for Shiite fighters from neighborhoods to the northeast, near Sadr City, and Sunni gunmen who have sought to protect their turf from the Mahdi Army, the militia based in Sadr city that is loyal to Moktada al-Sadr.

Shiites in Sadriya, one neighborhood bordering Fadhil, have said Sunnis from Fadhil have been after Shiites for months — as shown, they said, by the truck bomb that killed at least 135 people last week.

In Fadhil, however, three Sunni residents said the fighting started about five months ago, when the Sadr organization sought to open a mosque and office in the area and local leaders refused. "It's like we have marks on our foreheads," said a widow in her 40s who would only give her name as Um Haider. "They know we're from Fadhil and they shoot at us."

DOJ_NMG_0130158

She also said Shiite officials had refused to let her collect her husband's pension, and that the man who once provided food ration cards had been killed. Residents, she said, shoot at the Iraqi Army and the police because they believe they are allies of the Mahdi Army. "If the Americans are here, the Mahdi Army will be afraid to attack," she said.

But Uday Ahmed, 31, a Sunni whose family lost three restaurants in the bombing at the Sadriya marketplace, was less sanguine. "This is maybe the 10th time that the Americans have raided in Fadhil and nothing has changed," he said. "I don't think that it will work this time either."

Violence continued elsewhere on Sunday. In Adwar, southeast of Tikrit, a suicide truck bomber slammed into a police station in the morning, killing at least nine policemen and prisoners, and wounding at least 10 others.

The United States military also announced the deaths of two soldiers. One died after being shot Saturday during combat operations in Diyala Province; another was killed in an attack on Sunday when he was on patrol in western Baghdad.

In Ramadi, a fuel tanker exploded at a police checkpoint, killing at least three people and wounding at least eight. Minutes later a suicide bomber tried to enter the area but was stopped by the police. He detonated the bomb and killed himself and one policeman.

Baghdad was relatively quiet on Sunday. A car bomb in Mansour killed one person and wounded three, an Interior Ministry official said. The authorities also found 27 bodies throughout the city, many showing signs of torture.

Bombing At Tikrit Police Station Kills 9 (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o And Saad Al-izzi

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 -- Nine police officers were killed Sunday near Tikrit when a suicide bomber drove up to a police station and detonated explosives hidden under hay on the bed of a truck, the U.S. military and Iraqi officials said.

The blast, which took place at 9:15 a.m. in front of the Dawr police station, wounded several children at a school across the street and damaged several houses, Iraqi officials said.

"I was inside the police station and . . . there was a loud explosion that I could not describe, for I have not heard anything like that before in my life," said an officer, Ahmed Subhi, 23. "I was holding a tray with teacups, and the last thing I remember was that I was being pushed along with the tray toward one of the walls in the room and parts of the ceiling falling on me."

Dawr, in a heavily Sunni Muslim area in north-central Iraq, is near the site where U.S. officials found deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein hiding in December 2003.

Meanwhile, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Sunday that the Baghdad security plan, which officials have described as a gradual, concentrated effort to step up patrols in the capital, will speed up this week.

"It will not start in one area in particular but in all areas at the same time, and those who will participate in conducting it are from all the spectrums of Iraq, from which the police and army troops are made up," he said.

The country's police and army are predominantly Shiite.

Maliki said troops will simultaneously seal off 10 areas of the capital to crack down on insurgent and militia groups and protect homes abandoned by Iraqis who have fled the violence.

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced that a Multi-National Division soldier was killed Sunday in western Baghdad. The soldier was shot when his unit was "conducting a cordon and search operation," the military said in a statement. A second soldier was wounded by small-arms fire.

Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad that U.S. helicopters in Iraq have come under attack 100 times per month on average since 2004.

Simmons said helicopter travel in Iraq has increased considerably in recent years as roads have become more dangerous. He said U.S. Army helicopters were expected to log 400,000 hours of flight time this year; in 2005 they logged 240,000 hours.

Simmons said that most U.S. helicopters shot down recently in Iraq crashed in predominantly Sunni areas but that there was no evidence insurgents were using sophisticated weapons to bring them down.

"There is no indication that we have seen that the enemy is employing any form of advanced ground-to-air missile," he said.

A U.S. military spokesman said Sunday night that a report from Iraqi police in Tikrit indicating that an AH-64 Apache helicopter had been shot down earlier in the day was unfounded.

Insurgents Stepping Up Efforts To Down U.S. Helicopters In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130159

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — A deputy commanding general in Iraq whose duties include aviation said Sunday that insurgents had adopted new tactics and stepped up their efforts to shoot down American helicopters, and he acknowledged that the rash of recent incidents included a previously unreported downing of a Black Hawk late last month.

The unreported incident took place on Jan. 25 near the Euphrates River town of Hit when a Black Hawk was struck by automatic weapons fire from the ground, said Maj. Gen. Jim Simmons, a deputy commanding general for the American-led Multi-National Force in Iraq. All aboard were evacuated and there were no casualties, General Simmons said.

Depending on the outcome of an investigation into the crash last Wednesday of a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter, the latest report brings the number of American military and civilian helicopters shot down in Iraq in the past 21 days to either six or seven. General Simmons said preliminary findings suggested that the Sea Knight went down because of mechanical problems, but some witness reports indicated that the helicopter was shot down. All seven people aboard died.

"I will tell you that someone who is involved in a fight, who is adaptive and thinking, will develop the tactics to be able to engage people," General Simmons said, speaking of the insurgents. "I believe that is what we have seen here."

General Simmons said he also believed that the insurgents might be especially motivated to shoot down helicopters as a way of discrediting the new American and Iraqi security plan.

The United States military effort in Iraq depends heavily on moving cargo, weaponry and troops by helicopter, and any disruption of the flights would undoubtedly have a major impact.

The general acknowledged for the first time that the American military had altered its flight patterns and schedules as a result of the downings, but he added: "We have not canceled one mission, and there has been absolutely no reduction in rotary wing aircraft flight. Nor will there be."

He said that helicopter transport had become ever more critical over the past few years as ground convoys have become increasingly dangerous. In 2005, Army helicopters logged 240,000 hours, and in 2006 the figure was 334,000 hours, General Simmons said. The projected number in 2007 is 400,000 hours, he said.

"In many cases it's more efficient, it's more effective to move people and supplies by air than it is by ground," the general said. He added that it had also generally been safer.

Battles between insurgents on the ground and American helicopters in the air have by no means been rare at any time during the conflict. General Simmons said that since December 2004 the helicopters have been engaged by hostile forces about 100 times a month, mostly by small arms and automatic weapons, but occasionally by shoulder-fired missiles. On average, 17 helicopters have been hit each month.

As a result of those engagements, 29 Army helicopters have been shot down in the entire conflict, he said. He did not immediately have the total including Marine and other helicopters, but an unofficial tally by the Brookings Institution indicates that since the beginning of the conflict, 57 American military helicopters have either crashed or been shot down.

Among the most troublesome recent tactics by insurgents is firing on helicopters with heavy machine guns from more than one direction at once, General Simmons said. He said that had been the case in the Jan. 20 downing of a Black Hawk in which 12 service members died.

The general, an Army aviator who has been commander of an Apache attack helicopter brigade, used nicknames to refer to many of the military aircraft that had been shot down. Beginning with the Black Hawk shot down on Jan. 20, they were EZ 40, Tarantula 26, Big Gun 72 and Crazy Horse 08. He did not use a nickname for the Marine helicopter that went down last week.

What Is Plan C? (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw And Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Amid the congressional grandstanding last week over U.S. policy in Iraq, House Minority Leader John Boehner tried to channel President Bush and cast the choice as a simple one. "If you're not for victory in Iraq," the Ohio Republican said, "you're for failure."

If only it were that simple.

What kind of "victory," realistically, is achievable at this point? Certainly not a model democracy. Probably not even a particularly stable government, but perhaps one that would present some semblance of central authority and deny al Qaeda a new home for its training camps. What would failure be? These days, most Americans would probably settle for anything less than an all-out civil or regional war-as long as it brings the troops home. More voices are arguing that maybe the goal should simply be getting U.S. troops out of Iraq, whatever the consequences.

For now, Democrats and Republicans in Congress are tying themselves in knots trying to respond to the new strategy President Bush laid out last month for Iraq-his Plan B. The president's critics have focused on his call for a so-called surge of 21,500 U.S. troops, but Plan B is a broader shift that makes American soldiers responsible (for the first time) for keeping the Iraqi people safe. The new security plan is still taking shape, with additional U.S. troops moving into Baghdad. But the past two weeks have been demoralizing, with a handful of U.S. helicopters shot down and Baghdad convulsed by its own surge of suicide bombings and sectarian killings.

Even U.S. officials admit privately that Plan B is a long shot, alarmingly dependent on the performance of an Iraqi government that has yet to demonstrate much by way of resolve. Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, puts the odds of success at "probably less than 1 in 4." U.S. intelligence agencies are downright skeptical. The newly issued National Intelligence Estimate says that both Iraqi leaders and security forces will be "hard pressed" to move forward in the next 18 months.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates told a Senate panel last week that he is "planning for success" but conceded that he has ordered Pentagon officials to look at fallbacks. "I would be irresponsible," he said, "if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be." In public, U.S. officials are loath to discuss a possible "Plan C," but any significant shift would require months of preparation.

Unfortunately, the options for Plan C range from ugly to abhorrent-underscoring exactly how much is riding on Bush's Plan B. A look at five of the most-discussed options for Plan C, and their shortcomings:

1. WITHDRAWAL

Announce a date for the withdrawal of U.S. troops; accelerate training of Iraqi security forces; intensify diplomatic efforts to keep Iraq's neighbors from intervening

With violence spiraling and the Iraqi government so far unable to reverse the trend, a new report by the Council on Foreign Relations suggests that the situation may simply be irretrievable and U.S. forces will have to pull out from an unstable Iraq sooner or later. "It is now just a matter of time," the report concludes. "Better to withdraw as a coherent ... act than withdraw later in a hectic response to public opposition ... or a series of unexpectedly sharp reverses on the ground in Iraq."

Target: U.S. Choppers (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball And Dan Ephron

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Six U.S. choppers (including two belonging to a private security company) have crashed in Iraq since Jan. 20, killing a total of 27. Investigators have concluded four were shot down and are still sifting through the debris of the fifth crash site. (The sixth crash had no fatalities.) The Pentagon says publicly it's too early to determine whether the surge points to new tactics by insurgents. But a U.S. counterterrorism official said it looks as if some Iraqi fighters have been getting special training lately on how to down helicopters. The official, who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter, indicated that intel analysts were divided over the question of Iranian involvement in the training and that evidence so far was not conclusive. He said low-flying helicopters are being brought down by what amounts to small-arms fire—insurgents aiming machine guns or even rifles at the chopper's vulnerable spots. Some intel analysts believe insurgents have acquired armor-piercing ammunition that can be especially effective against helicopters, according to the official.

Part of the problem is that helicopters are vulnerable at almost any altitude. "Any time you're low, you are exposing yourself to some small arms. Any time you're high, you are exposing yourself to the SAMs [surface-to-air missiles]," said Col. Robert Quackenbush, a veteran Army officer who has flown both Apaches and Black Hawks. Quackenbush said pilots chart different flight patterns every day depending upon intel about insurgents on the ground. He said U.S. investigators in Iraq were sending back debris from the crash sites to U.S. labs, where it will be analyzed to determine what weapons were used and where they originated.

Army aviation official Lee Tutin said the Pentagon is developing lightweight armor panels that would protect a helicopter's exterior from machine-gun fire. But, he said, the extra weight would mean choppers could carry fewer passengers or less ammunition. The fear of crashes aside, many soldiers still prefer flying to travel by roads, where IEDs (improvised explosive devices) account for nearly 40 percent of American fatalities. Cutting back on chopper use would be a serious blow to U.S. mobility in Iraq. But if insurgents continue to improve their aim, the counterterrorism official said, the military would need to find safer ways to move soldiers.

The Incredible Shrinking Deficit (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130161

It might be a bit cynical, not to mention premature, to call President Bush's new $2.9 trillion budget "dead on arrival." But the myriad proposals on everything from the Pentagon to the National Park Service are certainly going to be massaged a bit-mutilated in some cases, probably-by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. One thing you can bank on, though, is that when all is said and done, nixed and negotiated, Uncle Sam will still be in the red.

As the White House figures it, the federal government will be spending $244 billion more than it collects in 2007 (or about 1.8 percent of gross domestic product) and $239 billion in 2008 (or 1.6 percent of GDP). Still, those are hardly scary numbers for a $13.5 trillion economy. "The magnitude of the current deficit is nothing to be concerned about," says Jared Bernstein, an economist at the liberal Economic Policy Institute.

What would the numbers be if the country were not fighting wars in both Afghanistan and Iraq? Bush's budget includes a request for $93 billion in supplemental war funding for 2007 as well as a $142 billion request for 2008, the first time the White House has explicitly budgeted for the two wars. And what's the running tally on America's 21st-century military expeditions? So far $427 billion has been appropriated for "operations in the Global War on Terror." Tack on the funds requested in the new budget, and the total is $662 billion. War doves and budget hawks will recall that when former White House economic adviser Lawrence Lindsey estimated the cost of the war in Iraq to be between $100 billion and $200 billion, then Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz scoffed, "We are dealing with a country that can really finance its own reconstruction, and relatively soon."

Doubters. Like many forecasts coming out of Washington, that one didn't pan out. And many budget experts doubt the White House's new economic forecast will either. Speaking at chipmaker Micron Technology's Manassas, Va., manufacturing plant last week, Bush said he appreciated "very much the fact that companies like Micron actually have a budget. It's a concept that the government needs to get used to, too. ...I submitted a budget yesterday that says we can balance the budget by 2012 without raising your taxes."

Indeed, the Bush budget does promise such things. According to the proposal, the U.S. government would run a $61 billion surplus in 2012, though the projected deficits in 2010 ($94.4 billion) and 2011 ($53.8 billion) would be so small relative to the size of a projected $18 trillion economy-0.6 percent and 0.3 percent of gross domestic product-as to be financially insignificant. (And yes, bean counters of America, these numbers do assume that Social Security surpluses are commingled with the rest of tax revenues.)

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office also shows the budget moving into balance by 2012, but there is a key difference from the Bush budget: The CBO assumes the 2001 and 2003 Bush tax cuts will expire, thereby bringing in a load of new tax revenue. Bush assumes the tax cuts stay in place.

Wanted: A Few Good Iraqis. Or Jordanians. Or . . . Anybody? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The Pentagon and the State Department have been squabbling quite publicly over State's request to have the already-stretched military fill about 40 percent of the 300 new State jobs in Iraq created by the administration's latest rebuilding plan.

Seems the military isn't the only one balking at working there. The U.S. Embassy in Baghdad is finding it increasingly difficult to get local Iraqis to work there because of what one senior official at the embassy called the "precarious security situation" in the country.

Last year, 35 local employees resigned, "nearly all due to security issues," the official said. The State Department is authorized to hire 136 local people for jobs in the embassy, but right now only 47 are filled by Iraqis. Thirteen more are filled by Jordanians brought over in a program specifically set up to fill the chronic gap.

Even with the Jordanians, the "ever-growing" shortage of local Iraqis "seriously impacts on our ability to carry out the normal, day-to-day operations of the embassy," the official said. They can't find Iraqis to fill the solid-paying jobs even in a country where the unemployment rate is estimated to be 25 to 40 percent.

Two years ago, the department sent out pleas for volunteers to go to Iraq, but the responses were mostly from folks who could fill only low-level jobs. There are now a number of important mid-level jobs the embassy needs to fill with people from the region.

So the plan now is to provide additional benefits -- housing and meals, more vacation, more health benefits and other inducements -- to entice local people hired at embassies in the region and even elsewhere in the world who might be willing to work in Iraq on six-month rotations. There is talk of figuring out ways to hire retired embassy employees from the region to come back in and work in Baghdad as contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0130162

The long-term hope is to hire Iraqis for these jobs, but given the chaos and insecurity in Baghdad these days, nobody's counting on that option.Love in the Time of Bioterrorism

All set to mail that beautiful Valentine's Day bouquet to your favorite lawmakers to thank them for favoring your clients? Sending truffles to your main squeeze on the Hill?

You've waited too long! Even if you run out right now to mail your gifts, even if you overnight them, Senate and House officials warn, your little something sweet is not likely to get there by Wednesday.

That's because the security screening process adds two, maybe even three, days to the usual delivery times. "In anticipation of Valentine's Day," House Chief Administrative Officer Jay Eagen and Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood caution in a Feb. 1 letter to members and staff, "be advised that overnight deliveries via a nationwide system (FedEx, UPS, DHL, etc.) will be processed by the off-site Postal Operations screening facility."

And that adds a good extra couple of days, they say, because packages "must be held in quarantine until the test results deem the packages safe." That means your flowers, candy and such -- as well as cards and other gifts -- will sit around, wilting and melting, at the postal facility -- though the "staff will make every attempt to secure the perishable items" in refrigerated quarantine, the letter says.

Senate Sergeant at Arms Terrance W. Gainer suggests that staff "advise family and friends to refrain from directing" flowers and gifts to the Hill, warning of a 72-hour wait.

Both the Senate and the House bar couriers and vendors from making deliveries directly to the Capitol or its office buildings. If a flower-delivery person calls, "please instruct the delivery person to meet you in an outside public area," the House advisory says. "You must meet the delivery person, inspect the flowers and bring the flowers" into the buildings yourself. (Don't forget to give a nice tip.) "Only cut flowers set in water or arranged in an unsealed box or carton may be brought" in, we're advised, and only by staff members "bearing valid identification badges."

So does this mean you might end up forced to dine alone on Wednesday?

Well, you can always try this excuse for the post-anthrax age: "Forget? Moi? No way. Those danged safety screening devices nuked the two dozen long-stemmed." Of course, they better show up on Thursday.Clinton's Defender to Serve Bush

Thousands Of Army Humvees Lack Armor Upgrade (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The Army is working to fill a shortfall in Iraq of thousands of advanced Humvee armor kits designed to reduce U.S. troop deaths from roadside bombs -- including a rising threat from particularly lethal weapons linked to Iran and known as "explosively formed penetrators" (EFP) -- that are now inflicting 70 percent of the American casualties in the country, according to U.S. military and civilian officials.

The additional protection is needed for thousands of U.S. reinforcement troops flowing into Baghdad, where these devastating weapons -- used primarily by Shiite fighters -- are particularly prevalent, the officials said.

U.S. Army units in Iraq and Afghanistan lack more than 4,000 of the latest Humvee armor kit, known as FRAG Kit 5, according to U.S. officials. The Army has ramped up production of the armor, giving priority to troops in Baghdad, but the upgrade is not scheduled to be completed until this summer, Army officials said. That is well into the timeline for major operations launched last week to quell violence by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias, which the U.S. military now views as the top security threat in Iraq.

"Those who need FRAG Kit 5 are receiving FRAG Kit 5 based upon theater requirements and priorities," said Army Brig. Gen. Charles Anderson, director of force development for the Army deputy chief of staff. The Army is supplying the life-saving kits "as quickly as we can," he said in an interview and in written responses. "Kits are being flown to theater."

The Army declined to disclose details on the number of kits installed and where the shortages exist.

The Army began the Iraq war with an estimated $56 billion equipment shortage and has struggled to keep up with demands for new armor to protect against increasingly deadly bombs. In the case of FRAG Kit 5, the Army quickly produced a bolt-on version in limited quantities, while the permanent version has taken longer than expected to develop, test, produce and install. Meanwhile, the unexpected deployment of five additional Army brigades into Baghdad has created an urgent need for 2,000 Humvees with the new armor.

Shiite forces in recent months have stepped up their targeting of U.S. soldiers in Baghdad with sophisticated EFPs, described by one official as like "a spear that rips right through the vehicle."

The penetrator, a heavy, metal projectile, is propelled by an explosive and strikes with enough speed and power to shatter the relatively brittle, "high hard" steel of up-armored Humvees, creating what experts call "behind armor debris (BAD)" -- essentially, turning pieces of the vehicle into shrapnel. The new armor kit is designed with more flexible materials that slow down the projectile and contain the debris, limiting the damage to that caused directly by the EFP.

However, there is no guarantee that even the latest armor -- which reinforces the doors -- can prevent deaths from EFPs, defense officials have emphasized, and U.S. troops in Humvees outfitted with the new kit have been killed by EFPs.

The Pentagon does not release overall data on EFP strikes or their effectiveness, to prevent such information from being exploited by attackers. But reports from the military and family members on specific attacks indicate that since November, at least 11 U.S. soldiers and an interpreter have died in EFP strikes, all but one of them in Baghdad.

"In November, there was all of a sudden a ridiculous surge in EFP activity. People were getting killed left and right," said one military officer who served recently in Iraq. While other roadside bombs often cause no casualties, EFPs "make everyone nervous," he said. "It's a catastrophic weapon."

Senior U.S military officials in Baghdad held a briefing yesterday in which they presented evidence of apparent Iranian involvement in supplying EFP technology and components to fighters in Iraq.

The total number of roadside bombs laid in Iraq doubled in the past year, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified before Congress last week.

"You add that, then, to the new explosively formed projectiles, which are a much more deadly form that are coming into Iraq from Iran, and the combination has maintained the level of casualties," Pace said, despite advances in U.S. protective gear, tactics and targeting of bomb networks. Pace recently said two Iranians had been detained in raids on the networks.

EFP attacks are a small percentage of the roughly 1,200 attacks against U.S. forces each month involving roadside bombs, according to the Pentagon's Joint IED Defeat Organization. About half the roadside bombs in Iraq are found and disabled, and only 20 percent cause U.S. casualties. But EFPs "are far more lethal," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said recently, adding, "They can take out an Abrams tank."

U.S. commanders have voiced frustration recently at the ability of enemy fighters in Iraq to change tactics to defeat U.S. protective gear. "Equipment that was, we thought, pretty effective in protecting our troops just a matter of months ago is now being in fact challenged by some of the techniques and devices over there," Adm. William J. Fallon, the new U.S. commander for the Middle East, said last month.

Fewer than half the Army's roughly 14,500 up-armored Humvees in Iraq and Afghanistan have been outfitted with the bolt-on version of FRAG Kit 5. Thousands of the permanent kits have been flown to Iraq and are being installed at 11 locations around the country, officials said. Over the next six months, the Army plans to produce 5,000 more Humvees with the permanent kits already installed, Anderson said.

Overall, Army equipment backlogs had grown so severe, Anderson said, such a troop increase would not have been possible last year. He said the Army is in a far better position now, thanks to an infusion of $17 billion last year to replace and repair equipment.

Still, Pace said last week that U.S. troops will face a gap of up-armored Humvees and other armored vehicles that will not be closed until July, and according to the Pentagon, commanders will be required to share 500 up-armored vehicles. But the Army said it is not short of up-armored Humvees in Iraq.

Politics Shouldn't Matter (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), February 12, 2007

BY MOST accounts, the Bush Administration has gone further in infusing the federal government with partisanship than any administration in modern history. That is why Congress should enact legislation to ensure that the White House doesn't undertake unnecessary political mischief in the appointment of federal prosecutors.

Assistant U.S. attorneys, the 5,200 men and women who prosecute federal crimes, traditionally have been commissioned by the president and confirmed by the Senate. Typically, a new president replaces the entire crew with supporters.

But last year, Sen. Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, quietly inserted into reauthorization of the Patriot Act a provision to allow appointment of such prosecutors on an interim but indefinite basis - without Senate consent.

The action came to light at Christmas time as seven assistant U.S. attorneys were summarily fired by the Justice Department. One, who had been in the post in Little Rock, Ark., for five years, was replaced by a former aide to Karl Rove, President Bush's political hatchet man.

Any government maneuver involving Mr. Rove is immediately suspect, to be sure, and the episode raised suspicions that skulduggery was afoot. Favoritism and political influence are this administration's basic tools. Remember "Brownie" at FEMA?

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, empowered to make the interim appointments, is vague about the need for the new law. He told the Washington Post that political appointees are subject to removal for any - or no - cause, and he added obliquely that the administration might be inclined to replace personnel to get "better results."

Maybe so, but more likely the new law is a thin disguise for some sort of shenanigan. According to the Post, the prosecutor sacked in Little Rock was told his removal was no reflection on his work, that officials in Washington just wanted to give his job to the other guy.

Indeed, it's been suggested that one of the attorneys let go, Carol S. Lam, of San Diego, was removed because she did too good a job with the bribery investigation of U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was forced from office and is now in prison.

The injection of partisanship in public employment is never healthy, but the job of an assistant U.S. attorney should be, at least nominally, above politics. Subjecting criminal prosecutors to claims of outside or undue influence only weakens trust in the criminal justice system, and shifting personnel could cause harmful and unnecessary delays in cases.

In that vein, we hate to think what might have become of the Coingate case if the Republican federal prosecutor involved, Greg White, of Cleveland, had been sidetracked by politics two years ago. Instead, Mr. White ably prosecuted GOP insider Tom Noe for making illegal campaign contributions to President Bush, and his office aided in the successful state theft case that sent Noe to prison.

Who is prosecuted and for what crimes should not be a matter of partisan whim, or even appear to be. Congress should act now to take back its oversight role on assistant U.S. attorneys from a power-hungry president.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McAfee Ex-Counsel Likely To Face Options Charges (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Federal prosecutors are readying criminal charges related to alleged backdating of stock options against a former general counsel of McAfee Inc., Kent Roberts, according to people familiar with the matter.

The charges are likely to be filed in the next few days, a person familiar with the situation said, but the person added that the actions could be delayed for at least a week. If charged, Mr. Roberts would become the sixth person charged with criminal offenses in the widening federal probe into stock-options backdating, which is examining conduct at about 140 companies. The pace of investigations appears to be quickening, and more criminal and civil charges are expected in coming weeks.

Mr. Roberts was fired by McAfee in May 2006. At the time, the company said it took the action after it "became aware of one episode involving the General Counsel in 2000 that was improper." The company hasn't explained further. Mr. Roberts received options dated April 14, 2000, to buy 20,000 shares at $19.75, a deep low in the company's stock price, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing. Shares rose to more than $25 that month.

Mr. Roberts described to company lawyers his role in the backdating when the issue surfaced in the spring, according to people familiar with the matter. He couldn't be reached to comment and his lawyer declined to comment. Mr. Roberts joined McAfee in May 1998 from private practice in Dallas. He became general counsel in early 2001.

McAfee, a Santa Clara, Calif., maker of virus-protection software for computers, has been wracked by turmoil surrounding its past options-granting practices. In October, the company announced the retirement of Chairman and Chief Executive George Samenuk, and the firing of Kevin Weiss, its president, as a result of an internal probe into past options-granting practices. The company has said some of its option grants were misdated, and has said it will need to take charges to account for understated compensation costs related to improperly-granted options.

Conduct at McAfee is being investigated by prosecutors at the office of the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, in San Francisco, who are handling several high-profile criminal probes into backdating. It isn't clear if Mr. Roberts will cooperate with prosecutors, who often seek the help of lower-level officials in their continuing investigation of high-ranking executives. The SEC also is probing stock-option practices at McAfee.

A stock option provides the right to buy shares of a stock in the future at a set "strike" price, generally the price at the time the option is issued. Backdating involves pretending an option was issued at an earlier time when the stock price was lower, increasing its potential value.

Restatements Still Bedevil Firms (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Publicly traded companies filed 1,876 restatements of financial results in 2006, setting a record for corrections of financial statements while showing that many still are struggling to get the accounting right for both simple and complex transactions.

In a sign that some of the corporate-governance changes enacted this decade may be taking root, the number of restatements filed by large companies fell in 2006, the first such decline since 2001, according to a study by audit research firm AuditAnalytics. Large companies -- those having more than $700 million in stock that the public is able to buy -- filed 196 restatements in 2006, a nearly 20% drop from the previous year.

By contrast, companies with a public float of less than $75 million, which don't yet have to follow rules related to checks on their internal controls, continued to have restatements climb. In 2006, U.S. companies in this category filed 1,108 restatements, a 42% jump from the previous year. This group accounted for more than two-thirds of the 1,608 restatements filed by U.S. companies. "Presumably the difference is because internal controls are working better," said Mark Cheffers, chief executive of AuditAnalytics.

Restatements of financial results are akin to a product recall and mean that investors no longer can rely on figures companies previously provided and which may have formed the basis for their decision to buy or sell stocks or bonds. Restatements, a black mark both for financial executives within a company and its outside auditors, once were fairly rare and occurred only when major problems were found.

That changed in the wake of corporate scandals such as Enron and WorldCom. Auditors who generally missed the frauds that rocked markets began doing a more-thorough job than they did during the technology boom. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002, also created a regulator for accounting firms, causing them to further improve audits. Finally, Sarbanes-Oxley mandated that corporate executives attest to having internal systems designed to prevent accounting mistakes and fraud, and that auditors check these mechanisms, known as internal controls.

Combined, the changes caused restatements to soar to 1,876 in 2006 for both U.S. and foreign companies filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, according AuditAnalytics. Restatements last year rose 17% from 2005 and compare with just 452 restatements in 2001.

Where did companies mess up the most in their accounting? Looking at all restatements filed in 2006, the measurement and recognition of debt and stock or equity instruments caused the most errors, accounting for about 27% of total restatements, according to AuditAnalytics. This seemed to be mainly a small-company problem. Among bigger companies, this area accounted for just 6% of restatements in 2006.

Big and small companies alike were tripped up by problems related to the backdating of stock options, Mr. Cheffers said. Restatements related to compensation issues accounted for the second-highest category of restatements among all companies. Among larger companies, this issue was the biggest problem, accounting for 38% of their 2006 restatements, according to AuditAnalytics.

Two other problem areas for the big guys: accounting related to cash-flow statements and tax issues. Each area accounted for 21% of 2006 restatements for big companies.

Questions Grow About A Top CNBC Anchor (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

In November 2005, Citigroup gathered top clients at a lush spa resort in Napa Valley for two days of wine tasting and a chance to road test some of the hottest luxury cars on the market.

The test drivers included Todd S. Thomson, then the chief executive of Citigroup's wealth management arm, car collectors, clients of the bank and Maria Bartiromo, the CNBC anchor and celebrity guest.

Their charge: To pick the 2006 car of the year for Robb Report, the luxury magazine. Like many of the judges, Ms. Bartiromo chose the bright red Ferrari Spider, according to one attendee. So did Mr. Thomson, a car enthusiast.

"It's the ultimate package of sex and performance," he told a reporter for the magazine.

With its blend of high living, glitz and privileged access, the event provides a glimpse of the rarefied world inhabited by Ms. Bartiromo, who, in her years as CNBC's most recognizable face, has lent to the reporting of once gray business news a veneer of gloss and celebrity.

Socializing with sources is a long journalistic tradition, especially for television personalities whose renown often allows them to travel in the same elite circles as their subjects.

But for Ms. Bartiromo, who accompanied Mr. Thomson last fall on Citigroup's corporate jet to a series of client and other bank-sponsored functions in China, her ability to gain entree into the exclusive and mostly male world of chief executives and financial titans has made her a valuable commodity to CNBC.

After Mr. Thomson's abrupt departure from Citigroup, however, such ties have raised questions about her closeness to her sources, all of whom she also covers as the cable network's top anchor. CNBC has said that it paid commercial fare to Citigroup for Ms. Bartiromo's trip to China. And last week, Jeffrey R. Immelt, the chief executive of General Electric, CNBC's parent, voiced his support for Ms. Bartiromo and the cable network.

"Substantially, I don't think she did anything wrong," he said.

A CNBC spokesman said that Ms. Bartiromo flew commercial to the California event and that the network paid for her flight as it was network business.

Ms. Bartiromo declined to comment for this article. CNBC declined to comment on whether executives had any discussions with her concerning her relationship with Mr. Thomson. However, people inside of CNBC did say that she will continue to cover the company as part of her regular duties.

Whether it is providing a personalized video tribute — shot from inside the CNBC newsroom — to Stephen A. Schwarzman, the chairman of the buyout giant Blackstone Group to celebrate his 60th birthday or mingling with a source at a benefit for the New York City Ballet, Ms. Bartiromo's proximity to the people she covers has created a model of journalism that jibes perfectly with CNBC's mandate to ramp up its ratings by adding pizzazz and drama to its coverage.

Still, Mr. Thomson's departure and Ms. Bartiromo's connection to him have raised questions within the network over the possible tension between CNBC's duty to pursue big financial news stories and its loyalty to Ms. Bartiromo.

On Dec. 11, after the appointment of Robert Druskin as chief operating officer of Citigroup, Ms. Bartiromo and Charles Gasparino, a CNBC on-air editor, had a brief on-air clash when Ms. Bartiromo remarked that an earlier report by Mr. Gasparino that Sallie L. Krawcheck would leave her job as chief financial officer did not pan out.

"That is not what I said," Mr. Gasparino shot back. "I didn't say that," as he argued that Ms. Krawcheck and Mr. Thomson were no longer heirs to succeed Charles O. Prince as chief executive.

Subsequently, according to people with an understanding of how the story unfolded, Mr. Gasparino learned that, in fact, Mr. Thomson's job was in jeopardy.

He explained this to Jonathan Wald, head of news programming, that he had been told by people within Citigroup that top management had examined Mr. Thomson's conduct, specifically the occasions that Ms. Bartiromo joined him on the company jet. Mr. Wald told Mr. Gasparino to pursue the story, these people say.

When Ms. Bartiromo got wind of Mr. Gasparino's reporting, she told Mr. Wald, complaining that her name was being dragged into the matter, these people say. Mr. Wald said that reporting the story was Mr. Gasparino's job.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gasparino never reported on Mr. Thomson's threatened job status. He was urged to proceed cautiously with the story, but some within the network say Ms. Bartiromo's role in the story prevented it from being fully reported.

Mr. Wald adamantly disagrees with that interpretation. "We were clear from the beginning about reporting the story to the fullest. We did not air it because it was not adequately sourced. It didn't meet our criteria from a journalist's standpoint, and it clearly wouldn't have met our lawyers' criteria."

On Jan 22, when Citigroup announced Mr. Thomson's resignation, Mr. Gasparino could barely contain his frustration.

"Two weeks ago I caught wind that essentially Todd Thomson was out," he said on air that morning when the news broke. Compounding this tension is the fact that no CNBC reporter or anchor has mentioned Ms. Bartiromo's link to Mr. Thomson's departure.

Typically, Ms Bartiromo's interviewing style can be probing, aggressive and, her special access notwithstanding, she can make even some of her best sources sweat a bit on camera.

In an interview with Robert L. Nardelli, the recently ousted chief executive of Home Depot, she peppered him with sharp questions relating to his conduct and governance at the company. And a question posed to President Bush about his use of Google elicited a revealing response from the president as he referred to the search engine as "the Google."

DOJ_NMG_0130167

"She is not a marshmallow," said Gerard R. Roche, the chairman of the executive search firm Heidrick & Struggles, who has been interviewed by Ms. Bartiromo.

John J. Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley, agreed, recalling an interview he had with her. "She put me on the spot big time," he said, adding that he did not socialize with Ms. Bartiromo.

"She is a professional," Mr. Mack said. "You can't assume that you will go on air and that it will be a cakewalk."

At the same time, the occasional gushing aside can betray an admiration for her subjects — many of whom she knows socially, either from events at the New York City Ballet, where she is a trustee, or her regular lunches at San Pietro, the favored restaurant of Wall Street titans.

"When we come back, the allure of John Mack," she once said during an interview.

In many instances, the sentiment on Wall Street seems to be mutual.

It is an appreciation that dates back to Ms. Bartiromo's early days in the mid-1990s, when she made a name for herself as the first journalist to report live from the floor of the New York Stock Exchange.

"At the height of CNBC mania, we had these C.E.O.'s and celebrities beating down our door to ring the stock exchange bell," said Robert T. Zito, a former executive vice president at the stock exchange. "The one thing they wanted to do was meet Maria."

For the daughter of a restaurant owner in Bay Ridge in Brooklyn, her rise to celebrity status — there are Web sites devoted to her, Joey Ramone wrote a song in her honor and she has recently trademarked her "Money Honey" nickname — has been meteoric.

And while much has been made of her Sophia Loren-like looks, her early career ascent was propelled by pluck, ambition and like another famous, albeit fictional, product of Bay Ridge, Tony Manero in "Saturday Night Fever," a hunger to make it big across the river in Manhattan.

She switched from C. W. Post College to New York University, and in her first media job at WMCA Radio, she impressed the radio personality Barry Farber with her willingness to do more than her share of dirty work.

On one occasion, Mr. Farber recalled, he was sent "100 pounds of frozen North Carolina pork barbecue" and before it could melt, Ms. Bartiromo not only found a charity to take it, but delivered the meat herself in her own car. "She had the stuff and she knew how to deploy it," he said.

In 1990, just out of college, she met Jonathan Steinberg, the son of Saul Steinberg, the corporate raider. As the two began dating, it was Mr. Steinberg, who presided over a personal finance magazine and a hedge fund, who attracted the media attention. The couple married in 1999.

But Ms. Bartiromo's public profile would eclipse his. After a stint working for Lou Dobbs at CNN, she moved to CNBC in 1993. She became a star once she started broadcasting from the stock exchange floor.

As her recognition grew, so did the fortunes of CNBC, and it is estimated that her compensation exceeds $1 million.

And when she disclosed last year that the new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, had told her in a conversation at the White House Correspondents dinner that the markets had misinterpreted his remarks on interest rates, her reputation as an insider became even more entrenched.

Despite the controversy, Ms. Bartiromo remains a staple of CNBC. And she has kept up her public appearances, and her sense of humor.

Earlier this month, she was scheduled to present a lifetime leadership award to former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan at the CNBC executive achievement award ceremony, at the Mandarin Oriental Hotel in New York.

"Sorry I'm late," she said with a slight giggle as she stepped up to the dais. "But I had to fly commercial."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Testimony In Libby Trial Would Carry High Risk (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — One figure has dominated the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. without even showing up in the courtroom. Day after day, the jury has heard accounts of the actions of Vice President Dick Cheney, watched as his handwritten notes were displayed on a giant screen, heard how he directed leaks to the news media and ordered the White House to publicly defend Mr. Libby, his top aide and close confidante.

DOJ_NMG_0130168

Now, as the defense phase of the perjury trial begins, Mr. Cheney is expected to make a historic appearance on the witness stand. It is an act of loyalty that carries considerable risk for Mr. Cheney, a powerful figure in the administration who has in recent months suffered a series of major political and policy setbacks.

If he testifies, Mr. Cheney will bring to the jurors the awesome authority of his office and could attest to Mr. Libby's character as policy adviser and family man, and to his crushing workload and dedication to keeping the country safe. That could give extra heft to Mr. Libby's defense against the charge that he lied to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury: that he was so occupied with important matters of state, he did not accurately remember conversations from July 2003.

But the first 10 days of testimony have already exposed some of the long-hidden workings of Mr. Cheney's extraordinary vice presidency, revealing how deeply Mr. Cheney himself was engaged during 2003 in managing public relations as the administration's case for war came under attack.

Under cross-examination by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a veteran prosecutor who is likely to be deferential but dogged with questions, the vice president may be forced to describe in uncomfortable detail how he directed the counteroffensive on Joseph C. Wilson IV, the former ambassador who accused the administration of twisting prewar intelligence.

"This could be great theater," said Peter M. Shane, a law professor at Ohio State University. Anything Mr. Cheney says for the defense, Mr. Shane said, becomes "fair game" to be picked apart by the prosecution.

If Mr. Cheney makes a statement that conflicts with the public record — and nearly every witness so far has done so at least once — it could prove embarrassing for him and for the administration.

"If Cheney said anything that's contradicted in the record, though I think that's unlikely, Pat will slam him," said a former federal prosecutor who knows Mr. Fitzgerald. "He'll do it respectfully, but I have no doubt he'll do it," said the lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

No testimony so far has supported the idea, proposed by some critics, that Mr. Cheney deliberately sought to punish Mr. Wilson by ordering the exposure of the covert employment of his wife, Valerie Wilson, by the Central Intelligence Agency. It was the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's C.I.A. job that prompted the criminal investigation that ultimately led to perjury and obstruction of justice charges against Mr. Libby.

But the trial has chipped away at the public image of Mr. Cheney as a sober-minded policy architect and tough political combatant, never rattled by the sniping of critics or the fickle commentary of the press.

When Mr. Wilson published an Op-Ed article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, lambasting the administration, Mr. Cheney was "upset," Mr. Libby said in 2004 grand jury testimony, replayed at the trial. Contrary to Mr. Wilson's claims, the vice president had known nothing about the former ambassador's trip to Niger on behalf of the C.I.A. or his conclusion that Iraq was not seeking uranium there, Mr. Libby said.

"He often cuts out an article and keeps it on his desk somewhere and thinks about it," Mr. Libby told the grand jury of the vice president. The jury has seen Mr. Cheney's clipping of Mr. Wilson's article, on which he wrote notes and questions.

The jury has also heard how the vice president responded by dictating talking points for the news media to subordinates and hastily summoning conservative columnists to a lunch. Most strikingly, Mr. Cheney cleared with President Bush the secret declassification of an intelligence document on Iraqi weapons so that it could be leaked to a reporter he and Mr. Libby saw as friendly, Judith Miller, then of The Times.

"The vice president instructed me to go and talk to Judith Miller and lay this out for her," Mr. Libby said in the grand jury tapes.

The leak to Ms. Miller, on July 8, 2003, failed — she wrote nothing. But four days later Mr. Cheney was trying again, listing for Mr. Libby the main points he wanted made to Matthew Cooper, then of Time magazine, and other reporters.

Mr. Cheney, Mr. Libby said, "dictated to me what he wanted me to say to the press," including a "word-for-word" quote to give Time magazine and "background material that he wanted me to use."

A few months later, when Mr. Libby was being publicly discussed as a possible target of the criminal investigation, Mr. Cheney weighed in again. He directed Scott McClellan, then the White House spokesman, to publicly clear Mr. Libby just as he had cleared Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's political adviser.

"Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Mr. Cheney wrote in a note after Mr. Libby complained to him. The "meat grinder" apparently referred to Mr. Libby's assignment in leaking to the news media; the "incompetence" is thought by many to be the vice president's characterization of the C.I.A.'s decision to send Mr. Wilson to Niger.

The trial is just the latest challenge for the vice president, who would enter the witness stand as one of the least popular leaders in recent history. Only 16 percent of respondents in the latest CBS News poll, released last month, said they had a favorable opinion of Mr. Cheney, his lowest level ever in any CBS or CBS/New York Times poll. Some 48 percent had an unfavorable opinion.

For six years, Mr. Cheney has worked to protect the Bush White House from what he views as Congressional meddling, media snooping and legal nitpicking. But his assertion of broad executive authority, based on a legal theory he has pursued since the 1970s, has met with a string of defeats.

The administration has backed away from tough policies on terrorist detention and domestic surveillance that Mr. Cheney championed. He has watched control of Congress shift to Democrats who are now working to penetrate his trademark secrecy. Last fall, he endured the dismissal by Mr. Bush of his friend and ally of three decades, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Since then, as the most bullish and optimistic proponent of the president's war strategy, Mr. Cheney has come under increasing fire for comments proclaiming success in Iraq when even Mr. Bush is expressing dissatisfaction.

Senator John McCain, a leading Republican presidential contender for 2008, went on record in an interview last month with The Politico, a new Washington political publication, saying Mr. Bush had been "very badly served" by Mr. Cheney, as well as Mr. Rumsfeld.

In a recent interview on CNN, the host, Wolf Blitzer, told Mr. Cheney, "Some of your good Republican friends in the Senate and the House are now seriously questioning your credibility because of the blunders, of the failures."

Mr. Cheney, in a striking display of pique, responded: "Wolf, Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

Veteran trial lawyers following the case say there is a significant chance Mr. Libby will not take the stand in his own defense, choosing to rely instead upon the seven hours of his taped testimony the jury has already heard. In that event, veteran trial lawyers say, Mr. Cheney could serve as his surrogate, presenting a positive, personal account of Mr. Libby's work without exposing the defendant to the hazards of cross-examination.

But such a strategy would, of course, open Mr. Cheney to unpredictable questioning. Theodore B. Olson, the former solicitor general for Mr. Bush, called Mr. Fitzgerald "a remarkably thorough, meticulous and careful guy with a tremendous memory of the facts" who was likely to mount a formidable cross-examination.

By taking the stand before a rapt national audience, Mr. Cheney would essentially be leaping without a net, because neither the defense nor the prosecution would be duty-bound to protect his interests, said Mr. Olson, who represented Ronald Reagan during the Iran-contra affair.

"You never know what's going to happen on a witness stand with cross-examinations," Mr. Olson said. "Surprises happen all the time."

A Historic Moment If Cheney Testifies Live, As Expected (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — If he testifies as expected, Dick Cheney would be the first sitting vice president, at least in modern times, to appear as a witness in a criminal trial. And if he testifies in court, he may also be the first to give live testimony in defense of a subordinate's actions on his behalf, legal historians said.

Mr. Cheney's testimony as a courtroom witness for his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., would break with one of the closest historical parallels, when former President Ronald Reagan testified in 1990 via videotape as a defense witness in the trial of his former national security adviser, John M. Poindexter.

The Reagan videotape offered an insight into the unpredictability of criminal trials. His appearance seemed to have little direct impact on the trial, but it created a permanent historical record of his failing memory, which would have been preserved through a printed transcript had he appeared as a live witness but would not have caused the same impact as the widely broadcast videotape.

Courts have traditionally shown great deference to high-ranking executive branch officials, requiring them to testify only when they are thought likely to provide crucial testimony that cannot be obtained elsewhere through documents or other witnesses.

"One of the considerations is, you can't start dragging the vice president or president away from their jobs," said Theodore B. Olson, a lawyer in Washington who represented Mr. Reagan when he was asked to testify in Mr. Poindexter's trial.

Even so, presidents and vice presidents have found themselves caught up in politically volatile inquiries. A few vice presidents were themselves the subjects of criminal proceedings, like Aaron Burr, who was tried for treason and acquitted in 1807 after he left office, and Spiro Agnew, who resigned in 1973 and pleaded no contest to tax and money laundering charges.

In more recent times, presidents and vice presidents have more frequently been questioned as witnesses, usually in private. But even an interview behind closed doors can prove embarrassing, as when a Congressional committee released President Bill Clinton's videotaped deposition in 1998 to an independent prosecutor in the investigation of his involvement with Monica Lewinsky, a White House intern.

Vice President Al Gore was questioned in 2000 by Justice Department prosecutors in a campaign finance investigation, and when he was vice president in 1988, George H. W. Bush was interviewed by an independent prosecutor in the Iran-contra investigation. Those interviews were not made public and never forced either Mr. Gore or Mr. Bush to appear in court.

But no sitting vice president has testified in a criminal trial in recent times, said Joel K. Goldstein, a professor at the St. Louis University law school who has studied the vice presidency. Mr. Reagan was the last president to appear as a witness.

Unlike Mr. Cheney, who would appear as a voluntary witness, Mr. Reagan resisted testifying, primarily because his lawyers said he could shed little light on the obstruction issues in the trial, Mr. Olson said. "There are no hard and fast rules about a president's testimony," he said. "It really is a balancing process. Is this really necessary, or is there a less intrusive way to get the evidence?"

Richard W. Beckler, a lawyer for Mr. Poindexter, said he had wanted Mr. Reagan to appear as a trial witness in court, but accepted an appearance that would have far less impact. "We wanted him to testify live, but that motion got turned down," Mr. Beckler said. As a result, Judge Harold H. Greene of Federal District Court settled on an arrangement in which Mr. Reagan testified, but via a videotaped deposition, which was later publicly released.

The deposition was taken in February 1990 in a closed courtroom in Los Angeles, a year after Mr. Reagan left office. The former president sat in a witness box. Judge Greene was on the bench. Prosecution and defense lawyers were in the court, along with Mr. Reagan's lawyers, Justice Department lawyers representing the administration of George H. W. Bush and an interagency group monitoring the proceedings for inadvertent leaks of classified information.

The defense was permitted to ask Mr. Reagan 154 questions approved by the judge in advance. The procedure was taped to allow for the editing of any state secrets or other statements ruled inadmissible. But in the end, the eight-hour tape was played in its entirety at the trial.

On the tape, Mr. Reagan seemed cooperative, but he had trouble recalling many of the events surrounding the Iran-contra affair. After the trial, jurors said his testimony had a minimal impact on their decision to convict Mr. Poindexter on all five counts against him. A federal appeals court later threw out the conviction on all counts.

The showing of the tape had unforeseen consequences for Mr. Reagan and his legacy. It created a record of Mr. Reagan as a former head of state unable to grasp the facts about the most serious crisis of his presidency, in the unforgiving setting of a criminal trial. That imagery seemed to foreshadow his disclosure in 1994 that he had Alzheimer's disease.

"You just could not have seen all that coming," Mr. Olson said. "But in a live situation it might have been worse." Had Mr. Reagan appeared in court, Mr. Olson said, it might have been more difficult for him to interject on his client's behalf and might not have permitted Mr. Reagan to take the rest breaks he was granted during the deposition.

Cheney Backers Grow Restive (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dick Cheney's diminished popularity outside the White House hasn't affected his power within the Bush administration, where he continues to hold considerable clout. From the surge of troops in Iraq to the tough line on Iran to opposition to tax increases, the vice president has helped to shape an array of recent administration policies.

But as his standing erodes among the administration's most conservative supporters, Mr. Cheney finds himself being criticized by former allies and emerging as a focal point for Republican anger about the war in Iraq. That is making it easier for Republicans to split with the administration on a number of issues, notably Iraq.

"Cheney's popularity with the Republican base is reflective of the Iraq war's popularity with the Republican base, and that support is waning," said Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and lobbyist. "That's taking a toll on the vice president, who is more closely identified with Iraq than on any other issue."

It is a shift for Mr. Cheney, who remained popular with conservatives as his support among the general public declined. In a September Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 43% of those calling themselves conservative Republicans said they felt "very positive" about Mr. Cheney, compared with 13% of all adults surveyed.

That rating fell over the next few months, as Republicans lost control of Congress, support for the Iraq war eroded, and the perjury trial of former Cheney chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby put the vice president and his office in the spotlight. By mid-

DOJ_NMG_0130171

January, the same poll found that 26% of conservative Republicans said they felt "very positive" about Mr. Cheney, compared with 9% for all respondents.

Mr. Cheney could be called to take the stand in the Libby trial as soon as this week, making him the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal court.

Mr. Cheney's declining support among conservatives leaves him open to criticism from fellow Republicans.

When Mr. Cheney traveled to Capitol Hill recently for a lunch meeting with Republican senators, the lawmakers opened the floor to discuss the administration's "surge" proposal. It was Mr. Cheney's birthday, and participants said the senators began by singing "Happy Birthday."

The warm feelings evaporated as soon as the conversation turned to Iraq, however. Several senators said they remained committed to the war on terror, but questioned the administration's overall management of the war, participants said. Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon told Mr. Cheney he couldn't find words strong enough to express how bad he thought the administration had overseen the war in Iraq, according to participants.

Other lawmakers told the vice president they feared the additional troops would be unable to stabilize the country, and expressed skepticism about the capabilities and intentions of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, according to participants.

Mr. Cheney listened closely, but didn't say anything in response to the criticism, participants said.

To date, there are few signs that talk outside the White House has changed Mr. Cheney. One reason, administration officials say, is because Mr. Cheney doesn't aim to become president, he can stay loyal to the Bush agenda without having to distance himself from the president.

Mr. Cheney's top foreign policy aide, John Hannah, shaped the administration's "surge" proposal for Iraq. David Wurmser, Mr. Cheney's top Middle East aide, helped to craft the administration's tougher stance toward Iran. On the domestic front, senators from both parties said last week that Mr. Cheney's antitax positions had contributed to derailing talks between congressional Democrats and the administration on a budget plan that might include changes to the Social Security and Medicare entitlement programs.

"He's been a longtime and steady supporter of conservative causes, and conservatives have known that he is consistent in his views and that he's making those conservative views known to the president," said Cesar Conda, a lobbyist and former policy aide to Mr. Cheney. "But they also know that Cheney doesn't win the debates all the time."

A number of conservative figures outside the administration offered three reasons for their displeasure with Mr. Cheney. They point first to Iraq, expressing concerns Mr. Cheney was in denial about how bad the situation was in the country and about the war's political cost for Republicans. Second, they say Mr. Cheney was finally caught up in conservative anger at Mr. Bush for not limiting government spending or balancing the budget.

Lastly, some conservatives say they are uncomfortable with Mr. Cheney's support for his daughter Mary's decision to have a child and raise it with her partner, another woman.

White House officials defended Mr. Cheney, saying the vice president's statements about Iraq were meant to emphasize that political progress had been made in Iraq despite the difficulties there.

"The vice president's insistence on pointing out what has gone well in Iraq -- three elections and substantial progress in many Iraqi provinces -- should not be taken for granted or ignored," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president.

The Libby Trial: Who Said What To Whom, And Who Remembers? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON

The trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, now at a pause point as the defense prepares to mount its case, is about many things.

Literally, the trial is about whether Vice President Cheney's ex-chief of staff committed perjury and obstruction of justice during a federal investigation into the exposure of a CIA agent's identity. After 11 days of prosecution testimony, some of which appeared damaging to Mr. Libby, the task of the defense team is to sow reasonable doubt in the minds of jurors.

But what has captured the fascination of the press and observers of the Bush administration is how this case has pulled back the curtain on the inner workings of a White House known for being secretive and on the ways of elite Washington – much of it less than flattering. And even if the perjury trial of a former aide may seem to be a sideshow to the weightier issues of the day, the context of the Libby trial remains central: the runup to the Iraq war and its aftermath when the rationale for the war came under question.

"This trial stands for something much bigger than what it is," says Paul Rothstein, a law professor at Georgetown University. "In the public mind, it stands for, 'Was Bush lying about the war, and was he willing to destroy a woman's career to cover up a lie about the war?' Viewed that way, it's a big case. The case doesn't actually go that far, but that's how it will be read if Libby is convicted."

No one, including Libby, is on trial for revealing the identity of Valerie Plame, the woman in question, as a CIA operative. Her status became a point of interest inside the Bush administration when her husband, former US Ambassador Joseph Wilson, came out as a critic of the administration's use of intelligence in building its case for war. At issue in Libby's case is whether he lied in sworn testimony over how he learned Ms. Plame's identity.

The prosecution's final witness, Tim Russert, anchor of NBC's "Meet the Press," provided perhaps the most damaging testimony. Libby had asserted that he learned Plame's identity from Mr. Russert, but Russert denies that the topic ever came up in a phone conversation they had in July 2003. In cross-examination, Libby's chief defense lawyer tried to challenge Russert's memory and impugn his impartiality.

When the defense begins its case Monday, the first witnesses will be other journalists, who will be questioned with an eye toward casting doubt on the ability of prosecution witnesses to remember years-old conversations accurately.

At the heart of Libby's defense is the argument that, as a top White House aide with a full plate, he could not be expected to remember who told him what, when. After Libby stated under oath that he had learned Plame's identity from Russert, it has subsequently come out that he learned the information a month earlier from fellow officials.

The prosecution's argument is that Libby had fingered Russert to avoid implicating administration colleagues. Why Russert would then have not contradicted him is the next question. Perhaps, the reasoning goes, Libby assumed Russert would refuse to testify, in the tradition of journalists refusing to divulge in public the identity of sources and content of conversations with them.

During the days of testimony so far, the public has been treated to a rare behind-the-scenes look at life in the White House. Ari Fleischer, who was White House press secretary during the period in question and who received legal immunity for his testimony, described his dismay when it became clear that the president had made an unsupported statement in his State of the Union address: that Iraq was seeking to acquire uranium from Africa.

Cathie Martin, a former press aide to Mr. Cheney, also expressed frustration over her office's inability to correct a falsehood in the press – that it was Cheney's office that had sent Ambassador Wilson on a mission to Africa to check on the uranium allegation. And in an ironic moment, she laid out the options her office considered in trying to refute that allegation – including the possibility of leaking the information to select journalists.

Perhaps the most startling sign of backroom intrigue at the White House came in the opening arguments of the defense: that Libby was being hung out to dry to protect a more-prominent (read: valuable) White House figure, Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

How all this looks to the American people, a majority of whom already hold the Bush White House in low esteem, is an open question. But to some longtime observers of the ways of Washington, there's a danger that the public will come away with new disgust over how the press interacts with the White House, especially in the realm of "leaks."

"It must look sleazy and underhanded," says Stephen Hess, a Brookings Institution scholar. "It's hard but necessary to also tell them [the public] that an awful lot of important information gets conveyed this way."

Libby Lawyers To Call On High-profile Journalists (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawyers for Lewis "Scooter" Libby are scheduled to begin their case today by calling a brace of high-profile journalists to give testimony they hope will clear Libby of perjury and obstruction charges.

Among those likely to be called, according to court transcripts: NBC's Andrea Mitchell, Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, Evan Thomas of Newsweek and Jill Abramson, managing editor of The New York Times.

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with lying about identifying an undercover CIA officer to reporters in June and July 2003 to undermine her husband, an administration critic.

Federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald spent the first three weeks of the trial building his case against Libby. He called 10 witnesses and played eight hours of Libby's grand jury testimony to show that Libby told reporters Valerie Plame worked at the CIA, then lied to investigators because he feared prosecution for leaking classified information.

Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, had accused Cheney's office of ignoring a report Wilson made contradicting the claim that Iraq had sought nuclear material in Africa.

No one was charged for the leak.

DOJ_NMG_0130173

Theodore Wells, Libby's lead counsel, has said in court filings and statements to the court that he'll call these journalists to show there was no "plot" to unmask Plame's identity and that talk of her CIA job was widespread.

Mitchell said during an October 2003 interview on CNBC that Plame's identity was "widely known." In a 2005 interview with Don Imus, Mitchell said she "may have misspoken."

The defense may also pit journalists from the same newspapers or networks against each other. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified for the prosecution that her editor wasn't interested in a story about Plame's CIA role. The defense has subpoenaed that editor, Abramson, to rebut the claim. Abramson was the Times' Washington bureau chief until August 2003.

While the journalists seem certain to testify, it's less clear that Cheney will also take the stand.

Before the trial, Libby's defense team said they would call Cheney as a witness. If they do, that will make him the first sitting vice president to be a witness in a criminal trial, said vice presidential historian Timothy Walch, director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library.

Cheney, if called, could bolster two elements of Libby's defense. One is that Cheney's office was so busy that top aide Libby just forgot but didn't lie about key details of conversations about Plame. The second is that White House adviser Karl Rove, portrayed by the defense as a Libby rival, conspired to trick reporters into thinking Libby was the main source of the leak to cover Rove's role in exposing Plame.

Calling Cheney as a witness presents several problems for the defense, says Joshua Berman, a former federal prosecutor and now a white-collar defense specialist.

"What (Libby's lawyers) hope to get from him they have to weigh very sensitively against any possible backfire effect," Berman says.

That effect could include focusing on Cheney as the No. 2 official in an administration that has become increasingly unpopular because of the Iraq war. Cheney also likely would be asked questions about the flawed intelligence about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, which helped lead the United States into war in Iraq.

Cheney could also face questioning about who told him that Plame worked for the CIA. Libby told FBI investigators that Cheney told him Plame worked at the CIA in early June 2003, just before a top CIA official told Libby the same thing.

Berman, who has worked with both Fitzgerald and Wells, says that Wells sometimes waits until the last minute before deciding to call a witness. "I've heard him say, 'I often make the decision (to call a key witness) that morning,' " Berman said about Wells' trial tactics.

Berman, however, noted that Wells has been "thinking about it every single morning and night since the trial began."

Media Figures May Be Reluctant Defense Witnesses In Libby Case (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Defense Exhibit 1972, a tape-recorded interview from the "Imus in the Morning" radio show, is another of those revealing moments in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

"So . . . what happened?" radio host Don Imus asks NBC News correspondent Andrea Mitchell about her confusing reporting on an undercover CIA officer. "Were you drunk?"

"I obviously screwed up," Mitchell responds in the exchange, which Libby's defense hopes to play for the jury in coming days. "I guess I was drunk," she jokes.

Just when you thought it was impossible for more harm to come to the national news media's reputation, the defense in the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is about to present its case.

Starting today, when Libby's attorneys try to show that he did not intentionally lie about his role in leaking the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame, they will rely heavily on a string of journalists as witnesses. In several ways, those witnesses will be asked to raise doubts about the testimony and accuracy of other reporters, and some may end up tarnishing themselves or their sources.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters about Plame in the summer of 2003, during what prosecutors allege was a White House campaign to discredit her husband, outspoken war critic Joseph C. Wilson IV. Days after Wilson accused the administration of twisting intelligence he gathered on a CIA-sponsored mission as it defended the invasion of Iraq, Plame's classified CIA role was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak. Libby, who has pleaded not guilty, is not charged with the leak itself.

Now the reporters Libby spoke to -- and some he did not -- are unhappily embroiled in the trial as witnesses for both sides.

DOJ_NMG_0130174

This past week, a pillar of broadcast news -- Tim Russert, Washington bureau chief for NBC News -- was heard chortling on the air on Oct. 28, 2005, about the possibility that Bush administration officials would be indicted that day. That interview, also with Imus, helped the defense suggest that Russert, a star witness for the prosecution, may have held a grudge against Libby.

The Wall Street Journal editorial page was depicted as carrying water for the White House, insisting in print that it had crucial intelligence supporting the war that did not come from the White House. But Libby has testified that he urged then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz to leak self-serving parts of an intelligence report to the Journal because Wolfowitz had better connections there. That admission helped the prosecution suggest Libby was part of a White House campaign to discredit Wilson.

In the next several days, three reporters at The Washington Post, a senior New York Times editor, a Times Washington bureau reporter and a Newsweek magazine reporter are expected to take the stand.

Defense attorneys are keen to ask New York Times Managing Editor Jill Abramson about the accuracy of former Times reporter Judith Miller, a prosecution witness who said Libby told her about Plame in June 2003. They want Abramson to rebut Miller's testimony that she urged Abramson, then the Times's Washington bureau chief, to have the paper pursue the story about Wilson's wife working at the CIA. Abramson has been quoted as saying that Miller never made such a suggestion.

But the questioning could get into the gritty business of whether Abramson considered Miller to be accurate and impartial in her work. In the summer of 2003, the time of the events critical to the case, editors told Miller that, because of flaws in previous stories about whether Saddam Hussein's government possessed weapons of mass destruction, she could not write stories alone on intelligence regarding Iraq.

Defense attorneys also are eager to question Mitchell about the memory and credibility of Russert, her NBC colleague. Mitchell professed on CNBC's "Capital Report" in October 2003 that it was "widely known" among intelligence reporters such as herself that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Her network issued a statement saying that was inaccurate, and she said in an interview with Imus that she didn't know "what the heck I was talking about."

Libby's defense argued that Mitchell may have told Russert -- who testified for two days last week -- about the CIA operative but later wanted to back away from her assertion of knowledge. If she did know the information, they said, it would bolster Libby's contention that he learned about Plame's identity in a July 10, 2003, telephone call with Russert.

Russert said that was not possible because he did not hear of Plame until several days later.

"Now it turns out his right-hand person, Andrea Mitchell, in October 2003 has said something that totally blows up his core statement that he didn't know about the wife," defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. told U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton in arguing to play the Mitchell tape for the jury. "He has admitted that if she knew, he knew, and the whole team would have known."

Walton said he will rule today on whether Mitchell's testimony is relevant.

The defense also has said it may call Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward. He learned about Plame from then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage in June 2003 but said he did not disclose that information because he wanted to avoid being subpoenaed. Woodward told prosecutors what he knew after Libby was indicted in 2005, and he apologized to Post Executive Editor Leonard Downie Jr. for not sharing information on a major story.

Woodward's testimony could help bolster Libby's contention that there was no White House campaign to discredit Wilson and that other reporters knew about Plame before the time that prosecutors say Libby began to discuss her.

Also on the defense witness list are Post reporters Walter Pincus and Glenn Kessler, Newsweek's Evan Thomas, and the Times' David E. Sanger. All are expected to testify that they talked with Libby during that time but that he never mentioned Plame to them.

The defense is expected to use their testimony to raise doubts about the credibility of other key prosecution witnesses.

CHANNEL ISLAND: Russert's Fault? A Lack Of Outrage (LAT)

By Scott Collins

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

Those of us who get a kick out of watching Tim Russert every Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" are feeling a little hangdog these days. We always thought Big Russ Jr. was tough on the powerful. Now we learn that to some Washington media types on both the right and the left, he's just a tool for the powerful.

What's occasioned this perceptual turnabout is, of course, the perjury and obstruction trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, where Russert wrapped up two days of testimony last week. Libby says the NBC newsman fed him the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame Wilson, who is at the center of the trial. Russert says he didn't.

DOJ_NMG_0130175

To ordinary viewers, though, whatever transpired during Libby's phone call to Russert back in 2003 couldn't be as jarring as what the trial has unearthed about Washington's deeply cynical attitude toward "Meet the Press," a venerable, 60-year-old staple of network TV and the No. 1-rated Sunday news talk show.

A former Cheney press aide testified last month that she pushed to get the vice president on Russert's show to bat down negative news because it was "our best format," a program where political handlers can "control the message."

Wow. Really? With his Buick-like physique, piercing stare and rumbling baritone — plus his interrogatory style of brandishing incriminating documents and video in front of his guests — Russert sure doesn't look like any flack's patsy.

But to Russert's longtime critics, this was an a-ha! moment. Arianna Huffington, who once penned the critical "RussertWatch" feature for her liberal Huffington Post website, said she attended the Libby trial last week. There she found fresh confirmation for her view of Russert as one of the media handmaidens who carried water for the Bush administration in the run-up to the Iraq war.

"When we started RussertWatch, we didn't know he was on Dick Cheney and [ex-aide] Mary Matalin's list of ways to get their message out," Huffington told me Friday. She also heaped scorn on Russert's testimony that he always assumed his off-camera conversations with government officials were automatically off-the-record, so as "not to blindside anyone."

"That's the exact opposite of how journalists operate," Huffington said. "Russert's responsibility is to the public, unless there's some specific granting of anonymity."

So which is it? Is Russert the lantern-jawed tough guy many of us thought he was, the hard-boiled lawyer-turned-journo who hoists wayward pols on their own rhetorical petards? Or is he really just a Beltway Cowardly Lion who blows hard but allows his prey to wink and nudge their way out of tight spots with the nation's future at stake? (An NBC spokeswoman, citing the sensitive nature of the court testimony, said neither Russert nor network officials would comment.)

Evidence for Russert as a big softie has long existed. In 2004, when it came time to leverage his celebrity into a book-length treatise, he gave us not the standard "how I became an intrepid reporter" odyssey, the broadcast journalists' default choice, but rather "Big Russ and Me," a sentimental memoir of his categorically decent but emotionally withholding Irish-Catholic father.

"Big Russ" may not stack up as great literature, but it became a surprise bestseller and humanized Russert to millions who'd known him simply as a guy who liked to play "gotcha" with elected officials.

But writing a heartwarming book that merchants might file alongside "Tuesdays With Morrie" doesn't help demonstrate journalistic toughness. And watching "Meet the Press" over the last few weeks, I think I can understand why both Cheney's office and critics such as Huffington believe Russert can be readily controlled.

As an interviewer, Russert relies on documentary evidence to ask the pointed questions you want asked and answered. He hardly permits our leaders to slip away freely. Russert aggressively pursued, for example, the U.S. failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq during President Bush's February 2004 appearance on "Meet the Press."

But Russert can seem overly dispassionate, particularly during a time when opinion has increasingly bled into the news. And it's the lack of emotion that can make his approach look, after a while, less like real toughness than a facsimile of it.

Outrage is the reporter's ultimate stock in trade, from Oriana Fallaci jabbing Ayatollah Khomeini over Islamic veils to the on-camera meltdowns of Anderson Cooper and Shepard Smith during Hurricane Katrina. But Russert doesn't do outrage. He doesn't pound his desk and tell guests to shut up, like Bill O'Reilly. He doesn't try to pry open subjects by telling them, as Mike Wallace is known to have done, that their story is "pabulum." He's not on the receiving end of angry lectures, like the kind that Bill Clinton gave Chris Wallace, or the kind Dan Rather seemed to get from everyone.

Is there something vaudevillian about all these histrionics? Sure, but that's part of journalism. Maybe not the most handsome part, but a part nonetheless. It's revealing that when Libby rang Russert in 2003, it was to lodge a complaint, not about Russert, but about his high-volume MSNBC colleague Chris Matthews. The "Hardball" host is exactly the kind of outburst-prone broadcaster who can drive handlers up the wall.

On the Feb. 4 show, Russert drilled former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards over his stance on the Iraq war, tracing how the Democratic presidential candidate shifted from support to opposition. Russert asked all the right questions, presented all the right evidence, but there was an emotional element missing. Isn't it at least a little disappointing that a leading voice from the supposed opposition party went along for so long with a war plan that he now tells us, with the benefit of several years' hindsight and when the information is of little use, was grievously flawed?

But because that sense of outrage was missing from the "Meet the Press" host — he asked the questions in the same lawyerly tone of polite urgency and slight incredulousness he always uses — Edwards was basically allowed to shrug: Oh, well. Can't win 'em all.

Russert fans say the host is getting a raw deal. Marvin Kalb, "Meet the Press" host during the 1980s, praises his successor for building the program to its No. 1 status, and said whatever trade-offs Russert lives by were inevitable. "The politician wants exposure, the journalist wants a story," Kalb said. "On 'Meet the Press,' the two attempt to come together with dignity. Most of the time, it works."

It's also probably not a good idea to put too much faith in the proclamations of the pro-Libby folk. "It may be tactically in the interests of the administration to say Russert is easy," noted Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism. "Any time a politician plays press critic and tells you who's good, you need to carry a large container of salt."

Even Huffington admits that Russert attracts a lot of attention simply because his Sunday program is No. 1 in the ratings.

Still, it's clear that the ground has shifted beneath Russert's feet. Sixteen years hosting "Meet the Press," and he's suddenly becoming the story. Surely that's not a welcome switch, but Russert's plenty smart enough to know something is going on.

When a Libby attorney, during his cross examination, went over the specifics of a newspaper column critical of Russert and then asked whether it was "one of the more personal attacks you've experienced," Russert replied, "Probably not anymore."

Relying On The Notepad In The Electronic Age (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

I. Lewis Libby Jr. is charged with lying to federal agents, but no one knows precisely what he said. The jury hearing his case must rely on an F.B.I. agent's recollection, based on notes taken at the time.

Mr. Libby is also charged with lying to a grand jury. That testimony was tape-recorded, and jurors spent eight hours last week assessing every word, inflection, pause and sigh.

Why is the Federal Bureau of Investigation still using Sherlock Holmes methods in the YouTube era?

More than 500 police departments in all 50 states now make electronic recordings of at least some interrogations, often videotaping them. At the F.B.I., by contrast, an agent cannot turn on a tape recorder without first getting a supervisor's permission.

The default method of preserving the statements of witnesses and suspects at our nation's most important law enforcement agency is known as "scribble then type."

Deborah S. Bond, the F.B.I. agent who testified about two interviews with Mr. Libby, said her notes were pretty good but not perfect.

"I can't take a verbatim statement," Ms. Bond testified. "You take notes as quickly as you can and as accurately as you can."

Here are some other reasons to favor recordings:

They eliminate disputes about whether Miranda warnings were given and whether confessions were authentic.

They allow juries to assess people's demeanor and credibility. They preserve clues. They encourage honorable police work.

They allow the investigators to engage people in conversation rather than worry about stenography. They are an excellent training device.

Thomas P. Sullivan, a former United States attorney in Chicago and a bit of a crusader on this point, says local law enforcement agencies that have adopted electronic recording cannot imagine life without it.

"I can say without exaggeration — it's unanimous — that they all love it," Mr. Sullivan said. "They hate it until they do it, and then they love it."

Judges seem to feel the same way. "I find it ironic," Judge Stephen P. Friot of Federal District Court in Oklahoma wrote in a letter to Mr. Sullivan, "that if the cost of repairing a car is at stake in a civil case, the defendant's account of the matter is meticulously recorded" by a court reporter in a deposition. "But agencies with ample opportunity and resources to do so fail to record statements where liberty and perhaps even life are at stake."

A decision in December by the Iowa Supreme Court illustrates the point. The court was considering a relatively difficult question: Did a 17-year-old immigrant from Bosnia understand what he was saying when he waived his Miranda rights and confessed to burglary and robbery?

But there was a videotape. It showed that the defendant, Arif Hajtic, spoke English well. "He showed no reluctance to ask questions if he did not understand," Justice Jerry L. Larson wrote for the unanimous court. "When the officer asked a question confusing to Hajtic, he asked the officer to clarify it, and the officer did so."

The court ruled that Mr. Hajtic's confession was authentic, and it affirmed his conviction. The case, the court concluded, "illustrates the value of electronic recording, particularly videotaping, of custodial interrogations."

The F.B.I. reviewed its policy about a year ago, and decided to keep it. Valerie E. Caproni, the bureau's general counsel, defended the decision, saying that its specialized work required sensitive case-by-case judgments about when recording was appropriate. The requirement that field agents get approval, Ms. Caproni added, should not be interpreted to mean that recordings are disfavored.

"There are lots of different factors that play into this," she said.

First, she said, the policy has not caused many problems for prosecutors. Then there is money. Making transcripts of recordings can be expensive and burdensome, Ms. Caproni said, especially when translators are involved. "There's a huge fiscal impact to it," Ms. Caproni said. On the other hand, the F.B.I.'s $6 billion budget dwarfs those of the hundreds of police departments that have embraced routine taping.

Most important, Ms. Caproni said, suspects may clam up if they know they are being recorded. "What you really want to do," she said, "is have them spend time talking to you. It's an art, not a science."

But those objections seemed to crumble at the Libby trial. Mr. Libby was interviewed with his lawyer, and it is hard to imagine that the presence of a tape recorder would have changed what he said. And it seems only fair to make the most accurate record possible of statements that could send a man to prison.

Ms. Bond, the F.B.I. agent, was repeatedly questioned about gaps in her notes.

"There might be some mistakes," she said, "because we're all human."

A tape recorder is not human. A really good one, according to a 2005 report of a committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court, costs $300.

Wilkes Warned By FEC (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

Brent Wilkes has had better years.

The fast-spending defense contractor, for whom jailed ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) allegedly helped obtain millions of dollars in military contracts, in recent months has seen his fortune dwindle, business fail and personal life go to shambles.

Meanwhile, media reports suggest that the Justice Department likely will indict Wilkes any day for his alleged involvement in Cunningham's pay-to-play contract scandal.

And now the Federal Election Commission could add to Wilkes' legal woes by prying into details involving his firm's political action committee.

Just before Christmas, the agency sent a warning letter to Wilkes promising to fine, audit or worse — "legal or enforcement action" — for failing to file campaign finance disclosure documents going back months on behalf of his company's PAC, ADCS Inc.

"It has come to the attention of the Federal Election Commission that you may have failed to file the [post-general 10/1/2006 to 11/27/2006 report] of receipts and expenditures as required by Federal Election Campaign Act," stated the Dec. 21 letter addressed to Wilkes, the PAC's treasurer. "The civil money penalty calculation for late reports does not include a grace period and begins on the day following the due date for the report."

As of late Friday, Wilkes still had not filed the PAC's disclosure report nor the committee's year-end report, according to the FEC Web site. Mark Geragos, Wilkes' lawyer, did not respond to a request for comment by press time Friday.

The FEC does not discuss ongoing enforcement cases, but according to Brett Kappel, an election law lawyer at Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease, there is little chance the agency will seek monetary penalties from Wilkes. With just $1.38 in the PAC's bank account — and banks threatening to foreclose on his property — it would appear difficult for the agency to squeeze blood from a turnip.

"The PAC appears to have been inactive since spending almost $5,000 on legal fees in June 2006," Kappel said. Under the agency's administrative fine program, the FEC "calculates the fine based upon the level of financial activity during the period covered by the reports that were not filed."

"Since there apparently have been [no transactions]," Kappel said, "[the PAC] probably will not get fined."

And any fine likely would be minimal. With barely enough for bus fare in the committee's coffers, Wilkes could be penalized roughly $900 for failing to file, according to an FEC penalty schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0130178

But that could be the least of it. Although Wilkes may dodge a fine, an audit — which the FEC stressed in the letter may be initiated — could open up the PAC's books to further law enforcement scrutiny, perhaps compounding a recent decision by a state campaign finance regulator.

Last month, California's Fair Political Practices Commission fined Wilkes $4,000 for illegally reimbursing an employee and her husband for $500 worth of contributions made to a San Diego mayoral candidate in mid-2000. Although the two counts violated state campaign laws, Kappel speculated that the decision may give further cause to federal investigators looking to scrutinize the transactions of Wilkes' PAC.

"I have to think that the FBI investigation includes a campaign finance angle," Kappel said. "I would be extremely surprised if the FBI is not investigating the PAC and the campaign contributions by Wilkes and others."

Although Wilkes wrote no checks to candidates in 2005-06, according to CQ PoliticalMoneyLine.com, the PAC handed out more than $40,000 to a dozen candidates the previous cycle, including Cunningham, former House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and former House Armed Services Chairman and current presidential candidate Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.).

During the 2001-02 cycle, the PAC handed out $89,000 to 19 Republicans. In addition to Cunningham and Hunter, Reps. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), and Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) also received contributions.

Even though Wilkes may have bigger fish to fry, Kappel said the potential domino effect set off by failing to file should be reason enough.

"I'm surprised that his lawyers didn't advise him to just file the report. They don't need any more investigations by any more federal agencies," Kappel said.

'95 WORDS MAY SAVE 'MOB' FED (NYPOST)

By Alex Ginsberg

The New York Post, February 12, 2007

Dogged by accusations of corruption, mob-busting FBI supervisor Lindley DeVecchio sat down with Justice Department investigators in May 1995 to defend his relationship with the Colombo capo who'd been his source for 13 years.

What he said helped save his job and his freedom - and it could do so again.

The confidential sworn statement was finally made public last week as part of a massive defense motion to get the Brooklyn district attorney's quadruple-murder case against the former G-man tossed.

In it, DeVecchio concedes that handling Colombo capo Gregory "The Killing Machine" Scarpa Sr. was tricky.

"I established an excellent rapport with Scarpa Sr., but I always remembered that he was a 'wiseguy' and I was an FBI agent," DeVecchio wrote, under oath and with a grant of immunity.

Scarpa dealt only with DeVecchio, a departure from FBI protocol. DeVecchio said FBI brass green-lighted the one-on-one relationship after the gangster himself penned a note asking that an exception be made in his case.

Under Justice Department rules, nothing DeVecchio said in the statement can ever be used against him.

Although the current allegations are different from the ones 12 years ago, DeVecchio's lawyers contend some of the off-limits statements were the indirect basis for the current case.

DeVecchio is charged with helping the mob plot murders.

Promises, Promises (USNEWS)

By Michelle Andrews

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

When two insurance agents showed up at Dorothy and Charles Holt's Visalia, Calif., home last spring, they offered a deal that seemed too good to pass up. For no monthly premium whatsoever, the couple could get a health insurance policy that would reduce their Medicare costs to just $5 for regular doctor visits and $15 if they saw a specialist, instead of the 20 percent coinsurance they paid with their regular Medicare plan. The agents said the new policy would not replace their coverage under the regular Medicare plan; it would just make it better. The Holts signed up that day.

But it wasn't long before they started running into trouble. The Holts found out that the SecureHorizons plan had indeed replaced their original Medicare plan, which allowed them to see most any doctor. Although the agents had assured them that all doctors would take SecureHorizons, the Holts' doctors told them they wouldn't accept it. The agents had also promised them they'd pay less under the new plan. Dorothy, 75, who suffers from congestive heart failure, requires an injection every two weeks that costs $1,600. Their old Medicare plan had covered the shots, but SecureHorizons would not.

Locked in. When the Holts tried to get out of the plan, they were told they were locked in until 2007. Finally, after filing a complaint with the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, writing their legislators, and enlisting the assistance of the local Health Insurance Counseling and Advocacy Program, they were allowed to go back to regular Medicare. But they're worried that other seniors could be hoodwinked. "It's just not right the way they did this," says Charles Holt.

UnitedHealthcare, which operates Medicare plans under the SecureHorizons name, declined to comment on the specifics of the case. But spokesperson Peter Ashkenaz says the company takes these complaints seriously and investigates them thoroughly. "Based on our findings, we'll take action up to and including termination of the broker's contract," he says.

The plan the Holts signed up for was a Medicare "private fee-for-service" plan (PFFS), a relatively new option that resembles traditional Medicare in that it generally doesn't limit beneficiaries to a defined network of providers. In addition to enticing seniors with low premiums, the plans may offer disease-management services and vision, hearing, dental, and other coverage not available under the regular Medicare plan.

Congress authorized the plans in 1997, but it wasn't until the past two years that enrollment really picked up speed, increasing from 51,000 in 2004 to 864,000 at the end of 2006, according to Mathematica Policy Research. Experts attribute the growth to the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, which boosted reimbursements to insurers that offer private plans. The law also created Part D, the Medicare drug benefit, which opened the door for private insurers to step up their marketing to seniors, not only of drug plans but of all private Medicare insurance products, from HMOs to PPOs (preferred-provider organizations) to PFFS plans, which are collectively called Medicare Advantage plans.

The Club Scene (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

THE SHOOTING of a 17-year-old girl in a Northwest nightclub opened a window into the District's world of nightspots that attract young people. It's one involving music, dance, alcohol and, too often, violence. City officials are right to look for ways to improve the safety of people of all ages who go to these establishments. Yet some issues central to the death of this young woman are being given short shrift in a rush to a solution.

Much of the debate spurred by the Jan. 20 death of Taleshia Ford has centered on whether people under age 21 should be allowed to attend clubs that serve alcohol. D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) is sponsoring legislation that would require any District club, bar or restaurant with entertainment to obtain a special permit in order to admit anyone younger than 21 after 11 p.m. Mr. Graham had floated the idea of banning minors from the clubs until there was an outcry that it would destroy the city's rich musical life. Mr. Graham is rightly outraged by the murder of yet another young person, but his proposal may be more salve than solution.

Those underage shouldn't drink; businesses that serve alcohol to minors should be prosecuted, and we don't think there is an inherent birthright for teenagers to go to nightclubs. But alcohol had little to do with the shooting in the Smarta/Broadway club. She was a bystander when the club's bouncer scuffled with a patron carrying a gun and it went off. Police say she was killed by accident.

Rather than questioning what the teenager was doing at the club, we are curious why this establishment, which had a history of violent incidents, was allowed to stay in business. Only after Taleshia's death was Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier able to use her powers to shut down the club, citing a series of serious criminal activities that predated the teenager's shooting. Answers are needed as to why police and the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board didn't act sooner. Was it a question of not having the authority? Or resources? Or information? Or political will?

Equally urgent is a point made by D.C. Acting Attorney General Linda Singer as she challenged the city to take a more aggressive approach in keeping guns out of such places. Ms. Singer, in testimony to the D.C. Council, has suggested exploring whether certain establishments should be required under specific conditions to have armed D.C. police officers in place to screen for weapons through a reimbursable arrangement. Ms. Singer's emphasis on guns being the true scourge is indeed welcome and we hope will be a priority of her office.

Mr. Graham asks good questions about children as young as 14 being in clubs at 2 in the morning. And he is eloquent in his grief over the murder of children. Yet there are shortcomings to the bill that, to his credit, he acknowledges, and he has promised further study and discussion with those who have a stake in the issue.

CIVIL LAW:

Firm Seeks Settlement Of Medicaid Claims Probe (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

U.S. Department of Justice criminal division lawyers say a Reston-based government consulting company either "willfully or recklessly" submitted inaccurate Medicaid claims on behalf of the D.C. government, the company recently disclosed.

Officials with Maximus Inc. said in a recent Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filing that they disagree with the criminal division lawyers' assessment. The company also said it is engaged in ongoing talks with the Justice Department concerning a potential civil settlement, the SEC filing states.

Federal authorities began investigating Maximus' work for the District more than two years ago.

Though not outlined in the SEC filings, unsealed court records show that investigators have reviewed accusations in a False Claims Act lawsuit in which a former employee says the company overcharged the government tens of millions of dollars while Maximus was working for the District's foster care agency.

No charges have been filed against the company. Last week, Maximus first disclosed in SEC filings that Justice Department criminal division lawyers "have expressed their view that the company either willfully or recklessly submitted inaccurate claims to the federal government on behalf of the District of Columbia."

"Maximus disputes that view," company officials said. "Nevertheless, the criminal division attorneys have referred the company to attorneys for the civil division to determine if a civil resolution of the matter is possible. Those discussions are ongoing."

A spokesman for Jeffrey A. Taylor, U.S. attorney for the District, on Friday declined to comment, saying the matter is pending. There is no indication from Maximus' latest SEC filing that the criminal probe has concluded.

Maximus officials could not be reached for comment Friday. Previously, a company spokeswoman said the company has been cooperating with federal authorities and would not want to jeopardize its efforts by making individuals available for interviews.

In previous SEC filings in 2004 and 2005, Maximus officials said they don't believe the company broke any federal health care laws in connection with the federal investigation.

The SEC filing last week does not specify the scope of the investigation into Maximus' work for the District, beyond stating it is related to "issues pertaining to compliance with federal laws governing Medicaid claims."

The Washington Times reported last year that federal authorities started investigating Maximus after a former employee accused the company of submitting questionable Medicaid claims totaling approximately $33 million while working for the D.C. Child and Family Services Agency.

Under the consulting arrangement, Maximus was paid 10 cents of every Medicaid dollar it helped the city recoup, eventually netting the company more than $3 million for at least $30 million in Medicaid claims, according to the lawsuit.

However, the 2003 False Claims Act lawsuit filed against Maximus by former employee Benjamin Turner says the Medicaid-billing project was "grounded in fraud."

A billing review found more than half of the foster children for whom Maximus prepared Medicaid claims had no record of actually having received services, according to the suit.

In addition, the lawsuit said the D.C. government, unaware of the purported mischarging, lost more than $3 million.

Previously, Maximus has declined to comment on Mr. Turner's lawsuit, saying it has not been served with the complaint and that public records show the suit was ultimately dismissed from Alexandria federal court in June 2005.

Within days of the lawsuit's dismissal in Alexandria, unsealed filings in Mr. Turner's case show that his complaint was filed in D.C. federal court on June 21, 2005.

No records of the case appear on the public docket in federal court in the District. False Claims Act complaints usually are kept under seal until dismissal or until the Justice Department decides whether to take over prosecution of the case.

In the latest filing last week, Maximus said it cannot predict how much the investigation could cost the company beyond $500,000 already set aside for an internal review.

"We are unable to quantify the probability of criminal or civil prosecution or the probability or magnitude of any other expenditure, fine, penalty or settlement," Maximus officials wrote.

ANTITRUST:

EMI In Talks To Dump Copy Protection (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, February 12, 2007

LOS ANGELES — The music industry is looking ahead to life without copy protection.

Major label EMI — home of Coldplay and Norah Jones — is in discussions with online music stores about selling its music without copy protection, or digital rights management (DRM), according to two sources with direct knowledge of the talks who would not speak for attribution because discussions are ongoing.

Last week, Apple CEO Steve Jobs created a huge stir when he called on the music industry to dump DRM, saying it hinders sales. Yahoo Music general manager Dave Goldberg predicts that by Christmas, most of Yahoo's catalog will be DRM-free.

"The labels understand that DRM has to go," he says. "It's nothing but a tax on digital consumers. There's good momentum behind DRM going away."

He says sales would increase by 15% to 20% without DRM. Consumers have bitterly complained about DRM, which puts rules on how a song can be used. For instance, songs bought at Apple's iTunes Store can be easily played only on an iPod, and not on digital devices from Microsoft and SanDisk.

EMI spokesman Adam Grossberg wouldn't comment on the DRM-free proposal.

Big four music labels EMI, Warner, Sony BMG and Universal long have said they must have their work protected against piracy. Last week Warner reiterated its support for DRM.

Meanwhile, online piracy has continued to grow. Some 15 billion songs were downloaded for free via unauthorized file-sharing services in 2006, says measurement firm BigChampagne. Album sales continue to tumble — down 15% so far in 2007 according to Nielsen SoundScan — and labels are exploring options.

EMI, in fact, offered a non-copy-protected song from Jones on Yahoo Music and eMusic in late 2006.

Without restrictions on entire catalogs, "Sales would explode," says David Pakman, CEO of eMusic, the No. 2 online music retailer behind Apple's iTunes. "DRM has been holding the market back." His company is the only legitimate digital music service selling unrestricted songs, in the MP3 format. Its songs work with any music player, including the iPod.

By taking the DRM-free plunge, EMI "would slow the loss of its sales, and get a lot of attention for its artists," says James McQuivey, an analyst at Forrester Research. "EMI wouldn't have to worry about pirates, because anyone who wants to pirate music is already doing it. The paying customer is a different breed."

Russ Crupnick, an analyst with researcher NPD Group, says ending DRM would put all the music services on an equal footing. "If I'm a label, I'm thinking this is a good thing. I don't want Apple to totally control the market," he says.

Hindalco Pact To Buy Novelis Underlines India's Push Overseas (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott In New Delhi And Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Corporate India's emergence as a force in global deal making accelerated with Hindalco Industries Ltd.'s agreement to pay $3.43 billion for Novelis Inc., a maker of rolled aluminum used in products such as beer cans and cars.

The deal, announced yesterday, comes about two weeks after India's Tata Group won the bidding for British steelmaker Corus Group PLC, an $11.3 billion deal that was the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company. Hindalco's purchase of Novelis, which is incorporated in Canada and has its headquarters in Atlanta, would be the second-largest and underscores the drive of Indian companies to expand overseas by targeting struggling manufacturers and niche players in Western markets.

Hindalco's all-cash purchase would also include $2.4 billion of Novelis debt. If approved by Novelis shareholders and regulators, Novelis shareholders will receive $44.93 for each common share outstanding, according to a statement from the companies. The company's shares closed on the New York Stock Exchange Friday at $38.54, down 56 cents, and had reached a 52-week high of $41.50 on Feb. 6. Hindalco's shares Friday closed at 173.25 rupees ($3.94), down 1%.

The combined entity would be one of Asia's largest aluminum producers and the world's biggest maker of rolled aluminum by production, the companies said. Novelis's aluminum is also used in automobile manufacturing and in construction.

India's Aditya Birla Group, which owns Hindalco, has been growing rapidly across a broad spectrum of industries, from cement and chemicals to telecommunications and financial services. Kumar Mangalam Birla, chairman of the Birla Group, said: "The acquisition is in line with our long-term strategies of expanding our global presence across our various businesses."

DOJ_NMG_0130182

In 2005, Novelis was spun off from Montreal's Alcan Inc., the world's second-largest aluminum producer behind Pittsburgh-based Alcoa Inc. Novelis faces price caps on its long-term contracts, some of which are expected to last at least another two years. Those caps keep Novelis selling canned stock, which is used to make aluminum beverage cans, far below current market prices, according to some industry experts. Novelis reported a net loss of $102 million in the third quarter of 2006 on revenue of $2.5 billion.

"In my opinion, they are overpaying," said Stewart Spector, an aluminum-industry consultant with offices in New York and Florida. "It seems to me that $6 billion is an awful big premium to pay for a messy operation."

James King, a metals consultant in Britain, said he thought other possible bidders could still step up for Novelis, including Russian aluminum maker Rusal and U.S.-based aluminum processor Aleris.

Robert Unger, a New Jersey-based aluminum consultant with Planned Technology Associates Inc., said Hindalco may want to buy Novelis now to benefit from better price contracts in the future.

The Novelis acquisition mirrors other recent Indian bids to buy North American and European companies that may be struggling in their home markets. Earlier this month, Tata beat out a rival bid from Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional to win Corus. The rising price of iron ore and relatively high labor costs had squeezed margins for the British steelmaker.

Indian companies are striking big deals in pharmaceuticals -- adding to the global reach of the country's drug makers -- and buying overseas energy assets to feed an economy at home that is growing about 9% a year. Meanwhile, the country's technology giants, such as Infosys Technologies Ltd., have aimed for smaller acquisitions in niche markets for software services.

With readily available capital supporting overseas ambitions, the Indian buying binge is expected to pick up speed in the coming months. Indian banks have shown a willingness to lend at low rates while a strong stock market has provided another option to raise cash. In 2006, Indian companies completed a record $7.17 billion in overseas mergers and acquisitions, up from $4.4 billion the year before, according to Dealogic Holding PLC, a market-research firm based in London. Already, the value of completed and announced deals in 2007 far exceeds last year's total.

Still, Indian companies are relative newcomers to overseas deal making. Even established global conglomerates such as the Tata Group have shown a reluctance to substantially revamp their new operations to cut costs, preferring instead to offer newly acquired units plenty of autonomy in an effort to pick up lessons in home markets.

At a news conference to announce the deal, Mr. Birla, the group's chairman, said that Novelis executives will continue to stay with the company and there will be no job cuts. "Novelis is adequately staffed," he said.

While the transaction has been approved by both companies' boards, Novelis shareholders must still agree to the deal by a two-thirds majority. The transaction is also subject to regulatory approvals. The companies said they expect the deal to be completed by the second quarter of 2007.

Nasdaq Concedes On LSE As Offer Lapses (FT)

By Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Nasdaq has conceded defeat in its most recent bid for the London Stock Exchange, saying on Saturday that the £2.7bn bid had lapsed without the US exchange receiving enough acceptances to control the LSE.

It indicated, however, that it would remain a long-term holder of LSE shares, saying it "will monitor with interest how the business performs going forward."

Nasdaq cannot make another bid for the LSE for at least 12 months, but the stake it has accumulated is large enough to discourage other likely bidders.

Nasdaq holds a 28.75 per cent stake - or as much as 29.16 per cent after acceptances of just 0.41 per cent, which are not binding now the offer has lapsed - accumulated during its second and latest campaign to buy its London rival. Clara Furse, chief executive of the LSE, has consistently rejected Nasdaq's overtures and has refused even to discuss the offer with Bob Greifeld, her opposite number at Nasdaq.

"As can be seen from the transaction documentation, Nasdaq and LSE clearly have a significant difference of view on the prospective future performance of the LSE business," Nasdaq said in a statement on Saturday after the 1pm London deadline for acceptances had passed.

It maintained that its £12.43 a share cash offer represented a "full and fair price."

"This view has been arrived at following careful consideration of the challenges facing the LSE business model going forward."

The outcome was as expected after LSE shares consistently traded above the value of Nasdaq's offer. They closed on Friday at £12.82, about 3 per cent above the £12.43 bid price, albeit short of recent highs above £13 each.

DOJ_NMG_0130183

LSE shareholders, including corporate raider Samuel Heyman, Paulson & Co., an activist hedge fund, are among those to have increased their holdings at prices higher than Nasdaq's offer.

Mr Greifeld said yesterday that he was "naturally disappointed" but this "disappointment is tempered by the knowledge that we remained true to our value case."

"We have a highly disciplined approach to acquisitions and will only consummate transactions to the extent that they deliver clear and visible benefits for Nasdaq shareholders, and enable us to allocate benefits to market participants."

The LSE has now fended off four prospective bidders and left itself with no obvious suitor for the first time in more than two years.

It responded yesterday with a short dismissive statement. It said it would continue to fulfill its vision to be the world's capital market "without the distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Mr Greifeld said last week that if the bid failed, Nasdaq could hold onto its stake in the LSE for 18 months, keeping its options open. He said the London group and its supporters had not grasped the rapid intensification of competition that would follow the introduction of new European regulations known as Mifid.

Nasdaq repeated that view yesterday, saying that it believed the London equity trading market was facing unprecedented change with the introduction of Mifid.

Nasdaq already faces competition from new share trading platforms in the US, as well as from its New York rival, the NYSE Group. Mr Greifeld suggested the same would begin to happen to the LSE, potentially undermining its profitablity.

"Nasdaq's experience of growing volume in a competitive environment suggests that yield pressure could be intense. This in turn will impact upon LSE's future financial performance and hence its value case. The accuracy or inaccuracy of LSE's projections can only be proven through the passage of time and Nasdaq, as LSE's largest shareholder, will monitor with interest how the business performs going forward."

It also said that Nasdaq would "continue to pursue other opportunities to build on its existing position as the world's largest electronic equities exchange."

Nasdaq Fails In Hostile Takeover Bid For London Stock Exchange (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. has failed in its bid to buy the London Stock Exchange Group PLC, its second attempt on the LSE.

Nasdaq said that less than 1% of the LSE's shareholders had tendered their shares by today's deadline.

Its chief executive Bob Greifeld said he was "disappointed" with the result but the exchange had shown itself disciplined in its bid by sticking to its valuation of the LSE.

The LSE welcomed the news, saying it can now get on with its business without the "distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Chris Gibson-Smith, the LSE's chairman, said the exchange will progress "various competitive, collaborative and strategic opportunities."

Many of its investors partly rejected Nasdaq's bid because they think there are other merger opportunities for the LSE.

The Nasdaq revealed Saturday that it had received acceptances worth just 0.41% of the British bourse's ordinary shares. Even added to the 28.75% share holding the New York-based exchange built up by buying in the market in recent months, that remained well short of the 50% it needed to begin taking control.

Revealing the results after a formal deadline for shareholders to accept the $24.35 per share bid had passed, Nasdaq stuck by its claim that the LSE was overvalued.

Nasdaq was just one of many suitors for the LSE in recent years -- Deutsche Boerse AG and Australia's Macquarie Bank Ltd. made formal approaches while Euronext NV cited interest without naming a price -- amid increasing pressure on stock exchanges to find merger partners so they can compete globally.

The New York Stock Exchange is due to close its $14.3 billion acquisition of Euronext, the operator of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon exchanges, within the next couple of months. The NYSE also recently took a major stake in India's largest bourse and signed a broad agreement with the Tokyo Stock Exchange, the world's second-biggest financial market.

A combination of the Nasdaq and LSE would have created the world's second trans-Atlantic exchange with about 6,400 listed companies carrying a total market value of $11.8 trillion.

DOJ_NMG_0130184

Nasdaq is now barred under British takeover law from renewing its bid for a year and declined to say Saturday what it planned to do with the 29.16% stake in the London bourse it retains.

Failed Bid Is Setback For Growth At Nasdaq (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

The Nasdaq Stock Market faces the task of rebuilding its foreign expansion strategy after the emphatic rejection this weekend of its second unwelcome bid to acquire the London Stock Exchange.

Less than one half of 1 percent of the London exchange's stockholders responded to Nasdaq's offer to acquire their shares for $24.35, leaving the American exchange well short of the majority it needed to take control. The bid, for a total of $5.3 billion, had brought about much public bickering between the two companies, with the London exchange calling the price too low.

The failed takeover leaves both the Nasdaq and the London Stock Exchange without a strong international presence at a time when stock trading has become an increasingly global business. NYSE Group, parent of the New York Stock Exchange, for instance, has made deals with three foreign exchanges within the last year.

One of those deals was a limited alliance last month with the Tokyo Stock Exchange, which is now in talks with the London Stock Exchange over what might become a similar relationship, according to one Tokyo exchange official. If the London and Tokyo exchanges paired up, it could put even more pressure on Nasdaq to find a foreign partner.

The new arrangement between the New York Stock Exchange and the Tokyo exchange includes plans for joint listings of securities and exchange-traded funds, the exchange of trading technology and — at some later time — the possibility of future investments in each other's shares. The Tokyo exchange is the largest and wealthiest trading center in Asia and the second-largest in the world, after the New York Stock Exchange.

That alliance was announced Jan. 31 during a visit to the New York exchange by the Tokyo exchange's president, Taizo Nishimuro. A report by the Kyodo news agency in Japan that Mr. Nishimuro may visit London soon, perhaps in late February, has led to speculation that a similar deal may be imminent.

The London exchange has rejected a string of suitors over the past year, despite pressure from hedge funds and other private investors. After the deadline for the Nasdaq bid passed, the London exchange issued a statement saying that it "looks forward to fulfilling its vision to be the world's capital market, without the distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Robert Greifeld, Nasdaq's chief executive, responded to the setback by saying that his exchange "will continue to pursue other opportunities to build on its existing position as the world's largest electronic equities exchange."

Under British takeover rules, Nasdaq cannot make another bid for the London exchange for a year unless someone else does so. Nasdaq still holds about 28 percent of the London exchange's outstanding shares, a stake so large that it would make it hard for anyone else to buy the London exchange without its approval.

Even so, the New York Stock Exchange is seen as a potential bidder. At the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, last month, John A. Thain, the Big Board's chief executive, praised the London Stock Exchange as having the second strongest brand in world stock markets, behind his own.

Mr. Thain said that he was not interested in any new mergers until the New York exchange completed integrating its operations with those of Euronext, the Paris-based European marketplace. That process will take about a year, he said.

People informed about Nasdaq's strategy would say only that the exchange intended to keep its options open. Holding on to its London Stock Exchange stake, which was largely financed with borrowed funds, would be inconsistent with Nasdaq's argument over the past year that the London exchange's shares were overvalued.

Keeping the shares "doesn't make sense," said William C. Freund, a former chief economist at the New York Stock Exchange and now the director of the Center for the Study of Securities Markets at Pace University. "It was a long shot to begin with. I would expect them to sell."

If there is a winner in the weekend's drama, Professor Freund said, it is perhaps the New York Stock Exchange. "There has been an intense competition among markets globally, but particularly between the New York Stock Exchange and the Nasdaq," he said. "It seems to me this puts Nasdaq significantly behind in the race."

Besides its alliance with Tokyo and merger with Euronext, the New York Stock Exchange has also bought a 5 percent stake in the National Stock Exchange, India's largest market. Its Tokyo alliance could lead to a more substantial tie-up after 2009, when the Japanese exchange is scheduled to make its own initial public offering. It had originally planned to do this last year, but delayed the listing after embarrassing and costly computer problems that repeatedly paralyzed trading.

U.K.'s Vodafone Secures A Passage Into India (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman In Mumbai And Jason Singer And Cassell Bryan-low In London

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Vodafone Group PLC's deal to acquire a majority stake in Indian cellphone operator Hutchison Essar Ltd. for $11.1 billion is expected to give the British company a perch from which to tackle one of the fastest-growing and most promising cellphone markets.

But the hefty price the world's largest cellphone-service company by sales is paying may test the patience of Vodafone shareholders just as Chief Executive Arun Sarin has been working to rebuild investor confidence. To win the auction for the Hutchison Essar stake, Vodafone ended up with a bid that valued the whole company more than $2 billion higher than its initial nonbinding offer of $16.5 billion. But Mr. Sarin defended the price tag by pointing to the Indian market's fast growth. "This is an excellent investment for our shareholders," he said in a conference call.

The stake was put up for sale several months ago by a unit of Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. of Hong Kong, which owned 67% of the company. India's Essar Group, which owns the rest, said yesterday that Vodafone had offered to be a partner with Essar in running the company. Vodafone said it would also offer to buy Essar's stake at the same per-share price it is paying Hutchison.

"We have been offered by Vodafone to be their partner," said Ravi Ruia, Essar Group vice chairman. "We are at the moment evaluating all our options in the best interest of the group." Essar is expected to decide in the next few weeks.

Mr. Sarin said that while Essar would be Vodafone's preferred partner, if the Indian company does decide to sell its stake, then "we have other partners we can invite in." He didn't say who those partners might be.

The winning bid also provides a valuable exit for Hutchison. Vodafone, which said it is assuming $2 billion in debt, said the deal values all of Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-largest cellular provider by number of subscribers, at $18.8 billion including debt. That sets its worth at a high premium to other telecommunications companies in India and around the world.

Vodafone's willingness to pay what analysts view as a hefty price for the stake, even though Indian laws require Vodafone to have a local partner to operate the company and serve as minority shareholder, reflects the attractiveness of India as a market. Not only is the Indian economy growing about 9% a year, but its cellphone industry is in relative infancy, making it a sharp contrast to many saturated Western markets.

More than six million new subscribers in India are added every month, yet fewer than 15% of Indians use a cellphone now, and cellular networks cover only about half the country. The overall market is expected to expand more than 30% this year, says Gartner India Research & Advisory Services.

ON THE LINE

• What's New: Vodafone will buy a majority stake in Indian cellphone operator Hutchison Essar for $11.1 billion.

• What's at Stake: India is seen as a big growth market for cellphones, and Vodafone had to beat out other bidders to strike a deal.

• What's Next: Vodafone could face investor scrutiny for paying what some consider a hefty price.

Vodafone also had to bid high to beat out others interested in the stake, underscoring another trend in the global cellphone industry. For years, Western operators had the cash and heft to snap up assets in emerging markets. But recently they have been joined by wealthy local players looking to expand their own operations, often with high stock prices to aid acquisitions paid in shares. This has intensified bidding for promising assets in fast-growing markets and driven up prices.

For Vodafone, winning the bidding for Hutchison's stake represents its own bold new bet on emerging markets. It also marks a test for Mr. Sarin, an Indian-born U.S. citizen, and could come to be viewed as the defining moment of his tenure at the company.

Vodafone was one of four bidders for the stake. The others were Reliance Communications Ltd. of India, Hinduja Group of India and Essar Group itself. Hutchison Telecommunications International Ltd., which is controlled by Hutchison Whampoa, decided to sell its 67% stake in Hutchison Essar as the value of mobile-phone operators in the few remaining large and expanding markets surged in recent months.

Reliance, which runs India's second-largest cellular network, and Hinduja weren't available for comment.

Separately, Vodafone said European customers will be able to access Google Inc.'s popular video portal YouTube by mobile phone, building on a series of recent mobile Internet deals.

Initially, Vodafone will have an exclusive deal with YouTube in the U.K., making it the only operator able to offer mobile-phone users a version of the video-clip site. The world's largest mobile-phone operator by revenue plans to extend the service across Europe.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Congress, Climate Talks Loom (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As he begins a series of hearings on climate change, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee said he is open to considering caps on harmful carbon emissions and higher fuel-economy standards for autos.

Many environmentalists worry that Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), a pivotal player in the looming climate fight in Congress and an ally of U.S. auto makers, could become a roadblock to meaningful legislation. He has long fought big increases in fuel-economy standards, and as Energy and Commerce chair, he has the power to block strict environmental regulations. His flexibility on such measures would boost the chances of them clearing Congress this year.

"We've got to consider every single option we have," Mr. Dingell said in an interview, making clear that he isn't ruling anything out at this point. "There's no way I can."

Starting tomorrow, Mr. Dingell's panel will convene twice-a-week hearings on climate change, with sessions expected to run through at least mid-April. The hearings will focus on the causes and consequences of climate change, as well as potential remedies. Former Vice President Al Gore, who has an Oscar-nominated movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," on global warming, will testify March 21.

A half-dozen different House committees have a claim on legislation addressing climate change, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi is moving to create a select panel that will cut across jurisdictions to focus public attention on the issue.

The heart of the legislative fight will be in the Energy and Commerce Committee, which has sweeping jurisdiction over environmental and business issues, and Mr. Dingell is moving to frame the debate. In a memo to committee members, Mr. Dingell likened it to the 1990 struggle to enact landmark clean-air legislation. He noted that effort -- which he helped shepherd -- was "of similar complexity and extremely hard-fought."

Five of the 57 Energy and Commerce Committee members were on the panel in 1990, and Mr. Dingell's aggressive hearing schedule is designed both to educate members and begin sorting out what is politically possible among rank-and-file lawmakers. Beyond the public sessions, Mr. Dingell is convening closed-door briefings for committee aides every Friday. In a session last week, members of the U.N. panel on climate change spoke to the group. Aides said Mr. Dingell also is meeting with other key lawmakers, including Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.), who has made addressing climate change a priority of her panel.

The goal is to produce legislation ready for House floor action by the end of June, a deadline imposed by Ms. Pelosi. "It's going to be very hard," Mr. Dingell said.

Details remain to be worked out. The House appears to be staking out the clearest course for action on the issue. The Senate has yet to stir to action, but Sens. Boxer and Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) are pressing the issue.

Mr. Dingell said conservation measures will be considered, as will proposals to encourage use of biofuels. He also vowed to consider measures raising fuel economy standards for autos, along with proposals to cap carbon emissions from plants and factories.

Sen. Stevens Pushes For Tougher Fuel-economy Standards (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

Lawmakers who have opposed stricter emissions standards find themselves pressured to combat climate change.

For decades, Sen. Ted Stevens has battled environmentalists, but the Alaska Republican now finds himself in an unusual spot: pushing tougher fuel-economy standards for cars.

Amid heightened concerns over global warming and U.S. dependence on foreign oil, Stevens is one of a number of lawmakers shifting gears in the debate over whether Congress should mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules.

"I'm trying to protect my state," said Stevens, who recently called climate change "more apparent in Alaska than anywhere else."

The 83-year-old senator's change of heart illustrates how the landscape has shifted in Congress, and could signal a turning point in the long campaign by environmentalists — successfully fended off by Detroit — to toughen fuel-economy standards.

"There is clear bipartisan agreement, for the first time in 30 years, that Congress is going to have to act to increase fuel economy standards," said Philip E. Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust.

DOJ_NMG_0130187

Cars and light trucks — including SUVs, pickups and vans — account for about one-fifth of U.S. carbon dioxide production. The better the fuel economy, the lower the emissions of carbon dioxide, blamed for contributing to global warming.

For years, Congress has debated whether to mandate higher standards as the fleet-average fuel economy has declined from its peak in the mid-1980s. Under a 1975 law passed after the Arab oil embargo, each automaker's car fleet must average 27.5 miles per gallon and its light trucks 22.2 miles per gallon. The car standard has been untouched for 18 years; the truck standard will increase to 24 miles per gallon by 2011.

Stevens is sponsoring a bill to raise the standards for cars to 40 miles per gallon within a decade. Just two years ago, he voted against a similar measure. Stevens said he is convinced Detroit can build more fuel-efficient cars.

"Unless we put some urgency behind it and tell them we mean business," he said in a recent interview, "nothing's going to happen."

Legislation to require an increase faces strong opposition from the U.S. auto industry and its congressional allies, who contend it would lead to lighter, less safe vehicles; threaten auto industry jobs; and limit consumer choice.

Citing Detroit's economic woes, Rep. Joe L. Barton of Texas, the top Republican on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said: "The last time I looked at the business pages, Ford and GM were ... hemorrhaging jobs, they're losing market share. Yeah, let's pile on and pass a 40-mile-per-gallon mandate."

President Bush, although he called for an increase in fuel-efficiency standards in his State of the Union address, opposes any effort by Congress to mandate stricter rules.

Still, fuel-economy standards are likely to emerge as an issue in the presidential campaign, which could spark action in Congress.

Announced and prospective candidates Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have supported stricter miles-per-gallon rules. That has prompted a Detroit ally, Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.), to remind them that the Big Three automakers have plants in 17 states "that account for 225 electoral votes."

The last time the Senate voted on the issue, during consideration of the 2005 energy bill, a proposal to increase the standard to 40 miles per gallon by 2016 drew just 28 votes. In the House, a more modest proposal to raise the standard was rejected 254-177.

But some of those who voted against tougher standards in the past now support an increase, and Detroit's allies are worried. "The threat is at its highest level that it's ever been," said Knollenberg.

Those hoping Congress will act are encouraged.

"We now have Congress members on both sides of the aisle, plus the president, calling for a serious increase in fuel-economy standards," said David Friedman, research director for the clean vehicles program for the Union of Concerned Scientists. "I really do think this is the best chance we've had in quite a long time to actually get something serious passed."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has made passage of energy and global-warming legislation a priority and has moved to establish a special committee to recommend legislation, bypassing House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), an auto industry ally who has fought tougher fuel-economy standards. The special committee is expected to be headed by Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), the House's No. 1 champion of stricter miles-per-gallon rules.

Markey, who plans to introduce his fuel-economy bill this week, said, "I've had both Democrats and Republicans coming up to me on the floor saying they agree with me."

Some hope Dingell, who has invited former Vice President Al Gore to testify before his panel about global warming, may be swayed by his Democratic colleagues to consider at least a modest increase in fuel-economy standards. "He recognizes the demand from the broader caucus to get real action on global warming and oil security," said Daniel Lashof, science director of the climate center for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, hopes to begin writing a fuel-economy bill by spring. With both him and Stevens, the committee's top Republican, supporting an increase in the standards, a bill is virtually certain to reach the Senate floor this year.

Inouye is a cosponsor of a bill that would raise average fuel economy standards for all vehicles to 35 miles per gallon by 2019. California's Democratic senators, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, are cosponsors.

Bush has set as a goal an increase of 4% per year, which would take average fuel economy to about 34 miles per gallon in 2017. Dan Becker, director of the Sierra Club's global warming program, said Bush's call has given cover to Republicans to support tougher standards.

DOJ_NMG_0130188

And David Doniger, climate policy director for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said Stevens' unexpected support suggests that "maybe the time has come" for congressional action.

Stevens isn't ready to abandon his fight to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling. Nor is he ready to support mandatory limits on emissions from power plants. And some environmentalists remain suspicious of his motives, noting that his bill includes loopholes they don't like: for example, it applies only to cars, not SUVs.

But Becker said, "We welcome all epiphanies."

Congress Tackles Global Warming (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

More than a dozen competing measures have been introduced in Congress on the issue of global warming -- some minor, such as creating incentives for biofuel research, and others more drastic, such as taxing automakers for selling gas-guzzling sport utility vehicles.

The Democrats controlling Congress -- and a growing number of Republicans -- say this year the government will take significant action against climate change. They say President Bush helped the cause by mentioning it in his State of the Union address last month, as have the presidential candidates pushing the issue.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has promised to introduce a package of bills by June 1 aimed at cutting greenhouse gases, with a vote slated for July 4.

"As the most adaptable creatures on the planet, it is time for us to continue to adapt," she said Thursday, testifying on global warming before the House Science and Technology Committee. Mrs. Pelosi assured anxious colleagues that global-warming legislation "can create the next generation of good-paying new jobs."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent and a chief author of a leading global-warming bill, said there is a "very diverse cavalry" calling for action. His Climate Stewardship and Innovation Act is co-sponsored by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

"Doing something about global warming now will cost us a lot less than waiting to pay the cost of the effects of global warming," Mr. Lieberman said of his bill, which imposes mandatory caps on greenhouse gas emissions so that in 2050 the levels would be one-third lower than 2000 levels.

It also would create emission credits to control the costs for businesses and encourage industries to comply, as well as protect poor people from high energy costs, he said.

Mr. McCain is running for president, as are Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who have also signed onto the bill as co-sponsors.

Mr. Obama talked about the issue in his announcement speech Saturday, saying: "We can turn this crisis of global warming into a moment of opportunity for innovation, and job creation, and an incentive for businesses that will serve as a model for the world."

The bill, which the Republican-led Senate defeated two years ago, this year faces a much friendlier group of lawmakers. The debate now stems over whether to impose mandatory emissions caps, and how much the government should aim to reduce heat-trapping gases in the next few decades.

Bills suggesting a gas-guzzler tax or one that authorizes more than $20 million in taxpayer funds to establish four "green" universities have a slim chance of passing Congress.

Others, such as the Republican bill to increase the fuel efficiency standard to 40 miles per gallon for all new cars by 2017, are sure to meet opposition from lawmakers from Michigan, home to the already struggling U.S. auto industry.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter, Michigan Republican, warned that the swath of global-warming bills is causing "grave concern" for an already struggling economy.

"We're not looking to the federal government to make it harder for them," he said.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, also says he fears that legislation may be pushed "in a way that wrecks the American economy."

The Bush administration has proposed allowing the transportation secretary to raise the fuel standard 18 months before an automaker's model year and creating a credit system for companies with a head start.

Measures offering tax incentives for energy-efficient buildings and hybrid cars have support, and may be included in whatever sweeping measure is approved this year.

House leaders have not announced specific legislation they favor dealing with global warming, but several members have said there is bipartisan agreement on funding research for biofuel production.

DOJ_NMG_0130189

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico is crafting a compromise bill to slow the increase in greenhouse gas emissions. Supporters describe his plan as moderate and one more likely to meet Mr. Bush's approval.

Mrs. Pelosi last month announced the creation of a special global-warming panel, a move that irked Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell because it was widely viewed as an attempt to skirt him and tack regulations on automakers.

Last week the speaker and Mr. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who has fought changes in fuel standards, came to a compromise. They agreed that the new committee, which would expire at the end of the 110th Congress, will hold hearings and recommend legislation but would not have the authority to approve legislation.

Next month, Congress will have extensive global-warming hearings, with former Vice President Al Gore slated to testify March 21. Mrs. Pelosi said the U.S. must be innovative to meet the challenge, adding: "Green can be gold for our country."

If the Big Six Want to Talk About CO2 Emissions, California Will Listen

In response to your Feb. 6 editorial "Legal Hot Air":

The world's six largest automakers are crying foul about a recent case filed by California seeking redress for CO2-induced damage. They argue that courts are not the proper place for this kind of "global" issue. This sudden aversion to litigation is perplexing, given that these same companies have sued states repeatedly, in numerous jurisdictions, insisting that the courts must overturn all state laws dealing with greenhouse gas emissions. The companies hew to this path of complete resistance despite the fact that the vast majority of climate scientists believe that the world is facing a potential catastrophe.

Let me be clear: I also would prefer to reach solutions outside of the courthouse. Litigation can be expensive and time consuming. That is why I asked for a meeting with each of the CEOs of the car companies to find practical solutions to global warming. If they want to sideline the lawyers and talk about solutions, I am all for it. Meantime, they shouldn't call California's lawsuit "frivolous" while maintaining so many lawsuits of their own.

California's public nuisance case is well grounded in precedent. For more than 100 years the Supreme Court has allowed states to take legal action to prevent the destruction of their air and natural resources. In a case called Georgia v. Tennessee Copper, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes -- not a man known for indulging frivolous claims -- wrote, "It is a fair and reasonable demand on the part of a sovereign that the air over its territory should not be polluted on a great scale . . . or threatened by the act of persons beyond its control. . . ." More recently, the Supreme Court declared, "Air pollution is, of course, one of the most notorious types of public nuisance in modern experience."

The Big Six automakers generate 20% of all of the human-made carbon dioxide emissions in the U.S., and at least 30% of such emissions in California. Yet they oppose any federal action to curtail greenhouse gases. To date, their intense lobbying has been very successful: Congress has not improved fuel efficiency standards in 15 years, President Bush steadfastly refuses to consider caps on greenhouse gases, and the Environmental Protection Agency says that the Clean Air Act does not apply to CO2.

Meanwhile, California, with more than one thousand miles of coastline and a Sierra snow pack containing one third of the state's annual water supply, faces rising sea levels and rapidly melting snow. This threatens levees, flood control systems and California's irrigated agriculture. Already, spring snow melt occurs a week earlier, with greater flooding, than it did 30 years ago. The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change just warned us again that the threats from global warming are mounting. It is time to act.

Under our tripartite system of government, courts have an essential role to play, even in issues as complex as global warming. Justice Holmes could be speaking directly to the automakers, when he wrote: "This is a suit by a state for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the state has an interest independent of . . . its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air." And, we can add, whether emissions of greenhouse gases can harm its economy and environment.

Global warming is a serious, unavoidable challenge and we need to face it. The path of litigation, first taken up by the auto companies, is not my preference. But a legal cease fire requires that both sides lay down their arms. We should use our considerable joint resources to help fashion a common sense and practical approach. I stand ready to do so.

Required Health Plans Ethically Impossible

We read of health-care plan after plan that in some manner "require" all people to purchase health insurance ("The Budget and Your Wallet -- How Plans to Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured," Personal Journal, Feb. 6). Exactly what are we to do with the person who doesn't purchase health insurance (thus, breaking the law), and then who shows up at the door of the ER with chest pains?

Until we are willing to let people die on the steps of the hospital, an approach that I don't support, any law "requiring" the purchase of coverage, without active enforcement and without penalties for non-compliance, will quickly be written off by the uncovered masses as a law without teeth. "Requiring" coverage is just a feel-good phrase.

Gutter Snipes or Savvy Businessmen?

Friday's piece on strippers and Super Bowl Sunday ("Wardrobe Malfunctions, Inc.," Weekend Journal, Feb. 2) was certainly funny, but the sound of my own chuckles had the fortunate effect of bringing me to my senses. I remembered how our popular culture continues to slide into the gutter without much of a splash or any apparent resistance from those who know better.

Who but a sanctimonious prude would question another man's decision to amuse his friends at half time by paying a stranger to remove her clothing right there in the den among the nachos, chicken wings and Little League trophies? To call it sleazy or dishonorable seems too harsh and uncomfortably judgmental.

And that's my point. Hiring a stripper is sleazy and dishonorable, but I get the sense that, by an unspoken rule among us men, we're all supposed to keep our mouths shut about it and just have a few laughs. The tone of this story, even its publication, suggests that the Journal has, on some level, adopted that unspoken rule. We should all know better. Why not some dissent for a change?

Sam Walker wrote a really terrific article. I administer a class at the University of Arizona designed to encourage science students to become entrepreneurs, and only days ago did we discuss supply-chain management and distribution. When I read this piece, I was delighted how he exposed the business side of this industry and articulated the need for superb supply-chain management and customer-needs analysis to sustain and grow these businesses. The article reinforced a guiding principle I emphasize in my class: The fundamentals of operation, sustainability, growth and expansion of any business are universal across industry lines. The distribution techniques that bring triumph to the "exotic dancing" industry can also bring success in biotechnology and optics. The article serves as a great case study. You can learn a lot from any victorious business, and I hope my students got this message from the piece as much as I did.

What Mean Means

Dr. Robert Myers, in his Feb. 1 Letter to the Editor responding to Charles Murray's three-part editorial-page series "On Education," compounds Mr. Murray's original error regarding definitions of mathematical mean vs. mathematical median. Mr. Murray stated that half of all children in the U.S. are below average intelligence; Dr. Myers stated that Mr. Murray should have written below the mean, not the average.

The mean and the average are the same thing. What both authors should have said is median. The median, by definition, is the value below which exactly half of the sample points fall. Though for many common statistical distributions the mean, a.k.a. average, and the median are close, sometimes equal, they are not necessarily so.

Senator Seeks to Focus The War on al Qaeda

Kimberley A. Strassel's Feb. 2 Potomac Watch column "Senator Feingold's Sin" was right to single out the senator's "honesty" and "backbone" for his effort to require that U.S. troops be redeployed from Iraq. But to say that "the Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq" misunderstands Sen. Feingold and his effort, which is based on strengthening U.S. national security above all else.

DOJ_NMG_0130191

The senator called for redeploying our troops from Iraq because our massive, indefinite presence there is weakening our ability to fight the terrorist networks that threaten this country around the world. He voted to go to war in Afghanistan precisely because he wanted U.S. forces to eliminate the Taliban and destroy a safe haven for terrorist networks that threaten our country.

As your editorial noted, Congress has the power to end a war. Sen. Feingold wants Congress to use that power to end U.S. involvement in this disastrous war in Iraq, so that we can fight al Qaeda and other global threats more aggressively and effectively. That doesn't sound like a pacifist, does it?

Virgin Thinking (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Richard Branson's $25 million contest to solicit ways to remove carbon dioxide from the atmosphere has many things to recommend it. Not least that it is anything but climate-change politics as usual.

True, the judges for Mr. Branson's challenge hail from the Apocalypse Now crowd; Al Gore joined Sir Richard for Friday's announcement. But the billionaire Briton is plunking down his own money for the prize, rather than asking middle-class taxpayers to pony up, à la the Kyoto Protocol and other top-down schemes favored by environmentalists and European politicians.

Who knows whether it will prove possible to reduce existing stocks of CO2 from the atmosphere. We're pretty sure, though, that technology and innovation are far more likely to make it happen than Kyoto-style restrictions on emissions. Yes, that means that Mr. Branson and other entrepreneurs may make a profit along the way. Yet if the climate-change activists are truly concerned with saving the Earth -- rather than with punishing "bad" industries like aviation, one source of Mr. Branson's fortune -- then surely they won't object.

As for claims that "we cannot afford to wait for futuristic solutions which may never materialize," as Friends of the Earth director Tony Juniper told Britain's Press Association, there's the obvious irony that the alleged ravages of climate change are themselves decades off. Finding new ways of dealing with these dangers, if they ever do materialize, seems far more sensible than crippling the world economy now. As environmentalists like to say, it's the "sustainable approach."

Producers The New Math Of Alternative Energy (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

The numbers are starting to look promising.

For years, the big criticism of alternative energy was cost: It was too expensive compared with energy based on traditional fuels like coal and natural gas.

Even though the fuel was often free -- such as wind or the sun's rays -- alternative-energy producers had to plow lots of money into finding the best way to capture that energy and convert it into electricity. Fossil-fuel producers, on the other hand, could draw on billions of dollars in infrastructure investments and decades of know-how.

Now the equation is showing significant signs of change. Costs are falling for some alternative-energy sources, driven by new technology and renewed development interest.

Alternative energy still can't compete with fossil fuels on price. But the margins are narrowing, particularly since oil and gas prices have been rising. The math looks even more favorable if you consider the environmental cost of fossil fuels -- which most purely economic calculations don't.

Alternative energy still faces obstacles to mainstream success. Many projects need government or utility subsidies and incentives to be viable. Generating costs have risen recently for some types of renewable resources, pushed by higher materials prices, labor costs and demand. Supply chains are prone to hiccups, and wind and solar-energy resources need backup sources of power to compensate on windless or cloudy days.

For all its promise, relatively little electricity currently comes from renewable sources, other than hydropower. According to the Energy Information Administration, renewable resources produced 2.3% of the U.S. electricity supply in 2005. Bio-mass was responsible for 1.5%, wind for 0.44%, geothermal for 0.36% and solar power for a scant 0.01%.

In contrast, coal-fired generation produced 49.7% of U.S. electricity supplies in 2005, followed by nuclear power at 19.3%, natural gas at 19.1%, hydropower at 6.5% and oil-fired generation at 3%.

But alternative energy stands to gain a larger share in years to come. Driven by concerns about global warming and energy security -- as well as the rising cost of electricity generated by fossil fuels -- regulators are forcing electric utilities to broaden their resource mix to include more "green" power.

DOJ_NMG_0130192

At the same time, the federal government is requiring oil companies to blend more plant-based biofuels like ethanol with gasoline. Equipment makers are expanding their production lines, which should ease recent shortages of some materials -- like the polysilicon used in solar panels -- and take pressure off prices.

Here's a look at the economics of the various alternative-energy sources -- how much they cost now and what developments could make them more competitive.

WIND

Wind power stands out as one of the splashiest success stories in renewable energy. Over the past 10 years, as wind farms sprouted around the world, the cost of generating electricity from wind has fallen dramatically.

In 1980, wind-power electricity cost 80 cents per kilowatt hour; by 1991 it cost 10 cents, according to the International Energy Agency.

Today, production costs at the best on-shore sites have dropped as low as 3 cents to 4 cents per kilowatt hour, but are more typically 6 cents to 9 cents, not counting subsidies -- getting closer to the cost of generating electricity from burning coal. In fact, costs are approaching the point where wind power may be able to prosper without subsidies -- currently 1.9 cents a kilowatt hour in the U.S. -- particularly if natural-gas prices stay high.

The Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration has concluded that there isn't much difference between the cost of new power plants using wind and other traditional fuels, such as nuclear, coal and natural gas, if you take into account a broad array of expenses. A plant entering service in 2015, the administration said in a 2006 report, could make electricity from wind for 5.58 cents a kilowatt hour -- versus 5.25 cents for natural gas, 5.31 cents for coal and 5.93 cents for nuclear. The report didn't quantify the differing environmental impacts.

A host of factors have brought down the cost of wind power. The materials used in wind turbines have improved, and the turbines are now much larger and more efficient: 125 meters in rotor diameter, compared with 10 meters in the 1970s. The cost of financing wind farms also has dropped as financial markets become more comfortable with the risks involved.

Governments have also given wind power a boost. In Germany, the largest wind-power producer, the government has been giving grants to builders of wind farms since the late 1980s, and requires utilities to buy electricity generated from renewable sources at premium rates. The extra cost is passed on to consumers.

In the U.S., the extension of the federal Production Tax Credit -- which gives tax credits to alternative-energy companies -- has spurred record development over the past two years, as have state renewable-procurement targets. The nation's wind-power generating capacity increased by 27% in 2006 to 11,603 megawatts, according to the American Wind Energy Association. Only gas-fired generators added more megawatts of capacity in the U.S. The association expects wind-power capacity to increase by an additional 26% this year.

By the end of 2005, there were about 59,000 megawatts of total installed capacity of wind power world-wide, enough for the needs of roughly 20 million homes. Two-thirds of that capacity is in Europe; Germany, Spain, the U.S., India and Denmark are the top five producers of wind power.

Wind power faces hurdles. Factors like location, wind speeds and capital costs have a big impact on the cost of generating wind power. The price of 3 cents to 4 cents per kilowatt hour only holds at sites with the best wind conditions. In some places with less wind, costs can still be as high as 20 cents per kilowatt hour. Meanwhile, a shortage of turbines the past couple of years has pushed up construction costs in the U.S., as has a weak dollar.

The turbine shortage, at least, could be easing soon. ABB Ltd., a big equipment vendor based in Zurich, says it has boosted production of transformers used by the wind industry at its plants in Virginia and Missouri. And in January, American Superconductor, of Westborough, Mass., completed its purchase of Windtec, a wind-turbine designer that recently inked deals with South Korean and Chinese manufacturers to build the machinery.

"As more companies manufacture wind turbines, we think prices will come down," says Jason Fredette, spokesman for American Superconductor, a maker of advanced electrical devices.

SOLAR

For decades, solar power has endured cycles of booms and busts as investors made big bets only to watch the technology fail to achieve its promise. Solar power still accounts for less than 1% of the world's power generation, with 5,400 megawatts of capacity on line, enough for the daytime needs of 2 million to 3 million homes. (Solar power doesn't generate electricity at night, meaning backup energy sources are needed.)

One reason there's relatively little solar electricity is that traditional solar panels aren't very efficient at converting sunlight to electricity. So most solar electricity is made and consumed at a single site -- and in many cases isn't even enough to meet the needs of a single house. A recent study by the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities found that it cost about $77,500 to install a 10 kilowatt-capacity system on a house. Without subsidies, it would take 50 years to pay for itself. With subsidies, it dropped to 9.6 years.

In all, the cost of generating electricity with solar panels is 35 cents to 45 cents per kilowatt hour, according to the International Energy Agency. In the U.S., costs are typically less -- 26 cents to 35 cents -- because there's better sun, says the U.S. Solar Energy Industry Association.

Now, however, a new generation of solar plants is on the cusp of being able to produce electricity on an industrial scale at competitive rates. The new plants use a technology called concentrating solar power, or CSP, which is much more powerful than the classic photovoltaic panels, which use semiconductor chips to convert sunlight into electricity. CSP plants use huge arrays of mirrors or solar dishes to track the sun and collect its heat to make electricity. The plants can generate hundreds of megawatts of power, closer to what fossil-fueled plants make.

The major hurdle remains bringing generating costs in line with those of conventional power plants. It costs 9 cents to 12 cents to generate one kilowatt hour of electricity by CSP -- not counting any subsidies -- compared with about 3 cents to 5 cents to generate the same amount of electricity by burning coal.

Tom Mancini, CSP program manager at the Energy Department's Sandia National Laboratories, says three factors make CSP plants more expensive than a traditional coal plant even though the raw material -- the sun's rays -- is free. Because the technology is so new, the equipment is pricey in itself and costs more to operate and maintain. And financing such projects is costly because of the perceived risk. CSP is a young technology: Only 6% of solar energy is generated by CSP technology, with the lion's share still coming from traditional solar panels that typically are heavily subsidized by homeowners.

For now, CSP still needs government support to be viable, either in the form of tax breaks to builders of plants or subsidies to buyers of electricity. The industry scored a major coup in 2006 with the creation of a U.S. tax credit that equals 30% of a solar project's cost. A growing system of state-sponsored renewable-energy credits also gives developers a valuable revenue stream. The credits are bought and sold by businesses and utilities trying to meet greenhouse-gas reduction goals.

But the new technology has inspired a burst of development. Major power companies in Europe such as Abengoa SA of Spain and Enel SpA of Italy are spending billions on new plants that will be coming on line in the next few years. In California, utility companies Edison International and Sempra Energy have inked contracts to buy large sums of solar power from proposed projects. In Nevada, Solargenix Energy LLC plans to bring a 64 megawatt solar plant into service this year.

Energy experts argue that as more CSP plants go into operation, the technology will improve and costs will come down. But with current costs high, few companies are willing to take the risk of building without significant government incentives. "It's a chicken-and-egg situation," says Mr. Mancini.

BIOMASS

Although it doesn't get much public attention, biomass is the biggest source of renewable electricity in the U.S. today -- producing more electricity than wind, solar and geothermal sources combined.

Biomass refers to the conversion of plant matter into a transportation fuel (biofuel) or electricity (biopower), usually by incinerating waste material or creating combustible gas through chemical processes. A significant amount of electricity also is made by gathering and burning landfill gas.

It's a growing area of interest because methane, created by decaying organic material, is a more potent greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide -- so people are anxious to put it to use and keep it out of the atmosphere. Many cities also burn solid waste to cut down the volume destined for landfill sites, and they're eager to convert the garbage to something useful.

The biggest biomass power generators in the U.S. aren't utilities. They're forest-products companies with big sawmill and pulp operations, like International Paper Co., Weyerhaeuser Co. and Koch Industries' Georgia-Pacific Corp. Weyerhaeuser, for example, makes electricity by reusing waste heat and by burning hog fuel, or wood waste, and black liquor, a pulp-mill byproduct. It sells the power it produces -- equivalent to the annual energy needs of 140,000 homes -- to local utilities.

Because biomass plants typically are small -- usually less than 50 megwatts in capacity, or one-tenth the size of a conventional fossil-fuel power plant -- equipment costs are high relative to the amount of power produced. That, in turn, makes generating costs somewhat high -- currently, about 5 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour without subsidies.

Power costs are also related to the cost of fuel and the amount of heat embedded in it. As many homeowners know, there's more energy locked in an oak log than a pine log. The same holds true for biomass power generation -- some fuels make more heat and, thus, electricity. Better numbers can also be achieved by mixing plant matter with fossil fuels, like coal, and burning them together at large plants to capture the greater efficiencies.

Costs are expected to come down as technology improves and as more waste material gets redirected to electricity production, providing a cheap fuel stream. Many experts believe biomass will expand dramatically in coming years as more industries look for ways to make electricity out of their waste, diverting more material away from landfill sites.

A recent study by the California Biomass Collaborative, a government and industry group, concluded there are 80 million tons of plant material produced in California each year that could be diverted to biomass use. About 30 million tons are practically available. The study said those 30 million tons could be converted into 2,500 megawatts of electricity, equivalent to five large gas-fired plants, and 1.3 billion gallons of transportation fuel at competitive prices.

Biomass has gotten a jolt from renewable-portfolio standards embraced by nearly half the states, which require utilities to get electricity from renewable resources. In California, for instance, the state's energy agencies have set a rough goal of having biomass sources generate 4% of the state's power by 2010.

GEOTHERMAL

Geothermal energy -- tapping heat deep in the Earth to generate power -- may have more potential, at less impact to society, than any of the other alternative resources. A new study on geothermal energy, produced by an interdisciplinary team at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, found that geothermal energy could produce 10% of the nation's electricity by 2050 at prices that would be competitive with fossil fuels.

Geothermal heat is turned into electricity through a number of methods. In general, producers drill into the ground to release steam and water that have been naturally heated and, until then, trapped. These are used to power a turbine and generator, making electricity. Liquids are reinjected into the ground to keep the process running.

Currently, geothermal energy costs about 6 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour, without subsidies. The main expense is actually drilling the holes and building power plants on top of them. And expertise is needed to properly manage a site to make sure the right amount of liquid is cycled through the geothermal source to extract the heat.

The amount of electricity produced depends on many things, including the size of the geothermal field, water pressure and temperature and how quickly the field can heat and release water.

Geothermal energy is especially valuable because it makes electricity around the clock, unlike solar or wind power that require backup sources of generation. Also, unlike wind and solar installations, geothermal plants have a small footprint -- smaller, even, than many fossil-fuel power plants. Advancements in equipment are making it possible to generate electricity with lower-temperature geothermal resources, and new drilling techniques let producers plumb greater depths.

Today, there's about 8,000 megawatts of installed geothermal capacity globally, with 3,000 megawatts in the U.S., the top producer. Mostly, it has been developed where heat is easily accessed and is accompanied by water and porous rock. The biggest developed field in the U.S. lies 72 miles north of San Francisco at The Geysers. Nineteen of the 21 plants at the site are owned by Calpine Corp., which makes 725 megawatts of electricity there, equivalent to one and a half large conventional power plants.

The MIT study found that far more geothermal electricity could be generated if companies -- especially oil companies -- leveraged their knowledge of drilling techniques, geology and hydrology to tackle the problem. An investment of $800 million to $1 billion in research and development would be required, equivalent to the expense of a single coal-fired plant.

The initial units would make electricity for 10 cents or so a kilowatt hour but later plants would see costs fall to 5 cents a kilowatt hour, probably within a decade, as processes became more refined. That would make geothermal operations competitive with modern gas-fired plants. But backers say that for geothermal energy to thrive, supportive policies are needed, including loan guarantees, depletion allowances, tax credits and accelerated depreciation -- things oil, gas and minerals-extraction companies get.

Still, geothermal energy does come with a caveat: Heat sources can be depleted if not carefully managed. At The Geysers, for instance, operators have had to retire at least half a dozen generating units, even though the field was developed largely only in the 1970s and 1980s.

BIOFUELS

Interest in alternative transportation fuels -- mostly ethanol -- soared following President Bush's declaration a year ago that the U.S. is "addicted to oil." Many potential fuels are being discussed, from biodiesel to hydrogen. Most of the buzz is around what's already by far the biggest alternative transportation fuel in the U.S.: ethanol made from corn.

There's lots of talk about the possibility of using ethanol as a standalone fuel to power cars. But virtually all the ethanol consumed in the U.S. today is used in a less-sexy way: It's blended into normal gasoline.

That's done mostly in parts of the country with bad air-pollution problems, because adding ethanol to gasoline reduces smog-causing emissions from the cars that burn the fuel. Ethanol also is used as a gasoline "extender."

The cost of producing ethanol depends largely on the cost of corn, ethanol's main feedstock. It also depends on the cost of the energy -- typically natural gas -- used to power the process that turns the corn into ethanol. Keith Collins, chief economist at the U.S. Department of Agriculture, estimates that today it costs about $1.60 to produce a gallon of ethanol.

Ethanol producers sell their brew on a wholesale market -- sometimes to gasoline refiners and sometimes to middlemen who sell to those refiners. The price of ethanol typically rises and falls with that of gasoline, which itself is a function of the global oil price. Ethanol typically has sold for up to 51 cents per gallon more than gasoline, because the federal government gives ethanol blenders a 51-cent-per-gallon tax break to encourage production of the supplemental fuel.

Over the past year, the industry that produces ethanol has had a wild ride. Last summer, ethanol prices soared, due to increases in both gasoline prices and ethanol demand. Gasoline blenders who had been using another emission-reducing additive -- methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE -- were switching over to ethanol because of concerns that MTBE was contaminating ground water.

Ethanol's per-gallon price premium over gasoline widened to more than $1. Margins for ethanol producers ballooned. Yet by late last year, the ethanol boom was cooling. The sudden profitability of the ethanol business, combined with increasing federal requirements for the production of alternative fuels, sparked a rush of investment in new ethanol plants.

Meanwhile, gasoline prices, and thus ethanol prices, were falling from their mid-2006 highs. The production costs for ethanol were also rising, largely because the rush to produce more ethanol had driven up the price of the fuel's main feedstock, corn.

On Friday, the price of ethanol for March delivery closed at $2.06 a gallon on the Chicago Board of Trade, and the price of gasoline for March delivery closed at $1.61 a gallon on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Where ethanol prices will go from here is a matter of debate. President Bush, in his State of the Union speech last month, laid out an ambitious target for the U.S. to consume about 35 billion gallons of ethanol and other alternative transportation fuels by 2017. (The U.S. currently consumes about 5.2 billion gallons of ethanol per year.)

Reaching the numbers outlined by President Bush won't be easy. It probably would require significantly increasing the concentration of ethanol that's blended into gasoline. That, paradoxically, is a move that scientists say raises potential air-pollution problems of its own. Studies show that while ethanol added to gasoline in low concentrations helps reduce certain emissions, such as carbon monoxide, it tends to increase some other emissions.

Another option to meet the government mandate would be to increase the use of ethanol as a standalone fuel. That would require the installation of ethanol pumps at gas stations -- a move that could cost the oil industry billions of dollars.

Zakaria: Unfortunately, We Can't Stop Global Warming (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

The most inconvenient truth about global warming is that we cannot stop it. Please don't mistake me for a skeptic. I'm fully persuaded by the evidence that climate change is real and serious. Of the 12 hottest years on record, 11 have occurred since 1995. Temperatures have risen by 0.74 degrees Celsius over the past century. (If that seems small, keep in mind that the difference in temperature between the ice age and now is about 5 degrees C.) And human activity appears to be one important cause. The concentration of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere has risen dramatically since the industrial revolution. Methane has doubled and carbon-dioxide levels are up 30 percent since 1750. The projections going forward are highly plausible scientific estimations. The recent report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change predicts that by 2100, temperatures will have risen by somewhere between 1.1 and 6.4 degrees, and as a result, sea levels will rise by 18 to 59 centimeters. The trouble is, if you accept all these facts and theories about global warming, it is difficult to see how any human response launched today can avert it.

The gases that are warming the Earth have built up over hundreds of years. They do not disappear or dissipate easily. Even if the world adopted the most far-reaching plans to combat climate change, most scientists agree that the concentration of greenhouse gases will continue to rise for the next few decades. In other words, global warming is already baked into Earth's future.

Scientists estimate that simply to keep greenhouse gases at their current levels, we would need to slash carbon-dioxide emissions by 60 percent. Given current and foreseeable technology, that would require cutting back on industrial activity across the globe on a scale that would make the Great Depression look very small. In fact, the future will almost certainly involve substantially greater emissions of CO2. Most studies predict that the world will double its consumption of energy by 2050. Since much of that growth in consumption will take place in China and India, it will involve the burning of fossil fuels.

Between them, these two countries are currently building 650 coal-fired power plants. The combined CO2 emissions of these new plants is five times the total savings of the Kyoto accords—that is, if the Kyoto targets were being adhered to by Western countries, which they are not. Even under the most optimistic scenarios the industrialized world will continue to burn substantial amounts of coal and oil.

I state these facts plainly not to induce fatalism or complacency. It's scandalous that we're not weaning ourselves off dirty fuels. Perfecting just two new (and almost workable) technologies—clean coal and hybrid cars—would be a giant leap forward. We could be experimenting with hundreds more technologies and techniques. But even so, the Earth would still warm substantially over the next few decades. So in addition to our efforts to prevent and mitigate climate change, we need to employ another strategy—adaptation.

No one likes to talk about adapting to global warming because it seems defeatist. But the result is that, as we debate the meta-theories about global warming, we're increasingly unprepared to deal with its consequences. Whether or not CO2 emissions are triggering certain reactions in the atmosphere, we can see that sea levels are rising. What are we going to do about it?

In an intelligent, practical speech last September, the president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, Frances Cairncross, urged that we begin such a discussion. "We need to think about policies that prepare for a hotter, drier world, especially in poor countries," she said. "That may involve, for instance, developing new crops, constructing flood defenses, setting different building regulations or banning building close to sea level." She points out that adaptation programs could move forward fast. Unlike plans to slow down global warming, which require massive and simultaneous international efforts, adaptation strategies can be pursued by individual countries, states, cities and localities.

Three years ago the Pew Foundation sponsored an excellent study, "Coping With Global Climate Change," which focused on the role of adaptation. The report found that moving in this direction would be costly and fraught with uncertainty and error. Yet, the authors point out, humankind's long history has shown it's possible; we have adapted as the environment around us has changed. The costs of relocating seaside communities are extremely high, but they will be even higher if we wait 20 years. The most important conclusion of the Pew study was that early planning is far more effective than managing the consequences of a breakdown. In other words, strengthening the levees in New Orleans costs much, much less than rebuilding the city.

Many environmental advocates fear that talking about coping with global warming will hamper efforts to slow it down. In fact, we have no alternative but to do both. Mitigation and adaptation complement each other. In both cases, the crucial need is to stop talking and start acting.

U.S. Labor Laws Apply To Tribes, Court Says (SDUT)

By James P. Sweeney, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 12, 2007

Broad implications seen for their casino workers

Indian tribes must comply with federal labor laws, an appeals court ruled yesterday in a California case that could affect thousands of casino workers across the country.

The decision against one of the state's wealthiest tribes, the San Manuel band of San Bernardino County, also took another bite out of the immunity that tribes have long enjoyed as sovereign governments.

It was unclear how the ruling might affect an impasse between labor and five big Southern California tribes, including Sycuan of El Cajon and Pechanga of Temecula. The stalemate has blocked legislative ratification of expansive new gambling agreements that would authorize 22,500 more slot machines for the tribes.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit concluded that San Manuel operated its thriving casino as a commercial enterprise, rather than a government operation.

“The principle of tribal sovereignty in American law exists as a matter of respect for Indian communities. It recognizes the independence of these communities,” Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice, wrote for the court.

“But tribal sovereignty is not absolute autonomy, permitting a tribe to operate in a commercial capacity without legal restraint,” Brown concluded.

Indian gaming has become a $23 billion industry nationally, with more than 400 casinos in 28 states. California alone has 58 casinos that employ 58,000 workers and gross more than $7 billion a year. Only a handful of California's casinos have labor agreements.

The appeals court ruling allows the National Labor Relations Board to hear allegations that San Manuel “interfered with, coerced and restrained employees” trying to exercise collective bargaining rights at the tribe's casino, which grosses more than $450 million a year.

A 1999 complaint filed by the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union alleged that San Manuel denied its organizers equal access to casino workers while the tribe cooperated with a rival union, the Communication Workers of America. The tribe and the CWA ultimately agreed to a contract.

DOJ_NMG_0130197

When the NLRB later concluded that federal labor law applied to the tribe, San Manuel appealed to the circuit court. The tribe invoked its sovereign immunity, contending that federal labor law did not apply to actions of tribal governments on their reservations.

The court said the case was "particularly difficult" because of "conflicting Supreme Court canons" relevant to the dispute.

In addition, Brown wrote, the National Labor Relations Act "was enacted by a Congress that in all likelihood never contemplated the statute's potential application to tribal employers."

Moreover, she added, "probably no member of that Congress imagined a small Indian tribe might operate like a closely held corporation, employing hundreds, or even thousands, of non-Indians to produce a product . . . marketed to non-Indians."

Howard Dickstein, one of the state's leading tribal attorneys, said the decision, if it stands, could have broad implications and would reverse "many years of judicial precedent."

"Traditionally, the courts said if Congress didn't expressly refer to tribes as included under a federal statute, then they were excluded," he said. "Now they are saying the opposite."

Dickstein believed the case was an ill-advised legal challenge, much like a powerful Palm Springs tribe's test of the state's ability to enforce California campaign and political disclosure laws against tribes. In December, a divided state Supreme Court ruled against the Agua Caliente band.

San Manuel was weighing its options yesterday. The tribe could ask the full court to reconsider the ruling or it could appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We are disappointed by the ruling," San Manuel Chairman Henry Duro said in a statement. "We believe that these gaming projects help tribes to fulfill essential government functions by providing education, health care, housing, senior care and other key programs.

"Those are basic governmental obligations that could be impacted by this decision."

Jack Gribbon, the hotel and restaurant employee union's state political director, took a measured view of the legal victory. Any final decision is probably more than a year away, he cautioned.

"This is just a single moment in time that is not a final decision," Gribbon said. "But I think it's a very good heads-up to those tribes in California . . . who have been unwilling to deal with workers' rights in a comprehensive way."

Gribbon's union, now known as UNITE HERE, led the fight last summer that blocked new compacts for Sycuan, Pechanga, San Manuel, Agua Caliente and the Morongo tribe of Riverside County.

Those compacts, which are still pending before the Legislature, contain labor terms negotiated by former Gov. Gray Davis' administration in 1999. But UNITE HERE, backed by the California Labor Federation and other powerful unions, wants what is known as "card-check neutrality," the ability to establish a union by collecting signatures from employees without interference from management.

Adam Day, a spokesman for Sycuan, said no one had ever tried to organize the tribe's casino workers.

"Organized labor has unprecedented rights under our tribal labor relations ordinance that they've never taken advantage of at Sycuan," Day said. "So, in that respect, the decision doesn't change what labor has had the right to do for more than eight years at Sycuan, and yet they've never lifted a finger to take advantage of the ordinance."

Gribbon has argued that the 1999 labor language does not adequately protect casino workers from harassment and intimidation by tribal employers. Yesterday's decision seemingly would bring federal protections to bear.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Officials Who Challenged Director Moved To Lower Posts (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Two senior officials at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives who opposed many questionable management and spending decisions by the agency's former director are being moved to lower-ranking positions effective Thursday, officials said.

Deputy Director Edgar A. Domenech, who also served as acting director last year, is being moved out of ATF headquarters to lead the agency's Washington field office. The assistant director for field operations, Michael Bouchard, will become an assistant to Michael J. Sullivan, a U.S. attorney who is temporarily running ATF.

The transfers are widely seen within ATF as demotions. They come seven months after the sudden departure of Carl J. Truscott, the former director, who clashed with Domenech and other senior executives over spending and management practices.

An inspector general's report issued after his departure showed that Truscott -- who previously served as head of President Bush's security detail at the Secret Service -- engaged in a wide-ranging pattern of questionable expenditures on a new ATF headquarters, personal security and other items. The report also said that he violated ethics rules by forcing employees to help his nephew prepare a high school video project.

Domenech took over for Truscott after he resigned and reversed a decision to include a costly engraved quotation from Bush's speech to Congress after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks at the new headquarters entrance.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell characterized the moves as routine and said "both are important positions."

Domenech and Bouchard could not be reached to comment last week.

The new deputy director will be Ronnie A. Carter, a 27-year ATF veteran, who has headed the agency's Dallas office since 2002. Bouchard's replacement is William J. Hoover, a 20-year veteran. Hoover headed the Boston office for about three years before taking over the Washington office in January 2006.

Dizzying Rise, Fall Of A Local Drug Lord (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 11, 2007

When he came to the attention of federal drug agents three years ago, Benjamin Ton, then 30, was an unemployed copy-machine repairman inexplicably living the American dream.

A Vietnamese emigre, he and his wife, Lena Le, had just moved from a modest rowhouse in Folcroft, Delaware County, to the upscale Cobblestone Farms section of Sicklerville. Parked in the driveway of their new home were a Corvette, a BMW and a Lexus.

"It was obvious there was a lot of money coming from somewhere," said Christopher A. Jakim, the Drug Enforcement Administration agent who supervised the squad working the case.

Eight months later, Ton was arrested on charges of heading a $50 million drug operation that in just two years had brought nearly 10 tons of high-quality marijuana and more than 300,000 ecstasy pills to the Philadelphia area from Canada, a quietly growing source for those illegal drugs in the United States.

At the time of his arrest, Ton was a major player in the Philadelphia region's thriving drug market, an industry with at least $1 billion in illegal street sales annually, authorities say.

The rise and fall of Benjamin Ton, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing, offers a glimpse into that highly lucrative drug underworld and a look at a new breed of American gangster.

Operating in close-knit ethnic groups and using language and culture as shields, these Asian, Latino and African American mobsters pose a more difficult challenge to law enforcement than the overexposed and largely disorganized American Mafia.

Wiretapped conversations during the Ton investigation, for example, were recorded in four languages.

"In two years, this guy was making more money than Nicky Scarfo ever dreamed of," said Assistant U.S. Attorney David Fritchey, who helped bring down Philadelphia Mafia bosses Scarfo, Ralph Natale and Joseph "Skinny Joey" Merlino and is prosecuting the Ton case.

Ton's story also is a look at the top of a drug empire. Authorities seized about $500,000 when he and 25 associates were arrested.

Seduced by money

Ton's organization sprang from a chance encounter, say Jakim and other DEA agents who have debriefed Ton since he began cooperating.

In 2002, Ton said, a Vietnamese friend from Canada told him that he was having trouble moving 100 pounds of marijuana he had shipped to Philadelphia.

Would Ton be interested in finding buyers?

Ton agreed, and a drug operation was born.

With connections to the Vietnamese communities in Philadelphia and Toronto, Ton was the right person in the right place at the right time.

"He was an ambitious, aggressive young guy who saw an opportunity and seized it," Jakim said. "We don't think he was involved in drugs before that."

DOJ_NMG_0130199

"He's remorseful for what he has done," said Ton's lawyer, Elliott M. Cohen, who said his client could not be interviewed. "He started out living an honest life and got seduced by the money."

Ton faces a life sentence, but his cooperation could result in less jail time.

Ton took his first deliveries on consignment. Eventually, he had a network of Canadian suppliers who competed for his business through a broker he hired in Toronto.

Weekly, he received shipments of 100 to 300 pounds of marijuana, hidden in trucks transporting legitimate goods across the border. One major shipment, for example, came in a tractor-trailer loaded with futons heading for Kmarts in North Carolina, according to the DEA.

The ecstasy, usually in shipments of 40,000 pills, was typically hidden in the door panels of cars, sometimes driven by Ton or his associates. Cash was brought up; ecstasy pills were brought back.

Fritchey estimates that Ton sent $25 million to $50 million to Canada over two years.

Ton paid between $1,700 and $2,700 a pound for marijuana and $2.25 to $3 per pill for ecstasy. His wholesale network would then sell the drugs for about double that.

According to the indictment, that network included about two dozen Asian American associates in Camden, in Eddystone, and in Masschusetts, Georgia and North Carolina.

The most potent and expensive marijuana was cultivated by the "Vietnamese Mafia" in "grow houses" - indoor hydroponic operations that have proliferated in Canada in the last decade, according to a Royal Canadian Mounted Police report.

Labeled "AAA" or "purple haze," this premium marijuana had a level of THC (the psychoactive ingredient) that was sometimes 25 to 30 percent, investigators said, instead of the usual 3 to 5 percent.

The even more potent ecstasy pills were stamped "puppy" or "strawberry," and sold for $25 to $30 apiece at "rave parties" popular with teenagers and young adults.

Phony receipts

By late 2003, Ton and his wife were buying fine clothes and jewelry and enjoying vacations abroad and visits to Atlantic City casinos.

In his debriefing sessions, Ton said he had always kept about $100,000 in cash in a home safe and hundreds of thousands more in bank accounts and safe-deposit boxes.

He traveled to Canada and Vietnam for business and pleasure, meeting in both countries with a Vietnamese movie star and singer with whom he had begun an affair, authorities said.

Ton would eventually spend $300,000 to build his girlfriend a home in Vietnam, a bit more than he and Lena Le had paid for their South Jersey house.

But just as a chance encounter brought Ton into the drug trade, another sparked his downfall.

In March 2004, DEA agents in New York City, working a different case, overheard a target on a wiretap discuss a shipment of marijuana and ecstasy to Philadelphia.

Within days, DEA agents here had won court authorization to set up their own wiretaps, which quickly pointed to Ton.

"He was the guy in charge," Jakim said.

In all, Jakim and agents Philip Bernal, Carl Rideout and William Schohn would record more than 1,000 conversations in English, Vietnamese, Chinese and Spanish as they worked the case.

They still shake their heads at the business acumen and ingenuity of the young, charismatic former Canon copier repairman.

At one point, Ton was able to write off a debt of $200,000 after police in the United States stopped one of his couriers en route to Canada and seized the cash he was carrying.

As is standard procedure, police gave the courier a receipt. Ton showed that receipt to his Canadian supplier, who accepted Ton's explanation and wrote off the loss.

Later Ton and one of his top associates, Sergio Caldera, faked a similar incident to save $600,000 earmarked for another Canadian supplier.

"They went on the Internet and copied the logo of a police department. Then they dummied up another seizure receipt," Jakim said.

"One of the interesting things was the phony cash-seizure receipt wasn't for $600,000 but for something like $580,000," Jakim said.

This made the seizure seem even more realistic, the agent said, because many drug dealers assume police pocket some of the cash they seize.

DOJ_NMG_0130200

"Ton and Caldera split the $600,000," said Jakim, whose investigators found a copy of the phony receipt during searches after Ton, Caldera, and 24 other members of the organization were arrested.

Hidden cash, hidden pills

Early on Nov. 6, 2004, a Saturday, Jakim was scrunched down in the backseat of his car, conducting what he hoped would be the last night of surveillance on Ton's home.

Parked a half-block away, the agent focused on the garage, where, he knew, Ton and Caldera were running $525,000 in bills collected that week through a machine that counted and bundled them.

Shortly after sunrise, Caldera pulled a silver Acura out of the garage. Based on wiretaps, Jakim knew that the cash was hidden behind the car's door panels and fenders and was destined for Canada to cover a previous drug buy and to "front" a shipment of ecstasy coming back down.

Caldera drove to his girlfriend's apartment in Northeast Philadelphia. She then set off alone on the journey north.

Diana Rivera, who owned the Acura, had made several trips for the drug ring, usually for a 2 percent fee. This trip was worth about $10,500 to her.

All day, the DEA listened as Caldera and Rivera - who have pleaded guilty to drug charges and are cooperating with authorities - talked on their cell phones. Investigators learned when she crossed the border, dropped the car off in Toronto, and picked it up later for her journey south.

As Rivera crossed the Rainbrow Bridge at Niagara Falls, DEA agents began tailing her. At the Fort Washington exit of the Pennsylvania Turnpike, they pulled her over and quickly found the stash of pills behind the car's door panels.

At $30 each, the shipment of 55,000 tablets had a street value of $1.65 million.

"It was time to shut them down," Jakim said.

13 Cases Collapse After Disclosure Of Informant Offenses (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

An undercover narcotics investigation touted by the government as a significant blow to a notorious haven for drug dealing has been left in tatters after damning revelations about an informant, among them that he was using the same sort of drugs he was buying for the police.

The U.S. attorney's office in the District said it has dropped or is preparing to drop charges against 13 of 23 people charged in a five-month investigation in and around the Woodland Terrace public housing complex in Southeast Washington. The cases collapsed less than five months after the arrests were announced.

During the investigation, while working for another police unit conducting a separate operation, the informant crashed an unmarked police car into a moving car and several parked cars, according to court documents. But he was not charged, despite the considerable damage and the fact that he didn't have a driver's license.

Little of the information about the informant's conduct during the investigation or his checkered history working for the police was initially turned over to attorneys for those charged in the Woodland Terrace investigation.

By the time it was provided, some defendants had already pleaded guilty. Other defendants were about to go on trial when the U.S. attorney's office made the disclosures.

On Friday in D.C. Superior Court, three defendants who had entered guilty pleas were allowed to withdraw them, and the charges were dismissed by prosecutors.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said that prosecutors were not aware of the problems with the informant when the first defendants pleaded guilty but that the office acted promptly once it learned of the issues.

The unraveling of the cases has renewed questions about how police use paid informants and how prosecutors determine which evidence they must turn over to the defense in the early stages.

The problems were first reported in the Legal Times.

Prosecutors are required to turn over information favorable to a defendant, such as a statement from a witness implicating another person in the crime or details of a plea agreement of a person cooperating with the government.

Defense attorneys in the District have complained that the U.S. attorney's office is delinquent in turning over such information.

The disclosure of such information, or the failure to promptly provide it, is a near-constant source of contention in D.C. Superior Court between the defense bar and prosecutors. It can be important in cases in which police and prosecutors are relying on information from people who are being paid by the government or who have pending criminal cases, or both.

Superior Court judges periodically have rebuked the U.S. attorney's office for not turning over such material. In this case, the U.S. attorney's office said it did not receive the information from police until it was too late.

For the Woodland Terrace investigation, the consequences were colossal.

Despite its location -- about a block from the D.C. police department's 7th District station -- Woodland Terrace was a hot spot for people selling cocaine, PCP and marijuana.

Last spring, the 7th District's Focused Mission Unit embarked on an ambitious effort to rout out drug dealers there. Woodland, a 234-unit low-rise complex, is bounded by Ainger, Bruce, Raynolds and Langston places. Neighborhood residents had said last fall that the police attention made a difference in ridding the area of the drug trafficking.

Working with the D.C. Housing Authority Police, the U.S. attorney's office and other agencies, D.C. police set up dozens of drug buys during the investigation. Many were made by undercover officers, but many others were made by the informant, according to prosecutors.

It was not until the first cases were about to go before a jury that some of the most damaging new information was handed over to defense attorneys.

Donna Beasley, an attorney for one defendant, said she learned not long before the Jan. 10 trial date that years earlier the informant was thrown out of the witness protection program. Then, on the day of trial, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney George P. Varghese, told her that the informant had not been licensed to drive when he crashed the police car.

The revelation prompted Judge Craig S. Iscoe to postpone the trial. But it wasn't the only notable disclosure that day, Beasley said. While the judge was deciding what to do, Beasley said she was told that the informant had identified someone other than her client in a photo identification of the suspects -- evidence she says was as potentially exculpatory as anything the government could have given her.

On Tuesday, the charges against her client -- and three others planning to go to trial -- were dismissed.

"Yes, they did the right thing by dismissing it," Beasley said, "but what's going on?"

Drug Czar Reports Drop In Drug Use (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Illegal drug use in the United States has dropped sharply since 2001 but abuse of prescription drugs remains a problem, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said Friday.

John Walters said that President Bush's anti-drug plan for 2007-08 is to reduce prescription drug abuse by 15% over three years. The administration ranks the problem second only to marijuana.

The plan singled out the pain reliever OxyContin as one of the prescription drugs most abused. It calls for more states to adopt prescription drug monitoring programs to prevent "doctor-shopping" to get prescriptions for more drugs.

Walters said overall use of illegal drugs among young people is down 23% from 2001, with 840,000 fewer teenagers using drugs now. He credited drug testing for much of the decline and urged its expansion in schools. He also said abuse among older people declined.

About 1,000 school districts carry out drug tests, which can trigger an intervention that keeps a young drug abuser from carrying the habit into adulthood, Walters said. Despite some concerns for invasion of privacy, he said, the United States will "look stupid in five or ten years if we don't do this."

Walters said the data came from a survey done at the University of Michigan for the National Institute For Substance Abuse. The report says about 19.7 million Americans reported using at least one illegal substance in the previous month.

In Washington, D.C, Bill Piper, director of affairs for the Drug Policy Alliance, called the strategy a "spin on the failure of the war on drugs."

He said in a statement that despite incarcerating millions of Americans, drugs are as available as ever and the related harms of addiction, overdose, and the spread of disease continue to mount.

Piper said drug use rates are less important than whether the death, disease, crime and other suffering associated with abuse go up or down.

Drug Control Plan Heavy On Prevention (OREG)

By Bryan Denson, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, February 10, 2007

White House - The strategy to reduce abuse by teens includes $7.5 million for nonpunitive testing in schools

President Bush's chief drug adviser released the White House's latest drug control strategy Friday in downtown Portland, a plan that calls for a broad public health approach to prevent teenage drug abuse.

DOJ_NMG_0130202

John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, offered high points of the new strategy -- along with some good and bad news -- at the Union Gospel Mission, which offers recovery services to adults addicted to methamphetamine and other drugs.

The good news: Meth use among teens declined 41 percent between 2001 and 2006. The bad news: Teen usage of illegal prescription drugs is up.

In an interview with The Oregonian Friday morning, Walters said public officials must approach today's teen drug abuse in much the way it approached the epidemic of gun violence that swept America's big cities in the early 1990s. Like gunfire, he said, teen drug use is a preventable public health problem that can't be treated solely by the criminal justice system.

Preventing the onset of drug abuse is key to the National Drug Control Strategy released Friday, Walters explained. The White House strategy seeks an extra $7.5 million for nonpunitive drug testing in school districts across the nation and an additional $30 million to blitz the airwaves and the Internet with anti-drug messages aimed at teens.

Walters acknowledged that randomly testing teens for drugs is controversial. But he said the tests are an important public health tool.

"Random testing may not be used to punish," he said, adding that results cannot be turned over to law enforcement or school officials for disciplinary reasons. "If you want to find the troubled young people . . . random drug testing is a powerful tool, along with screening in the health care system."

Science is changing the easy-going attitudes parents once held about drugs, Walters said. And their children recognize the trauma that drugs such as methamphetamine inflict on the human brain.

Charting global distribution of pseudoephedrine, which is used to manufacture meth, takes up much of Walters' time these days. Last December, for instance, authorities in Mexico seized nearly 20 tons of what was reported to be pseudoephedrine shipped from China. Walters met earlier this week with his counterpart from China and is following up on the bust in Mexico. U.S. authorities are working with officials in Mexico to identify how the shipment got there from China.

As the United States finds ways to cut off the supply of meth and its precursor drugs from other nations, smugglers find new ways to come in the back door, Walters said. "The question becomes, can our defense out-do their offense?" he said.

The President's Drug Control Budget calls for $12.9 billion to support reduction of drug supplies, prevention of drug abuse and treatment of addicts. But when Walters publicly released the drug control strategy Friday, he focused his remarks on teens.

Drug abuse spreads like tuberculosis from one child to the next, he told reporters.

"I recognize there are critics of random drug tests," Walters said. "But trust me, they're gonna look stupid" in coming years.

Sometimes, he said, you have to take unpopular measures to fight against drugs -- such as putting cold remedies behind the counter, as Oregon officials did, to prevent people from turning them into meth.

"Meth was too bad," he said. "This was a reasonable change."

Fugitive Honduran Street Gang Leader May Be In Houston (HC)

By Susan Carroll, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 12, 2007

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS — A reputed killer and leader of one of the world's most notorious street gangs escaped during a botched custody transfer in Honduras and has been a fugitive for more than a year, the Houston Chronicle has learned.

Ever Anibal Rivera Paz, the alleged chief of the Honduran arm of the Mara Salvatrucha gang, was being extradited on charges of plotting a massacre that left 28 people, including six children, dead on Dec. 23, 2004.

Also known as "El Culiche," The Tapeworm, Rivera Paz was last seen boarding a deportation flight from Houston to Honduras on Nov. 17, 2005, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement records.

The FBI fears Rivera Paz may have returned to the United States or may be headed that way, according to a confidential May 2006 FBI bulletin obtained by the Chronicle.

"Officers should be aware that he has threatened to assassinate any officer that attempts to apprehend him," the bulletin states.

Honduran officials confirmed Rivera Paz's disappearance but said they were never notified that he was scheduled for deportation.

U.S. immigration officials insisted that the Honduran government was notified in writing through multiple channels that "Culiche" was headed back after a stint in a U.S. prison for re-entering the country illegally.

"I don't want to blame anybody," said Oscar Alvarez, former security minister for Honduras, "but somebody didn't do his job."

Nine months before Rivera Paz disappeared, top FBI officials and then-President of Honduras Ricardo Marduro called news conferences to announce his capture. He was arrested by a Texas state trooper near Falfurrias on Feb. 10, 2005, after a traffic stop about 110 miles from the border.

Twelve days after the arrest, U.S. officials matched Rivera Paz to a Department of Homeland Security alert, based on Honduran intelligence, that warned he could be heading north to avoid prosecution in the massacre. His arrest was called a major blow to Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, and a model of international cooperation.

Now, two years after his arrest, the Rivera Paz case has raised serious questions about security procedures in both countries and about the integrity of the deportation process.

U.S. and Honduran officials could not, or would not, explain exactly how he escaped.

When the alleged MS-13 leader was deported, "nobody advised anybody" that he was coming home, said Alvarez, now the vice consul in Houston. The problem wasn't just on the U.S. side, he added, conceding that Hondurans also failed to catch his arrival.

Luisa Deason, an ICE spokeswoman in Houston, said U.S. authorities notified the Honduran government that Rivera Paz would be deported that day. She said ICE listed his name on a roster of deportees arriving in Honduras who had criminal records in the United States. The Honduran government also issued travel papers for Rivera Paz, she said, clearing the way for his deportation.

"We executed that removal order and turned everyone on that flight over to the government," Deason said. "If there's a question after that, perhaps what you need to do (is) ask that government."

The international law enforcement organization Interpol has reissued a lookout for Rivera Paz, who is described as "extremely dangerous."

On the night of the 2004 massacre, Alvarez arrived at the crime scene to coordinate the manhunt for the assailants, who had ambushed a crowded bus.

There were bodies in the road, blood on the bus steps. The killers left a note on the front windshield decrying a government proposal to legalize the death penalty as part of a crackdown on gangs.

"I don't want to remember," he said. "It was a terrorist attack."

At 7:15 p.m., an old, yellow Ford bus headed along a dirt road that runs through Chamelecon, a poor suburb of San Pedro Sula in northern Honduras. The bus was packed with 56 people, factory workers and last-minute Christmas shoppers, some standing in the aisle.

Witnesses said a truck and a car pulled out of the darkness, forcing the bus to the shoulder next to a grassy soccer field. The gunmen started shooting from outside the bus, the witnesses said, and then moved up the steps.

"People were screaming, and the more they screamed in the bus, the more they shot," said a teenage factory worker who was shot 16 times.

Alvarez said witnesses on the bus identified one of the gunmen as Rivera Paz. They said he was carrying an M-16 rifle.

Oldin Alexander Rodriguez, a young father, was in the 13th row with his wife and their baby, Isaac.

It was dark on the bus, he said. So dark he never saw a thing. But he heard people screaming and dropping to the floor.

He wrapped his hulking body around his wife, Glenda Yaqueline Ramos, who pulled Isaac into her lap. She shielded him with her knees, her arms and her head. She tried not to scream.

When international travelers — tourists, missionaries and business travelers — arrive at the newly remodeled airport in Tegucigalpa, they are required to pass through a Honduran customs inspection. They are asked to show their passports. They put their right, then left, index fingers on a digital scanner. They look up at the camera to have their retinas scanned.

It's different for Hondurans deported from the U.S.

They are corralled into a low-slung, beige building off the runway. There is no fingerprint scanner. The recent arrivals fill out forms with their names, ages and dates of birth. The paperwork is filed away in three-ring binders by date of arrival.

Honduran immigration officials said they are poorly equipped to deal with a record influx of deportees from the U.S., more than 24,000 in 2006. They don't have money to provide new arrivals with diapers for their babies, much less to hire more staff, said Rosario Murillo, with the Center for Attention to the Returned Migrant.

The system is chaotic. Sometimes the office gets a list of deported criminals, Murillo said, but sometimes it does not. A roster of deported criminals that ICE passed along to Honduran officials early this month contained the names of 59 people accused of offenses including illegal re-entry and sex crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0130204

Jorge Bustillo Rivera, who is in charge of fugitive captures for Interpol in Tegucigalpa, reviews the names on the U.S. flight rosters, checks for outstanding warrants in Honduras and tries to detect deportees using aliases.

But Bustillo said he also has to juggle a workload that grows by eight to 10 fugitive cases daily. The nearest FBI office is in El Salvador.

"We don't have the necessary resources to do the job right," Bustillo said.

Rivera Paz must have known the drill when the plane landed on Nov. 17, 2005.

It was his fifth deportation flight.

- - - - - -

No one's sure how long the bus attack lasted that night. Some passengers said two minutes. Others said five.

Alexander, the young father, was shot in the leg and side. The bullets ricocheted around inside his torso.

His 23-year-old wife felt his body go limp. She panicked and raised herself up, screaming. A bullet hit her right shoulder first. She was hit again, and stopped moving.

Alexander regained consciousness but still saw nothing, he said. He heard a stranger's voice, one of the attackers, moving methodically through the bus. The gunman paused over people who were still breathing, Alexander recalls. He'd ask, "Are you still alive?" Then he would shoot.

Alexander checked on his family. His wife still wasn't moving. The baby in her lap was covered in blood.

- - - - - -

U.S. investigators described Rivera Paz as intelligent, articulate and highly mobile. They said he uses different birth dates but is thought to be about 31.

He carries fake IDs, uses multiple cell phones and has 38 known aliases, according to Honduran authorities and the FBI. He has a number of nicknames in addition to "The Tapeworm," including "The Little Baby."

An early member of the Normandie Locos, a particularly violent Los Angeles-based clique, Rivera Paz's criminal history dates to the early 1990s. He's been arrested at least eight times in California, accused of drug trafficking, aggravated assault, burglary, using fake IDs, writing bad checks and driving without a license, according to federal law enforcement sources.

But most of the serious charges were dropped or sealed in his juvenile record. His convictions in the U.S. were relatively minor: misdemeanor burglary in San Francisco, false representation to a police officer in Los Angeles and giving law enforcement a fake ID in San Luis Obispo. He served 13 days in jail in California in 2001, according to his federal court complaint.

Rivera Paz was deported twice in 1996, once in 1997 and again in 2001.

In 2003, he was arrested in Comayagua, Honduras, allegedly with 19 marijuana joints, 29 baggies of cocaine and an AK-47 in his possession, according to Honduran court records. The documents also referred to an outstanding warrant in two murders in 2003 in Comayagua, allegedly of a woman and teenager who wanted out of the gang. The disposition of those cases was unclear.

The intelligence report in the Interpol file accuses Rivera Paz and his associates of hiring out their services as kidnappers, drug traffickers and hitmen.

"These gangs in Honduras aren't just gangs anymore," Bustillo said. "They're linked to organized crime."

According to Honduran court records, Rivera Paz claimed to have retired from the gang life after his mother died, telling the judge, "I declare myself innocent of everything."

On Aug. 17, 2004, he and two other inmates allegedly broke out of a prison in Comayagua, beating and severely injuring a guard in the process, according to Interpol.

It was in that picturesque, colonial town that the MS-13 leaders reportedly plotted the massacre.

Honduran investigators said they've identified seven suspects directly involved and 24 with possible knowledge of it. They still call Rivera Paz the mastermind behind the attack.

A handful of Rivera Paz's alleged accomplices are on trial in San Pedro Sula.

After Rivera Paz's arrest in South Texas, he went before a judge in federal court in Houston to face a charge of unlawfully re-entering the country. He pleaded guilty.

On July 8, 2005, U.S. District Court Judge David Hittner sentenced him to seven months in prison — in line with federal sentencing guidelines. Much of his federal court file remains sealed.

When he appeared before the judge, Rivera Paz said: "Please, send me back to my own country to pay for the crimes I caused there."

- - - - - - -

On Christmas Day 2004, the families of Chamelecon buried their dead, including 16 women and six children. One of the women was three months pregnant.

DOJ_NMG_0130205

There are still questions about the motives behind the massacre. Some are convinced it was a gesture of defiance against Honduran authorities. Others say it was revenge against a rival gang.

In their tin-roofed house on the outskirts of San Pedro Sula, Alexander gently tucks a stray hair behind Yaqueline's ear, on the side of her head that she can't reach because of her injuries. Their son, Isaac, now 3, wears SpongeBob SquarePants T-shirts and chases around the puppy, "Bear."

Yaqueline pushes her wheelchair with her good arm, the strong one.

She is not expected to walk again.

A while ago, the prosecutor in the trial of the other MS-13 members came by their house. He was looking for witnesses.

"I told him, we didn't see a thing," Alexander said.

Yaqueline nodded.

"It was so dark. I didn't see a thing."

Boldness, Violence Kept Drug Kingpin Atop Mexican Cartel (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

HOUSTON — Osiel Cardenas-Guillen could easily be mistaken for a bureaucrat. But the short man with a receding hairline and a forgettable face had a penchant for grotesque violence and ruby-encrusted handguns as leader of the Gulf drug cartel, federal agents say.

Court documents filed when Cardenas-Guillen was extradited to the United States last month reveal some of the brutal tactics and corruption that investigators say went into his business moving drugs along the billion-dollar smuggling route from Mexico to Texas.

Federal agents say Cardenas-Guillen, who seized the leadership of the cartel from Juan Garcia Abrego when Garcia Abrego was imprisoned in the United States, employed former Mexican special forces soldiers who called themselves the Zetas and tortured, beat and beheaded rivals and police.

Cardenas-Guillen faces trial in Houston, accused in a Brownsville indictment of drug smuggling, threatening U.S. federal agents and being responsible for much of the violence that has plagued the Texas-Mexico border.

His new defense attorney, Mike Ramsey, said Friday that Cardenas-Guillen was "in good spirits" but declined further comment.

Cardenas-Guillen had been sent to a prison near Mexico City but continued to run the Gulf cartel from a relatively luxurious cell with impunity.

Frustrated, Mexican officials extradited Cardenas-Guillen, three other kingpins and about a dozen lesser cartel soldiers to the United States.

"He authorized the murder of countless rivals. He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf cartel," Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said after Cardenas-Guillen's extradition last month.

He earned the nickname "the friend-killer" for his willingness to murder people within his own cartel, court documents said. And he favored a gold-plated .45-caliber pistol whose grips were decorated with ruby-encrusted panthers and skulls.

Investigators believe that at its height, Cardenas-Guillen's cartel had cells in Houston, Chicago, Atlanta and other cities and moved four to six tons of cocaine per month into the United States.

"He's one of the biggest of the big fish," said George W. Grayson, a professor of Latin American politics at the College of William & Mary in Williamsburg, Va.

Cardenas-Guillen's Zetas were the first paramilitary group to join a drug cartel. They helped him gain control of Nuevo Laredo, considered to be a prime smuggling route for drugs from Mexico into the U.S..

Cardenas-Guillen reigned over the city until his arrest in March 2003, according to court documents. Like many crime lords, he used his money to insinuate himself into the communities he controlled. From his cell in Mexico, he financed a Children's Day party in Piedras Negras, across the Rio Grande from Eagle Pass.

Mexican federal prisons allowed traffickers to hold long cartel business meetings with Cardenas-Guillen, according to a report by the Washington Office on Latin America, a policy and research group.

Cardenas-Guillen "retained control of the Gulf cartel thanks to these conditions and to the loyalty of the Zetas," the report said.

But imprisonment did loosen his grip on the Gulf cartel.

Sensing weakness in the Gulf cartel after his arrest, the rival Sinaloa cartel tried to take over Nuevo Laredo, sparking a bloody and ongoing turf battle.

DOJ_NMG_0130206

In that battle, the Zetas beat, beheaded, tortured and kidnapped rival drug traffickers and Mexican police officers, including some U.S. citizens. They were blamed for the June 2005 murder of Nuevo Laredo Police Chief Alejandro Dominguez, who was gunned down six hours after being sworn into office.

"The violence was unprecedented. I was born and raised here. I've never seen it escalate to such a degree," said Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo.

Venezuela A Hot Spot For Drug Trafficking (MH)

By Gerardo Reyes And Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, February 12, 2007

CARACAS - A Boeing DC-9 can carry as many as 90 passengers or, as one recent drug case showed, about 128 suitcases of cocaine.

Last April, Mexican authorities seized 5.1 tons of cocaine aboard a DC-9 coming from Venezuela. The traffickers had removed the seats in the airplane and packed the drugs in identical suitcases that somehow got past security at Caracas' principal airport, Maiquetía.

The case was a watershed, illustrating the brazen attitude with which drug traffickers seemed to be operating in Venezuela and apparent cover they could expect from high-level Venezuelan government officials.

Following the bust, officials from three governments who were tracking the shipment, said the traffickers loaded the suitcases at Maiquetía. But Venezuela's then-drug czar Luis Correa claimed the cocaine had been loaded in the northern Colombian city of Barranquilla. When confronted directly with more evidence -- flight path, fuel used by the aircraft, time of the flight -- by other officials, Correa held his ground.

The Venezuelan government announced last week that Correa had been removed as head of the National Antidrug Office, but gave no reason, and there is no official investigation into his strange declarations. The DC-9 case nevertheless remains part of a growing dossier on high-level Venezuelan officials possibly involved in an increasing amount of drug trafficking in this country.

MYSTERIOUS ESCAPES

The dossier includes mysterious escapes of wanted drug traffickers who were in Venezuelan custody, documents seized from right-wing Colombian paramilitaries and testimony of accused drug traffickers in jail.

Authorities from Colombia and the United States also say that top traffickers from Colombia and Haiti have made Venezuela their home in order to avoid detection from Colombian and U.S. authorities.

The rise in drug trafficking in Venezuela has coincided with crackdowns in neighboring Colombia, part of a $7 billion effort to fight the illegal drug industry in that country, and the rule of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

A former army lieutenant colonel who became president in 1999, Chávez has banned U.S. surveillance aircraft in Venezuelan airspace and effectively ended cooperation on drug matters with Washington.

Prior to Chávez, Venezuela was a transit point; now it appears to be a sieve: Since 1999, seizures are up four-fold, just one of many signs investigators use to measure the permissiveness of the environment for traffickers.

Another measure is the size of the loads decommissioned.

One trafficker, who allegedly took part in the five-ton DC-9 deal and is now jailed in Colombia, told Colombian authorities that the huge load was split between three organizations, including one that he called "the generals," a reference to the high-level Venezuelan officers involved in the trafficking.

The trafficker, Feris Farid Domínguez, told authorities he worked as a ``coordinator of aerial routes."

He told El Nuevo Herald in a jailhouse interview that he had regular contacts with top-level officials in the Venezuelan government's investigative police, National Guard, the national registry and anti-drug office, including Correa. He added that officials issued him a Venezuelan diplomatic passport, which he showed to El Nuevo Herald, designating him as a Finance Ministry advisor, and they provided him with government bodyguards.

`CARTEL OF THE SUNS'

Domínguez also had said, according to records of his declarations to Colombian investigators obtained by El Nuevo Herald, that he had met personally with Correa and that Correa had helped coordinate drug shipments for the so-called "Cartel of the Suns," allegedly run by top Venezuelan National Guard officers. The suns are insignia of rank worn by Venezuelan generals, as U.S. generals wear stars.

It's not clear whether Domínguez's declarations, some of which were published last month in El Nuevo Herald, led to Correa's departure last week.

Correa has denied Domínguez's allegations, but did not grant repeated Miami Herald requests for an interview.

The Venezuelan government has made strides in recent months to crack down on drug trafficking. Authorities captured two high-level traffickers this year and five last year, including Domínguez, which President Chávez himself trumpeted as a triumph of anti-drug authorities.

OPENING UP

The Venezuelans also have begun to work more openly with foreign governments, most notably the British and the Dutch, which are working closely on intelligence matters with a vetted 15-man Venezuelan police unit.

"We have the impression that they are serious about [combating drug trafficking] at all levels," Holland's ambassador to Venezuela, Hinkinus Nijenhuis, told The Miami Herald in an interview.

But U.S. authorities have a decidely different impression. The Venezuelan government cut relations with the Drug Enforcement Administration last year and has yet to sign an addendum to a bilateral cooperation agreement that establishes the guidelines for how U.S. counter-drug officials can operate in Venezuela.

Colombian authorities are also troubled.

Many large-scale drug traffickers have simply moved their operations to Venezuela, a top official at the country's investigative police told The Miami Herald on the condition of anonymity given the sensitive nature of relations between the nations.

OUTGOING SHIPS

The official said that police had detected an increasing amount of drugs on outgoing Venezuelan ships in a manner that he described as "blatant" and ``wanton."

In October last year, the head of a Venezuelan counter-drug unit captured, then released, Hermagoras González Polanco, a Colombian man with a $5 million reward and an Interpol red alert attached to his name. The Interpol report said that González, who is wanted in the United States and Colombia, told the Venezuelans that ``he had dedicated his whole life to farming."

Other evidence of Venezuelan officials' complicity in drug trafficking is piling up at the Colombian attorney general's office as its investigators sift through computer files confiscated during an arrest of a member of a right-wing paramilitary group.

Both paramilitary units and their leftist guerrilla foes have financed their fight by delving into the profitable drug trade.

In one of the files obtained by The Miami Herald, investigators say the paramilitaries worked through a "commander general of the National Guard." The file does not identify the general, but goes on to say that the "general" facilitated drug trafficking through Venezuela.

Giuliani: Gun Control Helped Lower Crime (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Rudy Giuliani addressed a potentially troublesome issue with conservative voters, saying his policies as mayor to get handguns off the street helped reduce crime in New York.

"I used gun control as mayor," he said at a news conference Saturday during a swing through California. But "I understand the Second Amendment. I understand the right to bear arms."

He said what he did as mayor would have no effect on hunting.

Addressing another potential trouble spot with conservatives, Giuliani spoke in favor of a border fence, saying, "You have to have secure borders, you have to have a fence, and the fence I think has to be a highly technological one."

The nation needs to know, he said, who is coming into the country and why. But he provided scant details on how he would deal with illegal immigrants already in the country. Citizens, he added, should be able to read and write English.

Giuliani was to make an address Monday in Silicon Valley and he was to appear Tuesday at an agricultural fair in the Central Valley.

Asked when he would make a formal announcement that he is a candidate for the Republican nomination, Giuliani said: "Well, formally announce? I don't know."

He then alluded to making an announcement in multiple locations "so we get more attention" but provided no details.

IMMIGRATION:

The Attrition Solution (WT)

By Steve King

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130208

I emphatically disagree with statements Sen. Mel Martinez made recently to the Washington Times ("New RNC chief backs bill with guest-worker plan" Page 1, Feb. 2). Mr. Martinez wants to grant illegal aliens a "path to citizenship." This represents nothing less than endorsement of a mass amnesty for many millions of illegal aliens. Americans reject mass amnesty by large margins. Amnesty is an affront to native-born Americans, to legal immigrants, and to the very concept of the rule of law.

Amnesty can be dressed up as "earned legalization," "going to the back of the line" or a "path to citizenship," but it is still amnesty. Do we give bank robbers "earned plunder" or make them "go to the end of the line" to get their pillage or a "path towards keeping their prize"? Consider two brothers living in Mexico City. One came to the United States illegally. The other stayed in Mexico and supports his family there. Mr. Martinez would grant the brother who broke our laws permanent residence and then citizenship in our country. He would grant no such prizes to the brother who stayed in Mexico. This is the worst kind of amnesty -- it grants huge benefits that are reserved only for those who have broken our laws.

Amnesty will not, as advertised, increase national security; it will imperil us all. Some argue that if we grant amnesty we will at least know "who is in our country." They are fundamentally mistaken. We will not learn who the illegal immigrants are, but who they want us to believe they are. Aliens who want to create false identities will provide counterfeit or fraudulent documents from their "home country" and we will catch only those unlucky few whose can't afford quality fakes or who have fingerprints in the FBI system. There was a massive number of fraudulent applications filed for the 1986 amnesty. An estimated two-thirds of the applications for amnesty for agricultural workers were fraudulent and most of those fraudulent applications were approved.

As retired INS investigator Mike Cutler has testified before the Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee, "it will be a simple matter for illegal aliens, including terrorists or criminals, to walk into an immigration office, along with millions of other illegal aliens, and produce a false name and then get an official identity document from our government bureaucrats. These documents would then enable them to circumvent the various no-fly and terror watch lists. They would be able to use these documents as breeder documents -- all the while staying under the radar and obscuring and concealing their true identity."

Mahmud Abouhalima, a leader of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, was legalized under the 1986 amnesty. It was only after he got his amnesty that he was able to travel outside of the country, including severaltripstothe Afghanistan/Pakistan border, where he received the terrorist training he used in the bombing. Three-quarters of Americans have little or no confidence in the government's ability to weed out terrorists and criminals from the millions who would apply for amnesty.

Mr. Martinez presents the false choice of mass amnesty or mass deportations. The sensible middle ground -- supported by Americans over amnesty by more than two to one -- is a policy of attrition. Vigorous enforcement of our current immigration laws will substantially decrease the illegal-immigrant population over time. Experience has proven that illegal immigrants who could no longer easily obtain jobs would simply return to their home countries. The Center for Immigration Studies has concluded that a policy of vigorous enforcement would cut the illegal immigrant population in half in just five years.

Mr. Martinez claims that House Republican opposition to amnesty has alienated Hispanic voters. There is no evidence to support Mr. Martinez's position. According to the William C. Velasquez Institute's exit polls, only eight percent of Latino voters picked immigration as the issue that mattered most to them in deciding how to vote for Congress last election. Would support for amnesty have helped Republicans? In the 1986 election, after a Republican president signed into law the largest amnesty for illegal immigrants in American history, only 23 percent of Hispanics voted for Republican candidates, far less than the 30 percent support rate in 2006.

The one segment of voters who Mr. Martinez and Sen. John McCain threaten to alienate is not Hispanics, but the Republicans' law-and-order base. If they manage to do that, Democratic control of Congress won't be just a two-year aberration, but something we will have to live with for many years. The most important principle for the survival of the United States of America would be destroyed -- the rule of law.

Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, is ranking member of the immigration subcommittee.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Inspector Waxman's Inquest (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Rep. Henry Waxman and the Democratic detectives are back on the case. That was the message last week from the diminutive, soft-spoken California congressman and his powerful House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which grilled 29 different witnesses on everything from Iraq reconstruction and military and homeland security contracts to prescription drug pricing. Waxman says he's focusing on waste, fraud, and abuse, and his committee holds unique subpoena power, so these days, Waxman is one of the most feared representatives in Washington. "I suppose some people have had a free ride for the last six years," he allowed after three hours of questioning, "when Congress wasn't asking some of the questions."

A tough assessment perhaps, but Democrats want to make this much clear: The Bush administration is going to be answering a lot of questions. Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington, congressional Democrats on oversight committees across Capitol Hill are still just revving up; many are hiring staff and deciding what exactly to investigate. Those investigations can take months, and the showdown hearings could be a long way off. But investigations are coming. Lots of them. And potential targets from the White House to private corporations are keeping a close eye on Congress and hiring new attorneys just in case they come under the spotlight.

Waxman, a 32-year veteran of Congress with a lengthy record of hearings and legislation, is one of those leading the charge. He wrote the Clean Air Act in 1990, and four years later, he presided over a hearing during which the nation's top cigarette makers said smoking wasn't addictive, testimony that led to a flurry of lawsuits. While he was in the minority, his staff of 40-now 80-produced roughly 2,000 reports. "He is very systematic," says Rep. Elijah Cummings, a Maryland Democrat.

Already at one Waxman hearing, the Army announced it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Co. The Army had told congressional investigators until last week that it couldn't find evidence Halliburton had hired Blackwater USA, a firm Waxman is investigating that provides private guards-a potential breach of Halliburton's Iraq reconstruction contract with the Army. Last week, the Army said it did find evidence that Halliburton hired Blackwater; Halliburton denies wrongdoing. "There doesn't have to be one 'gotcha' moment," says Rep. Chris Van Hollen, a Maryland Democrat, for the public "to understand that Congress is doing its job." Republicans, so far, are bristling at some of the hearings. "It's old news," carped the top Republican, Rep. Tom Davis. Added Rep. Darrell Issa of California: "I hope [Waxman] would do more of recognizing what we did in the past."

Targets. But the way the Democrats see it, the Bush administration had a free pass from a Republican Congress for six years. So they're gearing up. Democratic Rep. Ike Skelton, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has a revamped oversight panel. Rep. John Dingell, atop the Energy and Commerce Committee, has suggested many areas to investigate, including drug and food safety regulations. "There is an abundance of riches," says Rep. Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts, who leads an international relations oversight panel. "There are so many beats. There is still an insufficient number of cops."

A real flash point could come if the Bush administration claims executive privilege and withholds information from Democratic investigative committees. "The rubber hasn't hit the road yet," says Stan Brand, a longtime lawyer with House Democrats. But an inkling of that struggle emerged last week when Ambassador Timothy Carney, the new overseer of Iraq reconstruction projects, did not appear before Waxman. The State Department said Carney was working in Iraq, but Waxman left an empty seat for him at the table and declared, "The chair won't be empty for too long." Presidential advisers say they'll be relying on new White House counsel Fred Fielding, a Ronald Reagan and Richard Nixon hand; he has a reputation for defending executive branch powers, working with Congress, and taking the public relations side of the job seriously. "Fred's advice is to be as cooperative as we can," says a longtime associate. One concern of Bush advisers is that the administration not appear to be obsessed with secrecy; another is dealing with Vice President Dick Cheney and his acolytes, fierce defenders of executive prerogatives.

Meanwhile, though, Waxman and his colleagues have a packed schedule. This week's topics: Iraq reconstruction, whistle-blower protection, and the Freedom of Information Act. And plenty more to come.

White House Sees Strong Productivity (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's economic team predicts rapid gains in U.S. productivity can continue for the foreseeable future, as long as rising protectionist sentiment and higher taxes don't get in the way.

In the annual Economic Report of the President, to be released today, Mr. Bush's advisers said productivity increases in the past five years have produced a range of economic benefits including strong overall growth, a solid job market and low inflation. From 2000 to 2005, productivity -- a measure of the goods and services produced per hour of work -- has increased at about 3% a year, higher even than the 2.5% growth during the late 1990s, when productivity growth was credited with creating a rare environment of both low unemployment and low inflation.

This helped the economy weather shocks such as the 2001 terrorist attacks, the collapse of the stock-market bubble, a recession and Hurricane Katrina. In recent months, White House economists said productivity gains finally have begun delivering another benefit: higher real earnings for ordinary workers.

Administration officials are optimistic they will see more productivity-driven earnings growth in the years ahead. That could help them score some political points with lower-wage workers, who have been falling further behind the well-to-do for years. It could help blunt attacks by Democrats that Bush policies have exacerbated differences between the haves and have-nots.

"If you care about the standard of living of the average worker, productivity is the story," Edward Lazear, chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, said in an interview. He added "productivity can continue to increase...as long as the fundamental conditions remain," particularly on trade and taxes.

The report focuses on gains in workers' overall compensation growth, rather than on wages alone. Administration officials have acknowledged real wage growth has lagged behind compensation growth, which includes the rising cost of health-insurance benefits.

Most economic forecasters, however, doubt the U.S. economy can maintain a 3% productivity pace in the next decade, and there are signs that productivity growth is tapering off. The new White House budget relies on an economic forecast -- largely comparable with private-sector predictions -- that implicitly sees productivity growth of about 2% a year for the next five years.

Productivity growth will become more vital to the economy in the future, as Baby Boomers start to retire and growth in hours worked begins to slow. Maintaining rapid productivity growth will require advances on several fronts, unlike the gains of the recent past.

The strong productivity gains of the late 1990s were due in large measure to a rapid increase in deployment of new capital, especially computers and software, Mr. Bush's advisers said. The recent wave of productivity gains has come in large part because companies have become more efficient in using the new technology, the report said.

Going forward, productivity gains will depend on continued strong investment and increased efficiency but also on increasing workers' skills, the report said. It will urge keeping taxes low on capital gains and dividends, strengthening education and keeping the U.S. open to foreign investment. In the long run, overhauling Medicare, Social Security and other entitlement programs also is important.

Future breakthroughs in alternative energy sources and improving efficiency in the health-care sector could provide big sources of productivity gains, comparable to the high-tech revolution of the 1980s and 1990s, Mr. Lazear said.

Bernanke's Congressional Testimony Could Set Tone For Treasurys (WSJ)

By Danielle Reed

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's semiannual monetary-policy report to Congress could well set the bond market's direction this week, with scope for added volatility if he wavers from the tone of his recent comments.

Barring any surprises from Mr. Bernanke's two-day testimony or on the data front, the 10-year yield is expected to stay in a range of 4.7% to 4.95% this week.

Late Friday, the price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 14/32 point, or $4.375 for each $1,000 invested, to 98 24/32. The yield, which moves inversely to the price, rose to 4.784% from 4.730%.

Mr. Bernanke's report to Congress "certainly has the potential" to set the tone for the market, said Michael Pond, Treasury and inflation-linked strategist for Barclays Capital in New York.

Given how far the market has scaled back its interest-rate-cut expectations -- it now sees just one cut by year's end -- it is equally possible, unless the chairman strikes a much more upbeat tone on the economy or a far harsher tone on inflation, that "the market doesn't react a whole lot," Mr. Pond said.

In recent comments, Federal Reserve officials have been careful to stress that inflation remains a risk and rates may well have further to rise, particularly if economic growth remains strong.

That, in turn, has echoed the tone of the Federal Open Market Committee's postmeeting statement at the end of last month, in which the FOMC left rates unchanged at 5.25% for a fifth straight gathering.

Mr. Bernanke, who testifies Wednesday and Thursday, is widely expected to "reinforce the notion that the economy is regaining some traction after a midyear soft patch," while policy makers will remain "on guard against the possibility of an unwanted cyclical rise in inflation," Deutsche Bank economist Joseph LaVorgna wrote in a research note.

The market's reaction to Mr. Bernanke's testimony, though, could play either way, Mr. LaVorgna said.

Data that could move yields this week include retail-sales figures Wednesday and housing data Thursday.

New York Fed Forms Market Practices Group

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York on Friday announced the formation of the Treasury Market Practices Group, a private-sector group whose role is to strengthen trading and compliance practices in the Treasury cash and repurchase and related markets.

DOJ_NMG_0130211

The group comprises representatives from dealer banks, large investors and custodians in the Treasury market.

"The role of this private-sector group is to strengthen market integrity by promotion of best practices in the Treasury market," the New York Fed said in a statement.

The formation of the group comes in response to concerns about price manipulation and questionable trading activities in the government bond market and follows a meeting at the New York Fed Nov. 6 with industry participants. The group Friday put forward a preliminary best-practices guide, which includes recommendations to promote market making and liquidity. It is soliciting comments from industry and the broader public by March 1, after which it will publish final recommendations.

Fed Turnover Presents Challenge For Bernanke (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Even as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke prepares to update Congress this week on the outlook for the economy, he faces new challenges within the central bank.

Fed Governor Susan Bies, 59, a former Tennessee banking executive and economics professor, said Friday she would leave the Fed at the end of March. Bies' decision means Fed Vice Chair Donald Kohn will be the sole member of the seven-person Board of Governors who has been there longer than Bernanke.

Bies' departure deprives Bernanke, who became chairman a year ago, of his chief expert on commercial banking, even as the Democratic Congress threatens to clamp down on mortgage and credit card lending.

Because there was already one vacancy on the board, President Bush must get two nominees confirmed by the Senate.

"For effective bank regulation and to understand the economy, we think it's important that you have some banker experience as part of that team," said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association.

Bies, who has been commuting between Washington and South Carolina, where her husband lives, is the sole woman on the board. There has not been a minority Fed governor since former vice chair Roger Ferguson, an African-American, left in 2006.

In addition, Bernanke faces higher-than-usual turnover at the 12 regional Fed banks. In January, Chicago Fed President Michael Moskow and Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan announced their retirements. Dennis Lockhart, a Georgetown University professor, will take over as president of the Atlanta Bank in March.

The seven Fed governors and five of the 12 Fed bank presidents make up the Federal Open Market Committee, which sets interest rate policy.

Despite the churning, a former Fed official says the central bank has a stable core of appointees and staff. "I would not expect any significant change in the direction of monetary policy," says Alfred Broaddus, former president of the Richmond Fed. "You're going to still have 18 or 19 people around that table, many of whom have been there for a while. There should be plenty of continuity."

Broaddus says the White House should search beyond white men to fill Bies' seat. While the average consumer may not spend much time thinking about the FOMC, "It affects everybody's life. It's important for it to be representative of the society at large," he says.

Fed Bank presidents are selected by boards of directors.

Bernanke will appear before Congress on Wednesday and Thursday to present his semiannual outlook on the economy.

Iran Won't Stop Enriching Uranium, President Says

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed during yesterday's celebration of the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution that Iran wouldn't give up uranium enrichment. He said he was prepared to negotiate with the international community; his speech fell short of an expected announcement that Iran had started installing 3,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium.

A Renewed Call To Televise High Court (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

With Supreme Court justices becoming increasingly comfortable in the spotlight, Sen. Arlen Specter says it might finally be time for their close-ups.

Spector (Pa.), joined by two other Republican and three Democratic senators, has refiled his legislation to require the court to televise its proceedings. Although getting the rest of Congress to agree still seems very much a long shot, Specter said there is a big difference between now and last year, when the bill did not reach the Senate floor.

"I think the frequency with which the justices are appearing on television can be a very significant factor" in changing minds in Congress, Specter said in an interview.

There is no doubt that the once-cloistered justices are making themselves more available to the media, giving on-the-record interviews with newspapers and magazines and popping up on television. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. starred in PBS's recent look at the history of the court.

Specter, former chairman of the Judiciary Committee and sometimes a sharp critic of the court, said the individual justices have been "extensively televised."

"Chief Justice Roberts and Justice [John Paul] Stevens were on . . . on ABC TV," Specter said in introducing the bill on the Senate floor. "Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was on CBS with Mike Wallace. Justice [Stephen G.] Breyer was on 'Fox News Sunday.' Justice [Antonin] Scalia and Justice Breyer had an extensive debate last December, which is available for viewing on the Web -- and in television archives.

"So there has been very extensive participation by court members, which totally undercuts one of the arguments [against the bill]: that the notoriety would imperil the security of Supreme Court justices."

More substantive arguments -- that cameras would alter the deliberative nature of the court or that lawyers would play to television rather than answer the justices' questions -- are overruled by the importance of increasing the public's knowledge of the court, Specter said.

The court makes monumental decisions -- who lives and dies, in some cases, and in 2000, who should occupy the Oval Office -- but is a mystery to most Americans, Specter said.

"It is, I think, fundamental that the court's work, the court's operation, ought to be more broadly understood," Specter said in his floor speech. "That can be achieved by television."

While the Supreme Court is the most insular of the nation's public institutions, justices like to say they are already the most open. Every piece of paper that comes to the court -- petitions, briefs, decisions -- is a public document, justices say, and they contend that they are the only public officials who must explain the decisions they make.

"We're judged ultimately by what we write," Justice Anthony M. Kennedy told a congressional committee last year -- not on the oral arguments or the private conferences at which justices vote on decisions.

The court has made some concessions to modernity: Starting with Gore v. Bush in 2000, it has released same-day audiotapes in 16 high-profile oral arguments, and beginning this term, it has quickly posted transcripts of the arguments on the court's Web site.

But several of the justices seem unwilling to go further. Justice David H. Souter, perhaps the most publicity-averse of the nine, is famous for his statement that cameras will enter the chamber "over my dead body."

Justice Clarence Thomas is opposed, and while Scalia and Ginsburg have said they could support gavel-to-gavel coverage of oral arguments, Scalia acknowledges that is unrealistic. A frequent critic of Supreme Court journalism that he says reduces the court's complex decisions to whether "the good guys lost and the bad guys won," he said in 2005 that showing clips of the proceedings would "misinform rather than inform" the public.

The two newest justices, Roberts and Samuel A. Alito Jr., sounded open to the possibility during their confirmation hearings, and Alito favored allowing cameras in his previous job as an appellate court judge. But neither seems inclined to push the issue with justices who are opposed.

The issue of who decides seems as important to some justices as the decision itself.

"We feel strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the needs of the court," Kennedy told Congress last year, "and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches."

That just sets Specter off.

He runs off a long list of cases in which the court found fault with federal legislation, and he seems particularly peeved about a 5 to 4 decision striking down a domestic violence act, in which former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist questioned Congress's "method of reasoning."

"When I read United States v. Morrison. . . I wondered what kind of a transformation there was when you leave the Senate chamber, where our columns are aligned exactly with the Supreme Court columns across the green, what kind of a transformation there was with method of reasoning that there is such superior status when going to the court," Specter said.

Such comments -- Specter also questioned the dwindling number of cases the court accepts and its process for reviewing petitions -- open the senator to criticism that his proposal for cameras seems born of pique more than concern.

"No, I respect their authority to make the final decision," Specter said. "But I think it ought to be known to the public."

Bush's Farm Bill Outlines Bold Move (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

CHICAGO

The Bush administration's recent proposals for the next farm bill – due for reauthorization this fall – have been winning accolades and criticisms from some surprising quarters.

Environmentalists have lauded it as an important step in the right direction, even as the largely Republican agricultural community has met many of its proposals – such as a plan to scrap subsidies for any farmer with an adjusted gross income of more than $200,000 a year – with skepticism.

Conservation and energy programs get a boost in the administration's plan, while several billion dollars are cut from payments to some of the nation's largest farmers. In comparison with the 2002 farm bill, the overall bill would spend $10 billion less over the next five years, according to the Department of Agriculture.

"We have some major concerns," says Mary Kay Thatcher, director of public policy for the American Farm Bureau Federation, which bills itself as "the voice of agriculture." "We're supportive of [conservation, energy, and rural development] getting additional funding, but we don't think you ought to reduce farmers' safety net to do that."

One of the most significant elements of the proposed bill would change the countercyclical program – the means by which the federal government helps farmers in an off year. It would go from one that's price-based to one that's revenue-based. That responds to complaints some farmers have had for years that they can face, say, a disastrous drought – which lowers supply of a crop enough that prices go up – and receive no payments.

This way, says Ken McCauley, president of the National Corn Growers Association, "you're actually getting the money to the farmer who needs the support." Moreover, he notes that corn growers – who have seen prices roughly double in the past year – may be heading into an era of higher prices because of ethanol, but they will still shoulder significant risk. "We'll still need a safety net, and a revenue-based one is a good way to go into it," he says.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is skeptical of that shift, noting that what helps a corn farmer in Iowa might not be so good for a corn farmer in a place like Texas. Ultimately, says Ms. Thatcher, she worries this new method would reduce the overall safety net for farmers.

But her major concerns have to do with the new income limits and payment caps, which would limit payments to a single farmer to $360,000. They would also eliminate some of the ways the farmer could get around such limits before, by setting up different "entities" through which he or she was paid.

The new income limit – lowered from the previous limit of a $2.5 million adjusted gross income per farmer per year – would affect about 80,000 farmers, says Chuck Conner, deputy secretary of Agriculture. He says the decision was not a difficult one.

"These are income subsidies, pure and simple," Mr. Conner says. "We maintain that it's an important principle that we not be using these income subsidies for people who are some of the most well-to-do people out there."

Much of the pushback on the new limits is coming from the South, where it's not uncommon for large cotton and rice farmers to earn more than $200,000 in a year.

But some of them say that what may seem an obvious principle – that they make enough already – doesn't take into account the huge amount of risk and debt they need to shoulder, or how much operations can vary from year to year.

DOJ_NMG_0130214

"I've been in farming all my life, but we've been in the expanding mode," says Stanley Reed, president of the Arkansas Farm Bureau Federation and a cotton farmer who works 4,000 acres in Marianna, Ark., with his son and daughter. "In the 1980s, we had an opportunity to load up on debt, and had to make land payments. If we'd had limits during that time on what our income could have been [in order to get subsidies], we wouldn't have gotten loans, and we wouldn't have been able to apply the earnings back to the land debt."

But others have applauded the fact that the limits will get subsidies into the hands of those who need it most, and free up some money for other programs: conservation, rural development, incentives and help for new and young farmers, and alternative energy development.

"There's really a groundswell of support on Capitol Hill for a farm safety net that helps more farmers, that is less costly, and that does much more to reward stewardship," says Scott Faber, farm policy director for Environmental Defense in Washington. "The secretary has hit all the right notes." Mr. Faber is particularly pleased about the increased emphasis on helping farmers who are producing for ethanol to develop best practices that minimize erosion and use less fertilizer. He also cites the loans and incentives for farmers to grow feedstock like switch grass for cellulosic ethanol. In addition, farmers who are tempted by the high corn prices to break into new, marginal land wouldn't get subsidies.

Conner says he's been happy with the reception the bill has received so far in Congress and among the key stakeholders. But some expect a battle over several key provisions.

"This is going to be interesting as we watch the debate unfold," says Michael Duffy, an agricultural economist at Iowa State University. "We may start seeing more of a regional push and pull, and regional conflicts, given who's affected."

Senators Enter Spin Cycle (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

Following a week of virtual gridlock over the Iraq War debate that left little for either side to gloat about, Senate Democrats and Republicans today will begin competing public relations campaigns designed to secure some stronger political ground heading into the first recess of the 110th Congress.

Democrats will spend the coming days trying to increase party momentum under the broad message that the voters put them in charge because they wanted change, and the majority has started to deliver. Republicans, meanwhile, will use the week to poke holes in the Democrats' initial stewardship of the chamber, while outlining the specifics of a Congressional agenda they hope to sell to the public in the coming months.

Senate Democrats started to set the tone last week, arguing that they have made a strong case over the past two months that they are delivering change and insisting on accountability from the Bush administration. The Democrats will use this week and the recess to tout passage of an ethics package and a minimum-wage increase, while reiterating their resolve to oppose the president's call to increase U.S. troops in Iraq.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said late last week that despite the logjam over how to debate the troop surge, he believes "the American public is satisfied with what is happening." And, he added, "The American public is watching what we're doing and is pretty happy with it."

But Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) suggested that the Democrats shouldn't be patting themselves on the back so fast: "We've been here two months and not one bill we've passed has been signed into law and we've only done two" bills.

The Senate has moved at a slower clip than the House, where Democrats with a 15-seat advantage have passed numerous bills and are set to do this week what the Senate could not — debate a resolution opposing Bush's troop increase. Senate Democrats have a much bigger challenge given they have a narrow two-seat majority and the chamber's rules afford the minority significant power.

Democrats and Republicans alike acknowledge that pace is likely to slow even more in the coming weeks as the Senate considers more controversial legislation and the 2008 elections muddy motivations. "It's going to get harder," Reid spokesman Jim Manley conceded. "Last week was probably only a taste of what's to come. As everyone understands, a determined minority can be effective at thwarting the will of the majority."

As such, GOP Senators have focused much of their energy over the first seven-week legislative stretch on trying to amend Democratic proposals, beginning with the ethics package and including the wage hike and the Iraq resolution debate. But Republicans also will try to move beyond the Democrats' agenda this week when they lay out a detailed blueprint of their priorities for the 110th Congress.

"It was Republicans that made earmark reform part of the lobby reform bill to protect against waste; it was Republicans that ensured that tax relief was added to the minimum-wage bill to protect jobs; and it was Republicans that kept the funding bill within the administration's budget to protect taxpayers," argued Don Stewart, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). "We promised reform and bipartisan accomplishments. We've delivered both."

Sources familiar with the Republicans' plans say GOP leaders, led by Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.), will arm Senators with their new agenda heading into the break. Still in the works, the Republicans' agenda will center on fiscal discipline, tax relief, health care and energy reform, fair treatment of judicial nominations, immigration reform and the war on terrorism, sources said.

"We're going to have a very positive message we can carry to our constituents," Kyl said.

At the same time, Reid's office late Friday circulated recess packages to Democratic Caucus members focusing on "a message of accomplishments," a senior aide to Reid said. According to this source, Caucus members are being asked to spend much of the recess focusing on legislation passed thus far in the 110th — including ethics reform, the fiscal 2007 continuing resolution and minimum-wage legislation.

Reid also has asked Caucus members to use those themes to contrast themselves with the "do-nothing Congress" of the 109th to boost Democrats' image as being more ethical and fiscally responsible than the GOP.

Reid's communications "war room" has included a series of talking points and background documents as part of the recess package, as well as examples of the types of events they should hold. For instance, Reid suggests Caucus members arrange to tour the facilities of a local company that will be increasing workers' wages to meet the minimum wage. Likewise, members are being encouraged to hold a press event with a group of women who currently make the minimum wage to highlight the impact on women.

Additionally, Democrats have been asked to highlight the Republican filibuster of Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) resolution opposing President Bush's Iraq War "surge" proposal while in their home states.

The Senate was set to consider the troop surge early last week, but the GOP mounted a procedural block to moving forward on the matter — unhappy with the conditions of the debate laid out by the Democrats. In the end, the Democrats backed out of the negotiations and opted to punt the issue until after the House debates it this week and after Senators return to Capitol Hill following a week off.

Democratic sources explained that although Reid wanted to complete work on the resolution before the recess, his Caucus members now can paint Republicans as out of step with a public increasingly unhappy with the war — and also put pressure on vulnerable Republicans to break with their party and support the resolution.

Arguably, both parties have some ground to make up. While Republicans got much of the blame for the impasse over the Iraq resolution, leaders maintain that they simply are digging in for minority Senate rights. Late last week, McConnell still refused to concede a loss for his party, saying: "It's not about keeping score. This is an extraordinarily important issue."

But Democrats seem to be taking a tally and giving themselves points for pushing back against the Republicans and for their overall handling of their seven weeks of leading Congress for the first time in practically 12 years.

"Congress is beginning to play its role again," said Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Caucus vice chairman. "We're feeling pretty good."

FEDERAL DIARY: Pay Unrelated To Performance, Workers Say (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The results are in, but what they mean is by no means settled.

In a government-wide survey, federal employees were presented with this statement: "Pay raises depend on how well employees perform their jobs."

The responses: 45 percent disagreed with the statement, 22 percent agreed, and 25 percent were neutral.

The query had not appeared on previous government-wide surveys and was added to the most recent one by the Office of Personnel Management in hopes of better understanding employee attitudes on pay. The Bush administration has called for more closely linking pay raises to job performance, and two large departments, Homeland Security and Defense, are moving to set up performance-based pay systems, which would give managers greater discretion in setting salaries.

It is not surprising to some civil service experts that a high percentage of employees do not see their pay as linked to job performance.

The majority of federal employees in the survey are covered by the General Schedule system, where pay, by and large, is dependent on time in the job and not how the employee performs, said John M. Palguta, a vice president at the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

DOJ_NMG_0130216

"The responses are an accurate reflection for the government as a whole," he said. "Pay raises are not heavily dependent on job performance."

Howard Risher, a consultant who has studied federal compensation practices, said the General Schedule, which was designed more than 50 years ago, has failed to recognize and reward the best employees in the civil service.

"I have heard the phrase 'living and breathing increases' more than a couple of times," he said. "I've also been told promotions are virtually automatic in the early years of their careers."

The employee survey was conducted during the summer of 2006. More than 221,400 employees completed it, for a response rate of 57 percent. The pay-and-performance question received the highest negative rating in the survey, OPM said.

But it was not the only troublesome response in the survey. About 35 percent of the federal employees said promotions are not based on merit, 36 percent did not see differences in performance "recognized in a meaningful way," and 33 percent said bonuses do not depend on how well employees perform their jobs.

The survey results have raised questions about whether the government is ready to transition to more rigorous systems that reward performance.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said the survey results say less about the current pay system and more about why a performance-based system would not work in federal agencies.

"I think the survey response indicates most federal workers don't trust a system by which they would be compensated or receive raises based on how they are judged on their performance by their managers," Gage said. "Federal workers don't believe that they are compensated based on their performance but on other more subjective factors."

Mark A. Abramson, executive director of the IBM Center for the Business of Government, thinks one solution is to begin the process with the managers. "What government really needs to do now is better train and equip their managers for implementing pay for performance," he said. "The managers are behind, and the government has not spent enough time preparing them for the implementation, because it is going to make their job different and harder."

In performance-based systems, managers should expect to spend more time setting out expectations and talking with each employee about their job goals, Abramson and Risher said.

"Too often managers do not see this as a central part of their jobs," Risher said. "It would be highly advantageous to see their pay at least in part dependent on how well they manage the performance of their people."

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said federal agencies have started pilot projects to test new personnel practices. By the end of this year, he said at a recent briefing, more rigorous job rating systems will cover about 20 percent of the federal workforce.

One of the obstacles to improving government performance, Johnson said, "is that every employee, from unsatisfactory to outstanding, gets the same annual raise. I think that is an insult to the outstanding employee, and I think that is a miscommunication or an unfair communication to the unsatisfactory employee."

Did Help Get Left Behind? (USNEWS)

By Elizabeth Weiss Green

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

The throw-up reports started not long after the law was passed: children getting sick before the test, during the test, even right onto the test. It was just one exceptional response to the passage of the federal No Child Left Behind Act. Behind the scenes, teachers, administrators, and state officials often fared worse, working late nights and weekends to create and grade the multiple tests the landmark law required.

Five years later, educators and lawmakers are asking whether the stomachaches caused by the legislation have been worth it. Over the next several weeks, congressional committees will hold hearings on the law as they try to decide before it expires whether to reauthorize the act as is, change it, or throw it out.

In some ways, the decision looks easy. Both leading Democrats and President George Bush say they are committed to keeping the law-one of only a few big domestic initiatives produced in the past five years. Further, the two sides appear unanimous on what aspects of the law need to be changed-a consensus that will inform a blueprint for reform scheduled for release this week by the bipartisan No Child Left Behind Commission.

But talk to the nine school districts that have filed a lawsuit challenging the act as an unfunded mandate or to the many newly elected U.S. representatives who campaigned against the law, and you will hear a different story. Every child may have been tested, the critics say, but the real question is: Has every child been helped?

The law was based on the idea that one thing would lead to the other. That's why it requires two tests a year in grades three through eight and one test in high school. And because the results are disaggregated by groups, the government learns not only how well a whole third grade scores; it also learns how the black, white, low-income, and disabled third graders score. If enough students in each group reach a certain level, the school is labeled "adequate." If they don't, the school is required to take remedial measures-consequences that get more serious with every year it fails to meet its goal.

Success stories. The result of all this testing is supposed to be improved performance. Ivan Small, the superintendent of schools in Poplar, Mont., tells one success story for that model. The law's requirement to break down test scores by poverty level, Small says, caused him to figure out why his low-income students were underperforming the higher-income ones. His findings, in turn, led him to replace old readers with a whole new literacy curriculum. It also changed the way he thought about homework. "There are multiple families living in a household of two or three bedrooms . ... Is there time or a place for homework?" The answer was often "No," so Small and his staff created an after-school study program.

Centennial Place Elementary School in Atlanta has also benefited from NCLB.The school had been collecting data even before the law was passed, but it had never separated out special education students. When it did, it found dramatic results. "We had a big gap," says Cynthia Kuhlman, the school's former principal. "Seeing that right there ... was a critical picture for us." The staff started giving these students extra help, reviewing their progress, and holding more parent conferences. As a result, proficiency levels rose from 41 to more than 80 percent.

Yet the success stories may omit a crucial point: Although both of these schools owe their gains to NCLB, the law got them only so far. It requires a diagnosis, but it does not prescribe a cure. Or at least it doesn't pay much for one.

No Child does call for consistently failing schools to address their problems, by allowing students to transfer to another public school, for instance, or providing free help to low-income students. But these requirements have hardly guaranteed improvement. In Poplar, all tutoring services are offered online, but few families have Internet access. As for the transfer option, there is no other place to go. Nationwide, only 17 percent of students eligible for tutoring took advantage of it in the 2003-04 school year, and less than 1 percent chose to transfer. In some cases, as with Poplar, there were no alternatives; in others, the districts failed to adequately inform families about their options.

Required reforms become stronger and more specific when a school fails four years in a row. But as substantial as hiring new staff and changing curricula may seem, the White House would go even further. Its proposal for reauthorization calls for more sweeping changes, like overriding state bans to establish charter schools or enabling all-out takeovers by elected officials.

Many more obstacles block the path from testing students to helping them, and at the top of the list is money. Like other turnaround schools, Centennial Place owes much of its success to outside resources: Even before No Child, members of the local community volunteered as tutors and built a YMCA whose gym the school shares. Coca-Cola donated $50,000 in new books for the school's media center. Elsewhere in the country, failing schools often have to fend for themselves.

There is confusion, too, over what constitutes a failing school in the first place. A Maryland superintendent just informed the staff at Annapolis High School that they will all have to reapply for their jobs next year because they failed to meet No Child standards for four years in a row. Yet the same school exceeded the world average for scores on International Baccalaureate exams. Why the failing grade? It hinged on the poor performance of a single subgroup.

Dozens more issues will fuel the debate over No Child in the months ahead, including how to improve teaching, how to make state standards more uniform, and how to test children with limited English abilities or special needs. A bigger question is whether Congress can avoid partisan bickering and actually fix the flaws in the law before the act expires. If the law remains as it is, it could mean no relief for schools at a time they need it most.

As of last year, less than 1 percent of schools-about 600-had entered the "restructuring" phase that comes after five years of failure. "But that will increase every year," says Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy. Not only are more schools testing; but as a 2014 deadline for 100 percent proficiency nears, they will face higher standards. "You can't just establish a goal and say, 'Y'all go at it,'" Jennings says. "We need to figure out ways to help schools and teachers do better, not just tell them that they've got problems."

A Fair Health Fix (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Not many expected George W. Bush to advance a serious healthcare proposal in his State of the Union address, and few expect anyone in Congress to act in response to it. But Bush did, and at least one member of Congress seems interested. More ought to be paying attention.

Bush's proposal in a nutshell is to end the preferential tax treatment for employer-provided health insurance. In 1943, in the midst of World War II, when wage and price controls were in effect, the government decided that employers could deduct the cost of health insurance for their employees and that employees would not be taxed on the value of the policies. This decision has saddled us with a system in which health insurance has been tied to employment, with many perverse results. Healthcare is perceived as a free good, and consumers have no incentive to take costs into account.

Bush proposes to change this by giving every couple paying taxes a standard $15,000 deduction ($7,500 for individuals) for the cost of health insurance. Those with employer-provided insurance worth more than $15,000 (about 20 percent of the total) would be taxed on the additional amount; this would very likely discourage expensive policies.

Penalizing the poor. As a Washington Post editorial on the speech pointed out, this would be a progressive change. The biggest beneficiaries of the current system are high earners with employer-provided insurance. The biggest losers in the current system are low earners without employer-provided insurance. Health insurance experts on the left, right, and center have long called for ending the tax code's preference for employer-provided health insurance. But employers haven't wanted to lose the deduction, and politicians have flinched at the prospect of taxing voters on something they have been getting tax free. Bush has found a way out, by equalizing the tax treatment of health insurance wherever it comes from.

Bush's point was not lost on Oregon's Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden, who over a long congressional career has specialized in assembling bipartisan coalitions for various reforms. He notes that government single-payer health insurance-the goal of some senior liberal Democrats in Congress-was rejected by the voters of his liberal state by a 4-to-1 margin. He notes that we don't have employer-provided auto insurance; we buy that out of after-tax earnings. He argues that people should be able to buy health insurance as members of Congress and federal employees do, from an array of choices offered by private insurers. He's looking to make something of a political deal. Republicans would get Bush's standard deduction and a private insurance market in which consumers would have incentives to hold down costs. In return, Democrats would get universal coverage, with subsidies for low earners to pay for coverage. As John Goodman of the free market National Center for Policy Analysis points out, additional revenues from those with policies worth more than $15,000 could be used to subsidize low earners.

Wyden has been talking with Republican senators, especially fellow members of the Finance Committee, and says he has been getting positive reactions. As for Democrats, those who seek more government provision of healthcare will probably be uninterested. But some may be affected by the apparent success of the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. Many Democrats believed that seniors would have a hard time choosing policies from an array of choices and that they would end up being gouged by private insurers. But polls indicate that the vast majority of seniors are pleased with the results, and the cost of premiums-and costs to the government-have come in lower than experts predicted. One of the prime lessons of the last third of the 20th century has been proved once again: Markets work.

And more quickly than government mandates: It took 38 years to get a prescription drug benefit in Medicare. In contrast, in the parts of the healthcare sector where market forces are free to work, technology improvements can result in lower costs, as with Lasik eye surgery or cosmetic surgery. Bush's proposal, or Wyden's version, would give markets more room. This kind of major reform is a long shot in this Congress. But it does show a way forward.

Passing The Buck On Health Care (NYT)

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

President Bush's new budget would extend the administration's warped priorities deep into the realm of federally supported health care programs. The administration long ago sacrificed any meaningful domestic agenda to finance tax cuts for the wealthy and its reckless war in Iraq. The White House's reckless determination to make the tax cuts permanent is now driving it to slash domestic spending in health and other vital programs.

Instead of trying to address the underlying problems of escalating health care costs, Mr. Bush's strategy is to cut services or shift more of the bill to states, health care providers and individuals.

In the Medicare program, which covers health care for Americans aged 65 and over, the administration would find most of its savings by slowing the annual increase in reimbursements for services, forcing hospitals and other providers to absorb the burden. Given Medicare's precarious financial straits, the package appears broadly acceptable.

The real outrage is that the administration has not proposed comparable reductions in the large overpayments — roughly 12 percent more per patient — made to private managed care plans that enroll Medicare beneficiaries. The budget would also phase out Medicare bad-debt payments, forcing hospitals to swallow beneficiaries' unpaid bills.

The budget also looks to save money by eliminating inflation indexing so that as incomes rise, so would the number of people required to pay higher premiums. Although this is a sneaky way to raise premiums, it is hard to argue with the notion that better-off beneficiaries should pay more to help rescue a financially strained program.

What seems counterproductive is Mr. Bush's plan to lower federal matching funds for Medicaid administration — forcing the states to find more of their own funds or sacrifice good management and oversight. More worrisome is his plan to cut back on state programs that insure the young.

The most shortsighted restrictions would come in the highly acclaimed State Children's Health Insurance Program, which uses federal matching funds to provide coverage for low- and moderate-income children who are not quite poor enough to qualify for Medicaid. The program has been enormously successful in reducing the number of uninsured children. Yet now the administration wants to reduce its matching rate and limit enrollment to children in households earning no more than twice the federal poverty level. That would undercut programs in 16 states that have expanded coverage to children above that level.

Although the administration's budget would grant the children's program a small $5 billion increase spread over five years, that's less than half, and possibly only a third, of the amount needed just to maintain current enrollments and participation rates. This is too high a price to pay for more tax cuts and Mr. Bush's ill-managed presidency.

Appalachia Redux (NYT)

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Forty-three years ago, President Lyndon Johnson stood on a ramshackle porch in a Kentucky coal hollow to take up the cause of Appalachia. An unusual quasigovernmental commission was created, embracing 410 impoverished counties in 13 states — a trench line in Johnson's war on poverty that swept from northern Mississippi to southern New York.

The Appalachian Regional Commission is still going strong. Over the decades the area's poverty rate has fallen by half and infant mortality by two-thirds. We cite this overlooked bit of hard-knocks progress not just to puncture the canard that government is always the problem, not the solution. (President Ronald Reagan tried and failed to abolish the commission.) But also to urge renewal of the commission's authority for its unfinished business.

As an innovative joint effort of local, state and federal government plus private business, the commission has leveraged aid and loans to develop 2,300 miles of new highways, bring water and sewer pipes to hundreds of thousands of households, and build hundreds of rural health care outposts and vocational education centers. Not all of the investments have been bull's-eyes. And there are areas where severe poverty reigns. But a five-year renewal is in order, particularly considering the returns reaped for a $90 million annual federal investment.

A renewal bill foundered last year when appropriators tried to weight its budget with pork. This year, a bill with a truer agenda is heading for the House floor, shepherded by Representative James Oberstar. He is a Democrat from Minnesota whose ties to Appalachia date back to his days as a young Congressional staff member who helped write the commission's founding legislation. "The structure's sound, the investments need to continue," the congressman properly insists, emboldened to claim government's role has not been half bad.

OTHER NEWS:

Time To Face The Music (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Ever worry where the next billion is coming from? Not if you're this spendthrift federal government, with a national debt of $8.7 trillion. Yes, President Bush is fond of pointing to the decline in the federal deficit over the past two years, but that's virtually irrelevant to the long term. How many of us realize, for instance, that Uncle Sam is spending almost four times as much on paying interest on borrowed money as on education, transportation, and NASA combined?

One person who knows-and it gives him plenty of sleepless nights-is Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. He tells us we are in "the calm before the storm" because Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid costs now amount to almost half of federal noninterest spending. President Bush has not increased taxes to pay for this expansion of Medicare; in fact, taxes have been cut-repeatedly. Hence, by 2030 the ratio of publicly held federal deficits to overall economic output is likely to triple, from roughly 37 percent today to a mind-boggling 100 percent. This will produce a terrible torque on our economy, since financing deficits means paying out still more in interest, adding still further to the deficit. Bernanke has a not-so-quaint term for this phenomenon. He calls it a "death spiral."

This looming financial crisis can be avoided if we start raising taxes, cutting spending, or both right now. But President Bush is a graduate of the have-your-cake-and-eat-it school and says the deficit can be eliminated in five years without a tax increase. He describes his tax cuts as the cause of the surging economy and the lower-than-predicted federal deficit. Is he right?

There is no doubt that the economy has been strong over the past five years. Our gross domestic product has been growing for a record 20 consecutive quarters. The blue-chip companies in the Standard & Poor's index racked up 18 straight quarters of 10 percent or greater increases in profits; consumers are spending more; unemployment is low, as is inflation; energy prices are plunging just in time to provide consumers with an additional jolt of discretionary income for a post-Christmas binge; hiring has been strong in the past few months, suggesting that wage gains will continue; and the softening of the housing market has had a surprisingly limited effect on the national economy.

Companies have responded to the boom by plowing billions of dollars into new factories, offices, equipment, and software, in an effort to expand operations and take advantage of growth opportunities at home and abroad. Given the continued strength in corporate profits and low-cost financing by the capital markets, financing for a whole range of new ventures is readily available, and companies are in an excellent position to borrow at a time when interest rates are still low and the rising trend in stock prices is a boost for equity financing. As a result, we are continuing to create jobs.

Bad math. The real concern in 2006 and maybe 2007 was whether the housing slump would drag down consumer spending and the economy. The concern was that if home prices fell, that would shrink the equity available for extraction through refinancing and put many properties into a negative equity position, forcing many households to cut spending. But the strength of the economy has greatly diminished this concern.

Samuelson: The Stubborn Welfare State (NSWK)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Spend a moment studying the small charts that appear on page 39 of this week's magazine that compares federal budget expenditures in 1956 and 2006. They illuminate why another of our annual budget battles—begun last week, when President Bush submitted his 2008 proposal—seems so fruitless and (yes) repetitious. Every year we hear complaints about accounting gimmicks and unrealistic assumptions. There's a ferocious cross-fire of charges and countercharges. Hardly anything ever gets resolved. Budgets almost always remain in deficit (41 out of 47 years since 1960).

The charts show the rise of the American welfare state. In 1956, defense dominated the budget; the cold-war buildup was in full swing. The welfare state, which is what "payments to individuals" signifies, was modest. Now everything's reversed. Despite the war in Iraq, defense spending is only a fifth of the budget; so-called entitlement payments to individuals are 60 percent—and rising. In fiscal 2006, the federal government spent almost $2.7 trillion. Social Security ($544 billion), Medicare ($374 billion) and Medicaid ($181 billion) dominated. There was $199 billion more for payments to the poor, including the earned income-tax credit and food stamps, among others.

Almost no one wants to slash these programs. They have huge constituencies; they're popular. Paradoxically, their invulnerability and size also protect much of the rest of the budget. Look again at the charts. After payments to individuals, defense spending and interest on the debt (which must be paid), only about a ninth of the budget remains. Many of these remaining programs are widely supported. Does anyone really want to end the National Institutes of Health at $28 billion? Or how about the $41 billion we spend to support federal courts, prosecutors and police (the FBI, DEA, border patrol)?

Of course, some programs are wasteful, ineffective or outmoded. My perennial favorite is Amtrak, which serves a tiny number of passengers, is concentrated in the Northeast and costs $1.3 billion annually. But politically, ending programs like this is hardly worth the trouble. The bad publicity of antagonizing aggrieved advocates—here, railroad buffs and maybe environmentalists—is too high for the small budget savings. In a nearly $3 trillion budget, even 10 Amtraks are a footnote.

The welfare state has made budgeting an exercise in futility. Both liberals and conservatives, in their own ways, peddle phony solutions. Cut waste, say conservatives. Well, network-TV reports of $20 million federal programs that don't work may seem—and be—scandalous, but like Amtrak, they're usually mere blips on the total budget. For its 2008 budget, the Bush administration brags it would end or sharply reduce 141 programs. But most are microscopic; total savings would be $12 billion, or 0.4 percent of spending. Worse, Congress has previously rejected some of these cuts.

Liberals have their own cures. Cut defense, some say. OK. In 2006, military spending (including the war in Iraq) totaled $520 billion, slightly less than Social Security. If it had been halved, the savings would have just covered the deficit ($248 billion). Little would be left for new programs. Raise taxes on the richest 1 percent, say some. OK. The richest 1 percent pay about a quarter of all federal taxes. In 2006, that was about $600 billion. To cover the deficit would require about a 40 percent tax increase. Needless to say, neither proposal is politically plausible.

Annual budget debates are sterile—long on rhetoric, short on action—because each side blames the other for a situation that neither chooses to change. To cut spending significantly, conservatives would have to go after popular welfare programs, including Social Security and Medicare. To raise taxes significantly, liberals would have to go after the upper-middle class, a constituency they covet (two thirds of all federal taxes come from the richest fifth). Deficits persist, because neither side risks its popularity, and indeed, both sides nurture it with new spending programs and tax breaks.

It might help if Americans called welfare programs—current benefits for select populations, paid for by current taxes—by their proper name, rather than by the soothing (and misleading) labels of "entitlements" and "social insurance." That way, we might ask ourselves who deserves welfare and why. We could consider all of federal spending and not just small bits of it. But most Americans don't want to admit that they're current or prospective welfare recipients. They prefer to think that they automatically deserve whatever they've been promised simply because they've been promised. They do not want to pose the basic questions, and their political leaders mirror that reluctance. This makes the welfare state immovable and the budget situation intractable.

Saudi Oil Minister Says Market Is Balanced, Requires No Changes (WSJ)

By Karen Elliott House

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- The world oil market is in "much, much better health and balance" now and, if trends hold, there will be no need for further production cuts or increases in supply when members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries meet next month, Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ali Naimi said yesterday.

In an interview, Mr. Naimi said the kingdom's production is now 8.5 million to 8.6 million barrels a day, confirming its reduction by one million barrels a day from its output about six months ago.

The reduction is part of a push by OPEC to shrink stockpiles of oil that climbed sharply last year as demand growth stumbled. The U.S. benchmark crude price fell through the turn of the year to a 20-month low in mid-January of $49.90 a barrel. It has since rebounded to settle Friday at $59.89 a barrel.

Mostly mild winter weather, heavy selling by financial funds and falling oil use among developed nations have contributed to prices dropping from the record $77.03 a barrel settlement price last summer.

OPEC, whose members supply about 40% of the world's oil, is to meet March 15 in Vienna to assess its production policy.

"If you are asking me are we going to take additional cuts or increase supply, I do not know," said Mr. Naimi, the oil cartel's de facto leader. "But, most probably if the trend is like what it is like today, with the market getting in much, much better health and balance, there may not be any reason to change." He added that the situation can still change: "I would not be surprised to see different figures and a different situation on the 15th of March. That is the benefit of getting together with 12 other oil ministers to review the data."

Saudi Arabia's one-million-barrel-a-day reduction, reported in The Wall Street Journal last month, is nearly double what it agreed to under two OPEC output cuts hammered out by the cartel at meetings in Doha, Qatar, in October and in Abuja, Nigeria, in December.

Asked about his plans and rumors he may want to retire, Mr. Naimi hinted that he would like to stay on in his role when King Abdullah undertakes his first major cabinet shuffle soon. The king is said to be planning the shuffle to inject new blood into his 20-member cabinet.

"Ministers normally do not retire," the 71-year-old Mr. Naimi said. "Ministers are appointed by the king and relieved by the king, unless there is serious medical reason, and as you can see, I am fairly fit and in good shape.

"There are still many challenges ahead of us," he added. He serves at the disposal of the king and "anything else has no basis."

Mr. Naimi said that beginning in May 2004, the kingdom "went almost all out" to produce 9.5 million barrels a day to satisfy rising demand. "We kept that level until August/September last year," he said. When the kingdom saw demand slacken in the summer of 2006, it voluntarily cut production by 450,000 to 500,000 barrels a day and then by another 400,000 to 500,000 barrels a day in concert with OPEC. "So you can say one million barrels was taken off the market," he said, "but gradually."

The drop in oil prices from last summer's highs and a surge in interest in rival forms of energy haven't forced the kingdom, the world's largest crude exporter, to rethink its investment plans.

"From what we see, the world will need what Saudi Arabia produces," Mr. Naimi said. Therefore, the kingdom will proceed with its plan to increase capacity by the end of 2009 to 12.5 million barrels a day from 11.3 million barrels.

"There is no question demand will be there in 2009," he said. "There is no reason to think otherwise."

President Bush declared in January a more-than-fivefold increase in target levels for renewable-fuel production, to 35 billion gallons annually by 2017.

"Alternatives will be needed over the next 30 years," Mr. Naimi acknowledged. The world, he added, will need every unit of energy "it can generate, whether from alternatives, conservation or greater efficiency." Still, he said, "it is a global market, so what one country does isn't really relevant."

Among the reasons world leaders cite to diversify their energy sources is mounting concern over the future reliability of the world's oil and natural-gas suppliers -- those in the Middle East, Russia and Venezuela, to name but three.

Mr. Naimi responded that the major threat to oil stability is "all these outside influences, strikes, tension, geopolitical events." But one has to keep it all in perspective. "We have had a lot of tension, many wars and the flow of oil has not been interrupted. There is a determination to keep the flow of oil uninterrupted," he said.

He conceded that terrorist threats pose a serious challenge. "Security in the kingdom against terrorism is very, very high," he said. "But you can never have enough security, enough protection, because you are dealing with a threat that is very, very well organized and erratic. It can happen anytime." Mr. Naimi, who has served as minister of petroleum and minerals in the world's most important oil-exporting nation for nearly a dozen years, met yesterday with Russian oil-company heads in advance of the visit by Russian President Vladimir Putin, who was to arrive later in the day."When the two biggest producers and exporters of oil meet, energy will be a subject -- but not the subject," Mr. Naimi said.

Mr. Putin's visit is the first by a Russian leader to the kingdom since its founding. Even though the Soviet Union was the first nation to recognize parts of what eventually became the kingdom, its leaders were never welcome here during the communist rule because the leadership of Saudi Arabia, a religious nation, didn't approve of Moscow's policies or principles as a country that was antireligion.

The distaste for the Soviet Union was particularly high after the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in l979, prompting many deeply religious young Saudis to join the Afghan resistance and creating some of the radical Saudi jihadists that threaten the kingdom today.

A Deadline May Be Extended For Claims In Holocaust Case (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Survivors of the Holocaust and their relatives, who have been fighting to compel European insurance companies to pay death benefits for victims of the Nazis, are getting a break from a big Italian insurance company, lawyers for the insurer and policyholders said yesterday.

As part of a proposed class-action settlement, the company, Assicurazoni Generali, has agreed to give heirs of Holocaust victims another 18 months to uncover documentation on unpaid life insurance policies at long-sealed Nazi archives in Bad Arolsen, Germany.

Representatives of several countries, including the United States, have been pushing to open the archives since May.

“This adds another motivation and a very concrete one to get the archives opened right now,” Paul Shapiro, an executive of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, said of the deadline extension.

Staff technicians at the archives are meeting today to discuss progress on scanning more than 50 million pages of Nazi and Allied records of the period. The documents include reports on the arrest and transfer of millions of people to concentration camps as well as on hundreds of thousands of deaths.

A meeting of representatives of the United States and 10 other countries that control the archives has been called for March. Those countries have kept the archives sealed for 62 years, mainly for privacy reasons.

The deadline extension came at the behest of a United States judge in Manhattan who is conducting hearings on the fairness of a settlement reached by Generali and class-action lawyers last fall.

The concession by Generali suggested a desire to close a long, painful chapter in which the company has been persistently accused of abusing the trust of Jewish policyholders. Generali has insisted that it was never a company policy to reject any valid claim or require survivors of Holocaust victims to produce death certificates and copies of policies in order to collect benefits.

At the same time, it has refused to give survivors access to its Holocaust-era records or to publish full lists of policyholders from that period that might help relatives in filing claims.

Yet for Generali, the accommodation on the German archives may not have been a major concession. Lawyers for Generali said there was little chance that useful insurance data would be found among the documents. Holocaust specialists say they do not know what is in the documents, but Mr. Shapiro said the heirs of victims “should have the right to explore every possibility.”

The issue of the archives, among the most extensive and varied ever compiled, was raised at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan on Jan. 31 by Samuel Dubbin, a Miami lawyer who opposes the settlement on several grounds, including that potential payments to policyholders are inadequate and that the settlement has not been sufficiently publicized to ensure full participation. Mr. Dubbin represents a separate group of heirs not taking part in the class action.

Judge George B. Daniels, who gave preliminary approval of the agreement in October, had called the hearing to listen to objections and determine, finally, whether the deal was fair and reasonable.

After listening to Mr. Dubbin argue for delaying the settlement and interrupting frequently with questions, Judge Daniels halted the hearing and called the lawyers who drafted the agreement into his chambers.

After a discussion, he returned to the bench and, without explanation, abruptly adjourned the hearing.

Court papers filed on Friday in Federal District Court in Manhattan suggested that the judge had urged that the agreement be modified so that material from the archive could be considered.

In the filing, the insurance company said that "out of respect to Generali's former insureds or beneficiaries who may have been Holocaust victims, and their heirs, Generali wishes to provide reasonable additional time" for considering material from the archives.

The agreement opens a window of 18 months. If the archives open by January 2008, survivors will have six months to file new claims. After that, the period for filing claims shrinks each month until Aug. 31, 2008, when no more claims will be considered. Before the change, the deadline for claims had been March 31, 2007.

On Thursday, lawyers on both sides outlined the changes to Judge Daniels, who issued an order to resume the hearing on Feb. 27.

Robert A. Swift, one of the class-action lawyers, referred to the extension of time as "a good-faith effort to try to bridge a concern."

Mr. Dubbin said he thought the change improved the agreement, but that it left "many problems unresolved." He said he would continue to oppose the settlement and, separately planned to continue appealing an earlier decision by a federal judge to dismiss the Holocaust insurance claims on several grounds.

"We want a full opportunity to review Generali's records," he said, "and a jury trial if necessary. If we win, we certainly think we'll get more money than my clients are being offered now."

The Right Man (NYM)

By John Heilemann

New York Magazine, February 12, 2007

Wllard Mitt Romney enters the press room at the Baltimore Marriott Waterfront, where a conclave of conservative GOP congressmen has gathered to plot its resurrection. Assuming his place before the cameras, the former Massachusetts governor checks the floor to find his mark: two strips of white tape forming a small X on the low-pile carpet beneath his feet. Romney plants his shoes squarely on the X and starts offering answers so tightly scripted and robotic that he brings to mind Max Headroom—then, all of a sudden, he's distracted and off-kilter. "This white spot on the floor here, this marker, is stuck to my heel here," he mutters, staring downward and doing a little jig, ignoring the question just put to him (on Iran) until the damn thing finally falls from his loafer.

The metaphor suggested by Romney's performance is too perfect to resist. By all accounts, including his own, Romney has been for most of his life a middle-of-the-road Republican of moderate views on issues from abortion to gun control to taxes. But ever since he decided to run for president—a decision he will make official on February 13—he has labored to present himself as a rock-ribbed man of the right. He has hired a team of White Tape People to tell him where he needs to stand to win his party's nomination. He has gamely hit his marks. And yet now, just as Romney seemed to be establishing a foothold, he finds himself increasingly tangled up in his own inconvenient record.

The conspicuous and occasionally ruinous flip-floppery of presidential candidates is nothing new, of course. (See Kerry, John, 2004.) Nor is avid pandering to the GOP's extremist constituencies by previously non-wing-nut Republicans. (See McCain, John, 2008.) Romney's offenses in both these categories are, no doubt, egregious. But the fact that, in spite of his current struggles, Romney is still taken seriously illustrates a number of the central dynamics driving the campaign on the Republican side. At a moment when the Democrats, miraculously, have at hand a troika of top-tier candidates—Clinton, Obama, Edwards—who are capable of drawing thousands-strong crowds (in early 2007, for heaven's sake) and look like eminently credible winners, the GOP is saddled with a crop of hopefuls at once uninspiring and implausible. Also with a president who seems determined to dig the already-cavernous hole in which the party is mired all the way to China. As Republican despond edges toward despair, the desperate search for a savior is beginning to kick into high gear. Hence the rise of Romney.

At first glance, he has the appearance of an attractive standard-bearer. A successful businessman (he made a fortune as the CEO of Bain & Company and founder of Bain Capital) and organizer of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics before becoming the Bay State's governor, in office he pushed for the passage of a health-care reform plan applauded on both the right and the left. He's well spoken and great-looking, with blindingly white teeth and a head of hair that rivals Ronald Reagan's in the annals of Republican follicular achievement.

But Romney's drawbacks are as glaring as his assets—starting with his Mormonism. "Look, let's be honest, Mormons are weird," says a former Democratic gubernatorial candidate from Massachusetts, voicing a view widely shared by secularists and Evangelicals alike. (According to a recent poll, only 38 percent of voters say they'd definitely consider backing a Mormon for president.) Romney, a church "elder" who served as a missionary and whose great-grandfather had five wives, will surely attempt to deal with the issue by pulling a JFK: declaring that his faith would never impinge on his political obligations. Equally likely is that he'll abandon lame-ass humor as a tactic, given that his japes in the past—"I believe that marriage should be between a man and a woman … and a woman … and a woman," he cracked to Don Imus last year—seem, unsurprisingly, to have put no one's mind at ease.

At the moment, however, Romney's religion is causing him fewer headaches than his policy gymnasticism. As a challenger to Ted Kennedy in 1994 and in his 2002 statehouse bid, Romney was unequivocally pro-choice ("I believe that abortion should be safe and legal"). Today, he is just as unequivocally pro-life. On gun control, Romney in 1994 supported the Brady bill and a ban on assault weapons, adding, "I don't line up with the NRA." Today, he declares, "I'm a member of the NRA." On gay rights, in 1994 and 2002, Romney argued that he'd be a more aggressive advocate of domestic partnerships than his Democratic foes—and then did little, in the view of the right, to resist the legalization of gay marriage in his state. Today, Romney thunders against the latter concept and against civil unions too. Same story on stem-cell research.

The Right Man

Bad as all this reads on paper, it's even worse on video. And here Romney has run smack up against one of the defining realities of the 2008 campaign: YouTube, where clips of the old Romney stating his liberalish social views with apparently firm conviction have been on display for weeks. "Words on a page have an intellectual impact," says Californian Republican media strategist Dan Schnur, "but words captured on video have much more emotional impact." A print gotcha, in other words, makes a candidate look inconsistent or craven. A YouTube gotcha makes him look as if his pants are a towering inferno.

Romney doesn't need to be loved by the right. "He just needs to be the tallest jockey at the track," says a consultant.

Thus is Romney scrambling around the country, meeting with the hard-right brigades, offering deeply—deeply!—felt reassurances that he is really—really!—one of them. These reassurances take the form of a narrative, in which Romney, while grappling with the stem-cell question, meets with researchers and experiences a road-to-Damascus conversion. "I concluded that we should be wary of people who experiment with life, who experiment with our kids, and who toy with the building blocks of family and society," he said in Baltimore. "On the issue of life, this fiscal conservative became a social conservative."

How convincing is he about all this? To my mind, not very. God knows any half-sane columnist will defend to the death the right to change one's mind. Yet the timing of Romney's policy U-turns—at precisely the moment when he first got that I'm-a-gonna-run-for-president gleam in his eye—inevitably raises suspicions. What can you say about a guy who used to maintain that his role model was his father, former moderate Michigan governor George Romney, but now leaves his dad conspicuously off the list of his political heroes, instead citing Reagan, Teddy Roosevelt, and Dwight D. Eisenhower?

Needless to say, what matters isn't what people like me might say but whether Republicans find Romney's account of his switcheroos persuasive. And here the news is no less grim for Mitt. According to the latest Fox News poll, Romney's support among Republicans nationally fell from 8 percent in December to just 3 percent at the end of January. To a large extent, Romney's desultory numbers reflect low name recognition. But that they're trending down instead of up should be, must be, freaking him out, even at this early stage.

In truth, the emergence of Romney as a top-tier candidate in the eyes of political insiders has had less to do with his strengths than with the staggering weakness of the Republican field. Until last fall, the putative front-runners for the support of the GOP's Establishment conservative faction were senators George Allen and Bill Frist. But Frist was laid low by his joined-at-the-hipness to George W. Bush, while Allen consigned himself to the ash can of history by losing to Jim Webb in Virginia. Giuliani and McCain, despite their dogged efforts to assuage the right, continue to be viewed warily there—the former for his own social liberalism, the latter for his manifold betrayals to the cause eight years ago. And though Christianist wannabes such as Kansas senator Sam Brownback appeal to the GOP fringes, their obvious unelectability dooms them from the get-go.

The case for Romney's viability, therefore, boils down to this: He's the minimally acceptable man to the right who has a chance of winning. "Social conservatives rarely get their first choice, but they have veto power," says Schnur, McCain's communications director in 2000. "Romney doesn't need to be their best friend; he just needs to be better than McCain or Giuliani. He needs to be the tallest jockey at the track."

Can Romney be the Willie Shoemaker of presidential politics? Maybe so—but the more likely outcome, it seems to me, is that he'll be the Pete Wilson of 2008. Back in 1995, recall, Wilson was the au courant Republican governor (of California) who was going to sweep into the presidential race and vanquish all before him. Like Romney, Wilson hailed from a state with a history of spawning presidential nominees. Like Romney, he had access to big money and a record of policy innovation. And, like Romney, he was a moderate whose drift to the right (on immigration) seemed utterly inauthentic. Wilson exited the race before the first primary vote was cast.

A fair observer would point out that that parallel is by no means perfect. Romney has assembled an A-list campaign team with tons of national experience; Wilson didn't. And, unlike Romney, Wilson refused to yield to, er, modify his pro-choice stance. Even so, the central similarity is undeniable—and so are its implications. The real problem for Romney, as it was for Wilson, is not that he's a cultist or a contortionist but that he's a hollow man. And there's nothing that the White Tape People will be able to do about that.

Obama Blasts War In Iraq In Ames Speech (MCGG)

By Charlotte Eby

Mason City Globe Gazette, February 12, 2007

AMES — A day after jumping into the presidential race, Democrat Barack Obama began the courting of Iowa party activists Sunday with a blistering critique of the war in Iraq.

More than 6,000 people who came to hear him at the Iowa State University campus saved their biggest cheers for his criticism of the war.

"We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted," Obama said.

The first-term U.S. senator from Illinois has pushed for a goal of removing all combat brigades from Iraq by March 2008, with a limited number of troops remaining in the country for basic protection and counter-terrorism efforts.

Both his main rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards, voted in favor of authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq.

In an interview with Lee Enterprises, Obama predicted the war in Iraq will dominate American politics for some time to come and wants the discussion to include creating a broader foreign policy framework.

"We've still got young men and women dying over there, and that means it's still going to be a pressing issue," Obama said.

On Sunday, two state officials, Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald, threw their support behind the senator's campaign and joined him on stage at the Ames rally.

At the podium, Fitzgerald called Obama a "good and decent man" and praised his judgment for being against the war in Iraq.

"He's the only candidate out there that was against this crazy war from the get-go," Fitzgerald said to cheers.

Obama's best-selling memoir, "The Audacity of Hope," served as a call for civility in politics and a rejection of cynicism.

But Obama recounted a meeting this weekend with Iowa college student leaders who told him their friends don't want to be involved in politics because the image they have is "these hacks who are saying mean things about people, bickering all the time."

Obama said the challenge will be making politics "fun and interesting again."

He pointed to the civil rights movement and the Vietnam War as issues where young people had a voice.

"I think lifting up those examples of where participation has led to positive change is absolutely critical," he said.

Obama said he's trying to translate anger from voters into hope for a positive future. He said last's year's election was a rejection of the Republican agenda. But he said Democrats still have not won over a consensus of the country that would allow them to lead forcefully.

"That's, I think, the job of the next presidential candidate, and our next president," Obama said.

Although Obama draws crowds of thousands for his appearances, he said he doesn't expect it will affect his ability to do the sort of retail politicking in coffee shops and living rooms that is central to an Iowa caucus campaign.

"At some point, folks will get tired of me because I will have been here so much," Obama said, chuckling. "And so you won't end up having as big crowds. They'll say, 'Oh, it's Obama again, he was just here last week.' "

He expects over time he will be able to meet with Iowans one on one where he can find out what their concerns are and "look 'em in the eye and ask them to caucus for us."

When asked what his strategy will be if he loses the Iowa caucuses, Obama predicted he would emerge victorious.

"I don't intend plan to lose Iowa so I don't even have to consider what's next. We are confident that if we do what we need to do and work hard here that we'll do just fine," Obama said.

DOJ_NMG_0130226

Patti Boone, an ISU employee from Madrid, approved of Obama's message that the country needs to extract itself from the war in Iraq.

"It's too long. We need to get out," she said.

She is convinced she will support Obama in the Iowa caucuses next January.

"I chose him a year and a half ago," she said.

Tens Of Thousands Turn Out To See Obama (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Soon enough the novelty will end, says Barack Obama. But not now. Not this weekend.

Over two days, tens of thousands of people turned out across Illinois and Iowa to see the freshly declared White House hopeful, spilling over city blocks and filling gymnasiums rafter-high with their red, white and blue posters, lusty cheers and wide-eyed fervor.

They came to see history, many said, to launch the journey of the most formidable black presidential candidate the nation has witnessed. They shouted their affection and cheered the Democrat's call for a new style of politics -- bigger, bolder and more audacious, to borrow from the title of his best-selling autobiography, than Americans have seen in a long while.

But, truth be told, there was little that was really new or different about the issues Obama raised in his maiden swing as a formal presidential candidate.

Washington gridlock. Poison politics. Overweening special interests. Poverty, poor schools and an exorbitantly expensive health-care system. Candidates cluck over them every presidential election.

Obama offered little in the way of concrete solutions. And most of the proposals he did throw out, such as harnessing technology to bring greater efficiencies to the health-care system, were hardly novel.

"Every campaign evolves," said David Axelrod, chief strategist of the Obama campaign. "Of course we'll address specific issues in detail along the way."

But, he went on, "This thing is not going to turn on whether his 10-point plan is better than someone else's 10-point plan." Rather, the presidential contest will be about leadership and the ability to inspire and motivate -- demonstrated, Axelrod said, by the ability "to get 7,000 people to come out to an arena in Ames, Iowa" nearly a year before the first vote of the 2008 campaign.

That may be so. But that did not prevent Obama from repeatedly emphasizing his stance on the war in Iraq, which promises to dominate the early discussion in the Democratic primary just as it did four years ago.

At each stop, Obama noted that he was against the war from the start, a distinction he drew with his chief rivals, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who initially backed the war before turning against it. Both claim they were misled. Obama told reporters Sunday his early opposition "indicates that even at the time it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out."

(Obama was forced to issue a clarification later Sunday after referring during an Iowa State rally to the "wasted" lives of more 3,000 U.S. troops killed in Iraq. "I was upset with myself," Obama said. "The sacrifices they are making are unbelievable. I meant to say that those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy and diplomacy needed to be successful in Iraq.")

On Saturday night, in Waterloo, Iowa, Obama urged voters to demand of each candidate: "What is your plan? It's not enough to simply say, 'I'm going to end the war.' You've got to suggest how you're going to end the war."

Obama has called for a withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of March 2008. Asked at a Sunday news conference where he differs with Clinton, Obama acknowledged her opposition to the war but added, "I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way."

A Clinton spokesman, Howard Wolfson, responded by calling the senator "a forceful critic of the Iraq war" who supports a phased redeployment of troops and opposes President Bush's plan to send additional forces. "Had she been president in October of 2002, she would not have started this war and if Congress doesn't end this war by January of 2009, as president, she will," Wolfson said.

As a candidate making his first run for national office, Obama is clearly a work in progress.

During his 20-minute news conference he effectively took a clean-campaign pledge.

He also showed some peevishness over the mostly friendly news coverage he has enjoyed, suggesting that portrayals of him as more dazzle than substance ignore a large body of speeches and other illuminating works that spell out his stance on issues and personal history in exhaustive detail. "You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit," he chided.

DOJ_NMG_0130227

A day earlier, in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, the audience groaned when it was time for the candidate to go. That's when Obama told them the novelty soon would wear off and he would be back again and again until the crowds thinned and people tired of seeing him.

But not yet.

Obama Questions Rivals On Iraq (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 11 -- Sen. Barack Obama, circling through Iowa on Sunday before returning here on Day 2 of his presidential launch, challenged his Democratic rivals to lay out specifics for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq and declared that the thousands of lives lost so far in the war had been "wasted."

The senator from Illinois later said he regretted his choice of words, telling an interviewer that he meant the troops' sacrifices "have not been honored" by an adequate policy.

But Obama indicated in his earliest steps on the campaign trail that he considers Iraq a central distinction between himself and the rest of the Democratic field.

Obama opposed invading Iraq from the outset and has proposed a deadline of March 31, 2008, for removing troops from the country. He called Sunday for other candidates to explain their exit strategies. In particular, he said, he did not see an explicit blueprint for redeployment from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the early Democratic front-runner.

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," he told reporters before a boisterous rally at Iowa State University. "I know that she has stated that she thinks that the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

In his speech at the university, Obama issued an indictment of how Washington dealt with Iraq:

"We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged -- and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted."

He backtracked in an interview with the Des Moines Register, saying: "I was actually upset with myself. Their sacrifices are never wasted; that was sort of a slip of the tongue as I was speaking.

"The sacrifices they have made are unbelievable. What I meant to say was those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy, diplomacy and honesty on the part of civilian leadership," he added.

Two days in, Obama's campaign already had the feel of a candidacy in full swing. Thousands of Iowans filled an auditorium in Ames on Sunday morning to catch a glimpse of the now-official candidate.

On Saturday, after announcing his candidacy in the Illinois capital of Springfield, Obama drew sizable and enthusiastic crowds at town-hall meetings in Cedar Rapids and Waterloo. Thousands more greeted him upon his arrival back in Chicago, his adopted home town, for a rally on Sunday night.

He took on a relatively serious tone for much of his first days on the campaign trail. He gave lengthy and substantive answers to policy questions from audience members, at times bringing crowds to a hush as he laid out his political philosophy.

His more subdued approach came as a surprise to some in the audiences along the way. "I think a lot of people realize there's been a lot of rock star-ness about him up to now," said Grant Sovern, an immigration lawyer from Madison, Wis., who came to see Obama speak in Cedar Rapids on Saturday. "I think you can see he's trying to bring things down and talk about issues more."

But, Sovern said, it was the rousing part of Obama's speech, toward the end that afternoon, that he expected would carry the candidate forward.

"I hope that the excitement he showed at the end -- that's what a lot of people are looking for," Sovern said.

That spirit came out in force when Obama returned to Chicago. He brought a crowd to its feet at the University of Illinois at Chicago with calls for higher salaries for teachers, help with college tuition, a movement to eradicate special interests' influence over government, and a universal health-care system.

He talked over Iraq war protesters who interrupted his speech with chants for immediate withdrawal of the troops. "We're on the same side," he chided. "Come on, guys."

"I'm proud of the fact that I was against the war from the start," he said minutes later, drawing a rousing response from the audience as he called the war a "tragic mistake."

Clinton has refused to characterize her vote authorizing the war as a mistake, an opening that Obama appears intent on using to his advantage. Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton, did not directly respond Sunday to Obama's comments about her plans on Iraq but described her as a "forceful critic" of the administration's execution of the war.

"She has supported a phased redeployment of our troops to start bringing them home and has strongly opposed President Bush's escalation of the war by proposing a cap on troops," Wolfson said.

When he was first available to the media, on Sunday, Obama faced a crush of reporters and cameras. He calmly answered questions about the war in Iraq ("We are not more safe as a consequence of it," he began); his hiring of opposition researchers (to answer potential attacks and draw distinctions on the candidates' records, he said); and whether he is still smoking ("No -- I've been chewing Nicorette all day long," he said).

Perhaps the most memorable moment came when he needled the press corps about an emerging story line on his candidacy.

"I know that one of the running threads, one of the narratives that has established itself among the mainstream media, is this notion, 'Well, you know, Obama has pretty good style, he can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance,' " Obama said. "Now factually, that's incorrect."

He said his two best-selling books, each of which has sold nearly a million copies, "probably give people more insight into how I think and how I feel about issues facing America than any candidate in the field and probably any candidate who's run for office in recent memory."

He continued: "The problem is not that the information's not out there. The problem is that that's not what you guys have been reporting on. You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit." He was referring to a People magazine photograph of him while vacationing in Hawaii several weeks ago.

Obama Homecoming Turns Into Anti-war Rally (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And John Mccormick

Chicago Tribune, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- A homecoming for Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) turned into an anti-war rally Sunday evening, as he returned to his home city following the weekend launch of his candidacy for president to find a crowd of 7,300 troubled over the Iraq war.

Obama had already spent much of the day talking tough about Iraq, critiquing the war positions of other Democratic candidates for president and serving up a sharp retort to a foreign leader who had publicly mocked Obama's own plan for withdrawing troops.

Then a vocal crowd of anti-war protesters quickly made the issue the central focus of Obama's evening rally at the University of Illinois at Chicago Pavilion, holding up a sign that read "Cut the Funding" during his address and chanting loudly as he tried to speak.

"I'm glad they were there," Obama said later. "They feel a sense of urgency about a war that should have never been authorized and a war that should have never been fought."

But he said he doesn't want to cut funding for the military personnel who are already serving in Iraq, saying that could mean they don't get the equipment they need.

"We need to bring this war to an end," he said, "but we need to do it in a way that makes our troops safe."

The rally was the last public event on Obama's weekend tour, which began with his official announcement that he would seek the presidency and continued with a tour of Iowa through Sunday afternoon.

But the day-long discussion of the war ultimately was overtaken by political reality, as Obama--now under the gun to catch up with the political fundraising of other leading candidates--left the rally to attend a downtown fundraiser hosted for him by Chicago billionaire Penny Pritzker.

"I need your money. I need your time. I need your energy," Obama told more than 700 donors gathered at the Hyatt Regency Chicago on East Wacker Drive, where they sampled sandwich meat and fruit, in exchange for checks or credit card payments of up to $2,300.

Throughout the weekend, Obama talked to every crowd he addressed about the need to end the war, a roundly popular assertion at every venue where he spoke.

But in talking with reporters over the noon hour on Sunday, Obama talked pointedly for the first time about Sen. Hillary Clinton's position on the war, by many assessments the New York senator's weakest spot in the primary race.

Obama said that he was "not clear" on how Clinton would end the war, which she says she wishes to do.

He also pointed out that he was against the war from the beginning, and said he thought it was possible at the time to tell that the military action "would not work out well." Both Clinton and Democratic candidate John Edwards voted in 2002 to authorize the war, a position that each is now working to finesse with Democratic voters.

DOJ_NMG_0130229

In the same question-and-answer session with reporters, Obama had harsh words for Australian Prime Minister John Howard, who said that Obama's proposal to withdraw combat troops by March of 2008 would "just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq."

Obama said that Australia had sent only 1,400 troops to join the effort in Iraq, a fraction of the 140,000 American troops now serving there.

"I would suggest that he call up another 20,000 Australians and send them to Iraq," Obama said. "Otherwise, it's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

At the rally that night, Obama greeted thousands of supporters with his wife, Michelle, at his side, addressing them from a theater-in-the-round-style stage and reiterating the ideas of his announcement speech.

He hadn't yet gotten to his points about the Iraq war when the protesters began to chant "Troops out now!" prompting Obama to stop his talk and try to engage them.

"I hear you," he said. "We'll talk about that in a second. ... You've made your point, so why don't you relax?"

But the protesters continued to chant, and the rest of the crowd began to drown them out with deafening chants of "O-ba-ma!" Someone grabbed the sign from the protesters' hands--the protesters said later that security officers did so--and they left.

"They kicked us out," said Ryan Donnelly, a UIC student who participated in the protest with about 20 other students.

Obama's message was popular with the crowd. Heather Lewis, 20, a DePaul psychology student, had used black, red and blue markers to create an Obama logo on her white tank top.

Sharon Olsen, a postal carrier from Warrenville, declared, "I believe he is the future of politics for the United States. He has the ability to work with both sides of the aisle, and we need a change."

Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) compared Obama to Harold Washington, who was elected Chicago's first black mayor in 1983. "He brought excitement to the air, just like Obama," he said.

Others said they liked Obama even if they aren't yet completely won over.

"I think he handled the war piece very well," said Dwight McKee, a trade association director from Chicago. "I'm sold on the need for Obama right now more than I'm sold on Obama."

The evening fundraiser attracted top Illinois Democrats, including state Comptroller Dan Hynes and Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan. Actor Dennis Hopper also attended.

David Keyt, a health and benefits consultant from Chicago, attended the fundraiser and wrote a check for $1,000 to cover attendance for himself and his wife. He said he was originally backing Clinton but is warming to Obama.

"He represents something new, fresh and not tied to the history of Washington," he said as he arrived for the evening event at the Hyatt. "But we are still learning about him and reading his books."

Obama Comes Out Swinging In Iowa (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa — At the final stop of his first campaign trip to Iowa, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama invited a cheering crowd Sunday to help him "take this country back."

"Ultimately I am an imperfect vessel for your hopes and dreams," Obama told several thousand people at Iowa State University's basketball arena. "I can't do this alone. I'm going to need all of you, and I hope that you guys decide it's something that's worth doing."

Obama, 45, a Democrat who has been in the U.S. Senate for two years, would be the first African-American president if elected. He announced his candidacy Saturday at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., and made four stops this weekend in Iowa, which holds the nation's first presidential caucuses. He campaigns today in New Hampshire, host of the first presidential primary.

During a news conference here, Obama criticized New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's record on Iraq and health care, underscoring the intensity of the campaign with the first votes almost a year away. Clinton leads the Democratic field in most polls.

Obama opposed the war with Iraq in 2002, when Clinton and 28 other Democrats in the Senate voted to authorize it. She has since said that President Bush misused Congress' support but has not said her vote was a mistake.

"Even at the time, it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well," Obama said, referring to Clinton and others.

DOJ_NMG_0130230

Without naming Clinton, he also referred to her leading role in failed efforts to reform health care during her husband's administration. Since then, he said, Congress has been willing only to "tinker around the edges" of the issue.

Obama also was the target of some critics. His frequent invocations of Abraham Lincoln, his political hero, prompted likely Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani to note Saturday, "We're the party of Abraham Lincoln."

Australian Prime Minister John Howard said Sunday that Obama's plan to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by March 2008 would "create chaos and a victory for the terrorists." Obama replied, "It's flattering that one of George Bush's allies on the other side of the world started to attack me the day after I announced." Unless Howard sends 20,000 troops to join the 1,400 Australians now serving in Iraq, Obama said, "It's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

Obama also chided reporters for stories that he said suggest he "can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance."

Noting his speeches, two best-selling books and Iraq proposal, Obama said, "The problem is not that the information is not out there. The problem is that that's not what you guys have been reporting on. You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit."

Last month, People magazine published a photo of Obama in swimming trunks during a Hawaiian vacation.

Obama's audience here was filled with supporters such as Jeff Edmonson, 20, an Iowa State student who says he's been a fan since Obama was elected to the Senate in 2004.

"He's someone that will bring change: less corruption, more excitement," Edmonson said.

Seven blocks away at a Hy-Vee grocery store, though, 11 of 12 people asked about Obama said they need to know more before deciding whether to vote for him.

"I have a favorable impression of him, but we're being forced to focus on the race way too soon," said Bruce Workman, 50, a Burlington firefighter. "I don't know what he stands for," said student Coda Skeffington-Vos, 20.

"All I know is that he's a two-year senator from Illinois, he's young, and I like what he has to say about things," said Bill Morrison, 44, a carpenter from Ames. "There's a lot of things that need to get figured out, and it's early yet."

Obama Turns To Lincoln And Heats Up Illinois (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Springfield, Illinois

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

On a rainy day in February 1861, hundreds of people gathered at the Great Western Railway depot in Springfield, Illinois, to bid farewell to Abraham Lincoln, the city's most famous son, when he boarded a train to Washington to take office as US president.

Almost 146 years to the day later, Springfield witnessed the start of another political journey when Barack Obama, the junior Democratic senator for Illinois, launched his bid for the presidency outside the city's Old State Capitol building.

While Lincoln was heading directly to the White House, Mr Obama's journey promises to be long and winding, with the risk that it could hit a wall in the Democratic primaries next year.

But the scale of Saturday's rally – the crowd was in the thousands despite freezing temperatures – and the frenzied excitement surrounding it showed that Mr Obama is already in possession of that most precious of political commodities: momentum.

"I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," he told the crowd.

For the next 20 minutes he dazzled his audience with the sparkling oratory that has become his trademark, calling for a new generation to reject the "smallness" and cynicism of contemporary US politics and build "a more hopeful America".

There were some concrete proposals amid the rhetoric, including a plan to return combat troops from Iraq by March 2008 and a vow to introduce universal healthcare coverage by the end of his first term. But it was clear that Mr Obama's campaign will rest as much on his promise of a new style of leadership as it will on policy.

"I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington," said the 45-year-old first-term senator. "But I've been there long enough to know that the ways must change."

It was in a speech at the Old State Capitol that Lincoln famously called for the abolition of slavery by warning that a "house divided" cannot stand.

By inviting parallels with the man widely regarded as America's greatest president, Mr Obama was also answering critics who believe he lacks experience. Lincoln served four terms in the Illinois state legislature and two years in Congress before seeking the presidency – exactly the same career path so far trodden by Mr Obama.

For many, Mr Obama's youth and freshness are his greatest appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0130231

"It's time for change and we're more likely to get that from Obama than Clinton," said David Hudson, a young Democrat, referring to Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the party nomination.

Andrew Smith, a political scientist at the University of New Hampshire, said Democrats were falling in love with Mr Obama in a way they never had with Ms Clinton.

"Hillary brings experience and the sense of someone who can get the job done. Obama brings the Kennedyesque or Reaganesque vision that Hillary seems to lack."

Del Ali, of Research 2000, a non-partisan polling firm, said Mr Obama's consistent stance against the war in Iraq gave him an important advantage over Ms Clinton and other candidates whose positions had changed. But the odds were stacked against him because of her greater fundraising power, Mr Ali added.

Another uncertainty is whether America is ready to elect a black president.

"It is the issue that no one wants to discuss," said Mr Ali. "Democrats see the 2008 election as theirs to lose. Are they prepared to take a risk on Obama if he can't pick up any states in the south?"

Back in Springfield, Mr Obama urged America to look beyond old divisions and prejudices.

"The life of a tall, gangly Springfield lawyer tells us that a different future is possible," he said, referring to Lincoln. "He tells us that ... beneath all the differences of race and region, faith and station, we are one people. He tells us that there is power in hope."

Australian Leader: Al-Qaida Wants Obama (AP)

AP, February 11, 2007

Australia's conservative prime minister slammed Barack Obama on Sunday over his opposition to the Iraq war, a day after the first-term U.S. senator announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Obama said Saturday at his campaign kickoff in Springfield, Ill., that one of the country's first priorities should be ending the war in Iraq. He has also introduced a bill in the Senate to prevent President Bush from increasing American troop levels in Iraq and to remove U.S. combat forces from the country by March 31, 2008.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch Bush ally who has sent troops to Iraq and faces his own re-election bid later this year, said Obama's proposals would spell disaster for the Middle East.

"I think that will just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq, and create chaos and a victory for the terrorists to hang on and hope for an Obama victory," Howard said on Nine Network television.

"If I were running al-Qaida in Iraq, I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory, not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

Howard has defied widespread domestic opposition to the war, keeping about 1,400 Australian troops in and around Iraq, mostly in non-combat roles. He is seeking a fifth term later this year, and recent polls suggest voters are increasingly unhappy about his refusal to set a deadline for withdrawing Australian troops from the Middle East.

"You either rat on the ally or you stay with the ally," he said. "If it's all right for us to go, it's all right for the Americans and the British to go, and if everybody goes, Iraq will descend into total civil war and there'll be a lot of bloodshed."

Obama Plan Has A Critic In Australia (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa, Feb. 11 — On his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, found himself responding to an unexpected critic: John Howard, Australia's prime minister.

Mr. Howard, a conservative leader who is a close ally of the White House, denounced Mr. Obama's proposal to withdraw American combat troops from Iraq by March 31, 2008. In a television interview in Australia, Mr. Howard said the senator's redeployment plan would simply inspire insurgent violence in Iraq.

"If I were running Al Qaeda in Iraq," Mr. Howard said, "I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

In a news conference here, Mr. Obama dismissed the remarks, saying it was "flattering that one of George Bush's allies on the other side of the world started attacking me the day after I announced."

Mr. Obama said Australia had sent 1,400 troops to Iraq, a fraction of the American force.

"If he's ginned up to fight the good fight in Iraq, I would suggest that he calls up another 20,000 Australians and send them to Iraq," Mr. Obama said. "Otherwise, it's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

Obama Stresses Appreciation For Faith (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson
AP, February 12, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama said Sunday he does not think voters have a litmus test on religion, whether evangelical Christianity or his childhood years in a largely Muslim country.

"If your name is Barack Hussein Obama, you can expect it, some of that. I think the majority of voters know that I'm a member of the United Church of Christ, and that I take my faith seriously," Obama said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"Ultimately what I think voters will be looking for is not so much a litmus test on faith as an assurance that a candidate has a value system and that is appreciative of the role that religious faith can play in helping shape people's lives," he said.

In the interview, Obama also said his race might be a "novelty" this early in the presidential contest, sparred with the prime minister of Australia over Iraq, and said he has a higher burden of proof with voters because of his relative inexperience. Obama formally announced his candidacy in Illinois on Saturday and made a beeline for Iowa, site of the first nominating contest next Jan. 14.

Obama, who was born in Hawaii, lived in mostly Muslim Indonesia with his mother and stepfather from 1967 to 1971. He subsequently returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents.

He attends a Chicago church with his wife and two young daughters. The 2008 presidential field also includes Republican Mitt Romney, a Mormon, and Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., an evangelical Christian who converted to Catholicism in recent years.

Obama's leading rivals for the Democratic nomination are far better known to voters, the U.S. senator from Illinois said. He was elected in 2004.

"At least two of my fellow candidates have been campaigning nationally for years," Obama said, referring to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. "They have an infrastructure and name recognition that are higher than mine so there will probably be a higher burden of proof for me."

Few minorities reside in early voting Iowa and New Hampshire but Obama said his race — his mother is white, his father is black — will not play a determining role.

"I think that early on it may spark some curiosity or a sense of novelty, but I think very quickly people will be judging me on the merits. Do I have a message that resonates with people's concerns about health care and education, jobs and terrorism?" he said. "And if they do, then I think race won't be a major factor."

At a press conference later in Ames, Obama said he was proud to have opposed the Iraq war from the start while Clinton and others authorized the U.S.-led invasion.

"I don't think there is a more significant set of decisions than the decision to go to war," Obama said. "I think the war was a tragic mistake and it never should have been authorized."

Obama made a habit of stressing his position at every stop, to loud applause. Clinton, meanwhile, ran into some tough questioning while campaigning over the weekend in New Hampshire. One man demanded that she repudiate her 2002 Senate vote to send U.S. troops into battle.

Obama told reporters he thinks his early opposition to the war shows "it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well" and that it speaks "to the kind of judgment that I will be bringing to the office of president."

The senator has called for capping the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and then beginning to withdraw them on May 1. He wants a complete pullout of combat brigades by March 31, 2008.

Clinton says she is working to pass legislation capping troop levels and bring to a vote a resolution disapproving of Bush's planned troop increase.

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," Obama said. "I know that's she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

In his speech before thousands at Iowa State University, Obama did not mention Clinton, but he did draw a clear comparison. "We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged," Obama said to cheers.

In the AP interview, Obama laughed off criticism Saturday from Australian Prime Minister John Howard, who said Obama's plans for Iraq "encourage those who wanted to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq."

"It's flattering that one of George W. Bush's allies feels obliged to attack me," Obama said.

Obama said that if Howard did not think enough was being done in Iraq, he should consider sending more Australian troops to the region. Australia has about 1,400 troops in Iraq, mostly in noncombat roles.

DOJ_NMG_0130233

The senator dismissed concerns about his own security, but would not answer directly when asked if he had received death threats. The Rev. Jesse Jackson drew early Secret Service protection because of violent threats during his campaigns for president in the 1980s.

"I face the same security issues as anybody," he told the AP. "We're comfortable with the steps we have taken."

Obama campaigned in Cedar Rapids and Waterloo on Saturday after his kickoff announcement in Springfield, Ill. On Sunday, Obama met with party activists at a private home in Iowa Falls and attended the Ames rally.

He won the endorsement of two top state officials — Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald. Miller called Obama "a once in a generation talent."

On Sunday night, Obama returned home to Chicago, where he was greeted by a roaring crowd of more than 7,000 people.

"I am an imperfect vessel for your hopes and dreams," Obama told the crowd during a raucous rally at the arena of the University of Illinois at Chicago.

From Washington, Obama came under criticism from a presidential rival, 26-year veteran Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, for his lack of experience.

"I think experience matters to people. The stakes are very, very high right now," Dodd said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "This is not a time for on-the-job training."

At the house party in Iowa Falls, Obama said, "I'm going to have to be run through the paces, people are going to have to lift up the hood, kick the tires and be clear that I have a grasp of the issues that are of utmost importance in people's lives."

In that vein, Obama said he has quit his cigarette habit and now chews nonprescription Nicorette gum all day.

Trying To Manage Obama's Message (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

The 2008 election could well make history in a new and special way. Americans could elect the first female president in Hillary Rodham Clinton. They could choose the first Mormon president in Mitt Romney, or the oldest president in John McCain. Or they could elect the first African-American president in Barack Obama. Given America's bitter heritage of slavery, segregation, and discrimination, Obama's election could represent the most groundbreaking possibility of all.

Certainly he has generated more excitement than any other candidate. And as he accelerates his campaign this week, the buzz will get louder. "Is he just a streak across the sky or something more?' asks a strategist for one Republican presidential hopeful. "He is developing a cult of personality, but what is his real constituency?" Good question-and one that a growing number of political professionals and everyday voters are asking as well.

Obama already has demonstrated strong appeal to white voters. He comes in second to Senator Clinton in national polls of preferences for the Democratic nomination. And he impresses many as a talented newcomer who, because of his multicultural background, could conceivably redefine America's debate on race-away from a focus on the consequences of slavery toward an emphasis on the benefits of diversity. "It's a measure of our progress that a woman and a Mormon and an African-American can compete for this office that has always been the province of men and white people," asserts David Axelrod, one of Obama's advisers. But being an African-American, says Axelrod, is only part of Obama's story. "His hallmark in his years in politics," notes Axelrod, "has been bringing people together." In a recent interview with U.S. News, Obama said Americans are looking for a "change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology."

Cornell Belcher, Obama's pollster-and an African-American himself-says the Illinois senator represents a fulfillment of the civil rights movement: a black man who overcame prejudice, worked hard, and excelled. "It's not a wonderful black story; it's a great American story," Belcher told U.S. News.

But questions remain about how Obama will fare in the African-American community, where some, such as columnist Stanley Crouch and author Debra Dickerson, don't think Obama has shared enough of the black experience to truly bond with the community. Those who disagree cite the controversial remarks of Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, another presidential candidate, who called Obama "the first mainstream African-American [candidate] who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" and then apologized for being insensitive. Obama supporters contend that Biden's remarks show Obama can never escape his black heritage, and they say that fact should create sympathy and support for him among skeptical African-American leaders.

Color war. "He's not 'black enough'?" asks Democratic pollster Geoff Garin. "It's ridiculous. Obama is going to do very well with African-American voters. ... This will be the first real opportunity to elect a person of color," and that prospect will be compelling, says Garin. "People are looking for the things that unite us, not separate us. ... He is able to put his finger on things we have in common."

Until The War Ends ... (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Almost all the talk about the 2008 presidential election is about the horse race: Who's up? Who's down? Can Hillary hold her lead? Can a pro-choice, pro-gay-rights candidate like Rudy Giuliani outrun a hawkish maverick like John McCain?

It's a sport. It's fun. Why spoil it by being too serious?

Senator Barack Obama, in his speech in Illinois Saturday formally launching his presidential bid, gave us an excellent reason for being serious:

Ladies and gentlemen, there's a war on.

After going through a litany of lofty goals for a new generation to strive for, including health care for all Americans, a rejuvenated public education system, an end to poverty and real progress in dealing with global warming, the senator offered a hard and simple truth:

"All of this cannot come to pass until we bring an end to this war in Iraq."

The war — which, in addition to its human toll, will ultimately cost $2 trillion or more — has put America in a straitjacket, precluding progress on a range of important issues that will only worsen with continued neglect.

The public seems to understand this. It was voters fed up with the war who snatched control of both houses of Congress from the Republicans in last November's elections. And they were the ones giving Senator Hillary Clinton a hard time in New Hampshire over the weekend.

While Senator Obama is pushing a plan to bring American combat troops home by March 2008 (and former Senator John Edwards is calling for an immediate withdrawal), Senator Clinton continues to dance on the war issue. "I know that there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage," she said on Saturday, "but we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change."

We've moved beyond the absurd when it comes to the war. President Bush responded to the antiwar sentiment in last November's election by escalating U.S. involvement in Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney, lost in a zone of unreality, is blithely spreading the fantasy of "enormous progress." He may not have noticed that the last three months have been among the worst of the war.

The Democrats who benefited from the antiwar vote reacted to the president's thumb in the eye of the voters with their usual timidity. They've put their hearts and souls into a marathon effort to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop surge. Be still my heart.

The bottom line is that nothing has changed. The horror stories continue to spew out of Iraq: the helicopters being shot down, the mass killings in marketplaces, the steady stream of U.S. soldiers returning in body bags.

We need to stop pretending that there is something sane about continued U.S. involvement in this ruinous war. We keep sending troops into the combat zone and they keep sinking ever deeper into the ancient Middle East sand. To keep sending young people off to die in a war that everybody knows is pointless is criminal.

On NBC's "Nightly News" last Friday the correspondent Richard Engel, traveling with a convoy of soldiers from the First Infantry Division, had a close call when a roadside bomb detonated several feet away. No one was hurt, and Staff Sgt. Chris Copley said into the camera, with a laugh and a hint of bravado, "It gets the adrenaline going a little bit, doesn't it?"

But Mr. Engel noted that when the convoy returned to its patrol base, Sergeant Copley and other soldiers were openly wondering, "What are they doing out here?"

It's a question that deserves a clear, straight answer, especially from their commander in chief and the politicians running for president. As the casualties mount and success seems more and more unlikely, a sense of resignation is spreading among U.S. troops.

Sergeant Copley told Mr. Engel: "It's pretty much almost a lost cause. Nothing it seems that we do is doing any good."

Mr. Engel said all of the soldiers he talked with believed it was "time to end this war." He closed his piece by telling Brian Williams, "Earlier in the week some of the soldiers I was embedded with were hit by a larger I.E.D. That I.E.D. tore the door off the Humvee and the soldier inside had to have both of his legs amputated."

Senator Obama's capacity for leadership will be tested in large part by whether he can get the country to rally around his crucial point — that all further progress on important issues here at home depends on whether we can find the will to extricate ourselves from Iraq.

Obama's 'Improbable Quest' (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

DOJ_NMG_0130235

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Illinois Sen. Barack Obama formally opened what he calls his "improbable quest" for the presidency, styling his campaign as a crusade in which Americans' biggest enemy is cynicism -- "the belief that we can't change things anymore."

His own challenge is battling cynicism that he has the experience and ideas to make such change.

After two years in the U.S. Senate, and eight in the Illinois senate, the 45-year-old Mr. Obama remains relatively untested as he seeks to make history as the first African-American president. His sudden fame owes to his charismatic style and eloquence in two best-selling books and a memorable address at the 2004 Democratic Convention. So now, perhaps more than any other candidate in the crowded 2008 race, he is under pressure to show some policy substance as well.

Mr. Obama knows that. In a weekend tour of Iowa, site of the first presidential contest, after announcing his candidacy Saturday in Abraham Lincoln's Springfield, Ill., the senator offered a few specifics. To Iowans' questions, he said he opposed defense-spending cuts, for example, and called for direct U.S. talks with North Korea on nuclear weapons.

Mostly he kept up an audience-stirring diagnosis of the nation's ills and offered promises -- chiefly to provide universal health care by the end of a first term -- but no specific remedies. By yesterday, sensitive to critics calling for details, he took the offensive during a news conference at the University of Iowa.

"One of the narratives that's established itself in the mainstream media is this notion that, 'Well, you know, Obama has a pretty good style. He can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance.' Now, factually that's incorrect," Mr. Obama said.

He said he has "the most specific plan" on leaving Iraq, gave major speeches on health, education and energy in the two years before he decided to run for president, and has two books giving more "insights into how I think and how I feel about the issues facing America than any candidate in the field." As for the press, he teased, "you've been reporting how I look in a bathing suit" -- referring to a photo taken while he visited Hawaii over the holidays.

He and top campaign aides promised specifics will come, noting that the campaign has only begun. Meanwhile, as Mr. Obama's announcement confirmed, he will seek to turn his inexperience to advantage, positioning himself as a Washington outsider.

"I recognize that there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," he told the thousands braving frigid temperatures for his announcement in the square before Illinois' Old State Capitol in Springfield. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

By that message, he separates himself from New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, though he remains significantly behind her in polls, organization and money. But among the rest of the Democratic field, he is a top competitor for what amounts to a spot as the Clinton alternative, against former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards.

While Mr. Edwards is ahead in Iowa polls, Mr. Obama poses a fresh-faced challenge. After Mr. Obama's packed townhall meeting Saturday in Cedar Rapids, 80-year-old Bonnie Young of Marion, Iowa, and her 60-year-old daughter Claudia Young, both of whom worked for Mr. Edwards' 2004 presidential bid, said they have been torn between the two men. The mother left favoring Mr. Obama.

Mr. Edwards added to the pressure on Mr. Obama to be more specific with his recent unveiling of a health plan. But Democrats say Mr. Obama provoked the style-versus-substance talk himself, by his recent address to local Democratic Party leaders meeting in Washington, in which he seemed dismissive of "white papers" of policy specifics: "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

As a committee chairman in the Illinois Senate, Mr. Obama tried to get consensus for universal health care, but could only pass a measure calling for a study of coverage options. Now, at each campaign stop, he calls not only for universal health care, but more resources for education and an effort akin to the Apollo Project to develop alternative fuels to end U.S. reliance on Mideast oil and help arrest global warming.

But no such progress is possible, he adds, "until we bring this ill-conceived war in Iraq to a close."

The applause for that line from the mostly Democratic crowds made plain that the war is the issue most on voters' minds. Mr. Obama reminds them, to more applause, "I was against this war from the start" -- which distinguishes him, as many Iowa Democrats know, from Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards. And he outlines his Iraq plan: a phased withdrawal of all U.S. combat troops starting in May and ending by the end of March next year, allowing for enough U.S. forces to keep training Iraqi forces.

Mr. Obama didn't always give the answers his inquisitors may have liked. In Cedar Rapids, to a question from a man associated with a group that espouses reduced military spending, the senator said that because the Iraq war "has depleted our military...there's probably going to be a bump under an Obama presidency in initial spending just to get back to where we were."

DOJ_NMG_0130236

To a public school teacher, he reiterated his call for teachers to be paid significantly more. "I have to say, though, there's got to be a bargain," he added, in which teachers in turn accept greater accountability for performance.

Voters Seek Clarity On Clinton Iraq Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 12, 2007

After nearly four years of war and more than 3,000 U.S. dead, New Hampshire voters are demanding more than nuance on Iraq from Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

From crowded town hall meetings to smaller gathering at private homes, Clinton was enthusiastically received by voters throughout the key early voting state on Saturday and Sunday. She deftly fielded questions on a range of subjects, from education to health care to the genocide in Darfur.

But invariably, the questions returned to Iraq. What would she do to end the conflict if elected president? Would she support cutting funds to stop President Bush's planned increase in troop levels? And, perhaps most importantly, why won't she recant her 2002 vote authorizing the military invasion?

"She has a very nuanced explanation, and it's a pretty good explanation. But many people want to hear her clearly say that her vote was a mistake," said Paul LeBlanc, a Clinton supporter and president of Southern New Hampshire University.

It's a vexing matter for Clinton, who is hoping to become the nation's first female commander in chief. If she repudiates her vote — buckling to pressure from anti-war activists and two top Democratic rivals, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards — Clinton opens herself to accusations of flip-flopping. But defending her vote means she'll continue to be dogged by skeptical questions about it as she campaigns in not only the early voting states but around the country.

On Sunday, Obama told reporters in Iowa that the war was a "tragic mistake" that never should have been authorized — a swipe at his Senate rivals who backed the 2002 resolution. Responding specifically to Clinton's stand, he said he was uncertain how she would proceed to reduce U.S. forces.

"I know that's she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on," he said.

Throughout her weekend campaign visit here, Clinton stuck to her guns: She said she voted to give Bush authority to send weapons inspectors to Iraq, and that her vote was not an endorsement of pre-emptive war. She also said she would never have sought to invade Iraq if she had been president in 2002.

But that wasn't enough for Claire Helfman, a retired nurse who attended a Nashua house party to meet Clinton.

"I've heard your explanation for your vote: 'I didn't think I was voting for the war, I was voting for inspections.' It doesn't fly. It just doesn't fly," Helfman told Clinton.

The New York senator repeated her long-standing mantra — "If we knew then what we know now, I would never have voted to give this president the authority." And she again batted down calls for her to describe her vote as a mistake.

"I'm sorry, what I say is what I believe," she said. "I understand that some people disagree or think it's not adequate, but it's what I believe."

At a house party in Manchester on Sunday, Clinton offered an outline of what she would do as president to scale back the conflict. She vowed she would engage diplomatically with other countries in the region, relaunch the Middle East peace process and force Iraqis to take charge of their own security.

"I would tell the Iraqis, 'We are going to stop funding you unless you start doing what you've promised all these years,'" Clinton said. "I would say: 'I'm sorry, it's over. We've done all we can do for you. We liberated you, we got rid of Saddam Hussein for you, we are not going to baby-sit a civil war.'"

But she also said she would not redeploy all troops out of the region, insisting that some are still needed to quell terrorist activity in Anbar province and to protect the Kurds in northern Iraq.

"There will still be missions," she said.

She also said she was not in favor of cutting funding for Bush's proposed troop increase, despite some activists' calls to do so.

At a town hall meeting in Keene, N.H., Clinton discussed Democratic efforts to pass a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq.

"To those who say, 'It's a nonbinding resolution, what does it mean?' — all I can say is, the White House is working very hard to defeat it," Clinton said.

But voters should remember that Democrats still need some Republican support to get anything done, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0130237

"I know that is hard medicine for some people because people say, 'Just do something!'" she said. "In order to do something, we've got to have Republicans to help us, at least until the election of 2008 when we'll have 60 Democrats, I hope."

In Nashua, Clinton thrilled many attendees by insisting that she has the mettle to take on Republicans in a general election, saying, "I'm the one person they're most afraid of because Bill and I know how to beat them and we have consistently."

But the Republican National Committee appeared eager to point out potential problems with Clinton's arguments on Iraq. In an e-mail titled "Hillary's Kerry-oake on Iraq," the committee likened her statements to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee who was badly weakened by accusations he had flip-flopped on the war.

For Clinton And Obama, Different Tests On Iraq (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H., Feb. 11 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was challenged on Iraq from corner to corner of New Hampshire this weekend, while Senator Barack Obama drew cheers in Iowa for his opposition to the war.

Besides giving voters a chance to probe the views of two major rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, the weekend appearances gave the two campaigns a chance to road test their strategies for dealing with the central issue of Iraq in the primaries and beyond.

At nearly every stop in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York, has been greeted warmly but has been met by skeptical voters asking pointedly about her 2002 vote authorizing the use of force in Iraq. On Sunday in Nashua, one person told her that her explanation “doesn’t fly,” while another asked why she did not simply say that the vote was a mistake.

In these instances and similar moments in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton stuck to a set of talking points that she and her advisers hope will ultimately overcome the antiwar anger that is particularly strong among Democrats likely to vote in primaries. She took full responsibility for the vote, said she would not vote for military action in Iraq again, and then pivoted quickly to frame Iraq as President Bush’s war. This answer was usually met with applause.

Yet Mrs. Clinton’s refusal to use clear, categorical phrases — “I’m sorry” or “I made a mistake” — has created an opening for Mr. Obama and another rival, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, who has openly apologized for his identical 2002 vote.

On Sunday, at a news conference in Ames, Iowa, Mr. Obama declined to say whether Mrs. Clinton should explicitly express regret for the vote, but he phrased his answer to keep the onus on her.

“I will let her speak to her plan, and I will let her address both past decisions and how she wants to move forward,” Mr. Obama said. “I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way.”

In two days of public appearances in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama’s name or explicitly contrast her positions on the war with his, though she did say at one point that it was “very easy to go around saying, ‘End the war now.’ ”

She was never asked directly about Mr. Obama; she held no news conferences with the two dozen reporters following her, nor did voters publicly press her on Mr. Obama’s views.

In Iowa on Sunday, on his first trip there as a presidential candidate, Mr. Obama reminded voters that he had been against the war from the start and said he had offered a plan for winding down American involvement. His strong statements against the war in Iraq drew applause at each of four stops, from Waterloo to Ames.

He said it was the obligation of his Democratic rivals to offer their own ideas on how to get out of Iraq, telling an audience at John F. Kennedy High School in Cedar Rapids: “We cannot have our troops trying to maintain order in the midst of a civil war. Anyone running for president has an obligation to say what you would do now.”

Though Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, was a vocal critic of the Iraq war during his time as a state legislator and as a Senate candidate in 2004, the level of his criticism lowered when he arrived in Washington. In his first year in the Senate, he delivered one speech on Iraq, calling for a phased withdrawal by the end of 2006. But last November, Mr. Obama revised that time frame, saying the drawdown should begin in four to six months. Legislation he introduced late last month calls for redeployment to begin no later than May 1, with a goal of removing all combat brigades in Iraq by March 31, 2008.

Mr. Obama’s aides said they viewed Mrs. Clinton’s vote on the war in 2002 and her refusal to explicitly disavow that vote as her single biggest vulnerability, and that Mr. Obama would point it out at every opportunity. From that perspective, the juxtaposition of Mr. Obama’s announcement tour in Iowa and Mrs. Clinton’s appearances in New Hampshire was propitious.

On Sunday, Mrs. Clinton for the first time on the campaign trail used the phrase “civil war” to describe the violence in Iraq. Speaking about building coalitions with Middle Eastern nations, she said she would take a new approach: “I would say ‘I’m sorry, it’s over. We are not going to baby-sit a civil war.’ ”

DOJ_NMG_0130238

In introducing the phrase on the campaign trail, where it resonates with the antiwar voters whose opinions matter in early primaries and caucuses, Mrs. Clinton is using language that Mr. Obama and other rivals have already embraced.

Her advisers deny, however, that she felt pressure as a candidate to use those words — which she has used sparingly, and somewhat obliquely, in the Senate.

Analysts say that Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards are more in sync with the most energized likely Democratic primary voters on Iraq. But advisers to Mrs. Clinton say her position reflects the political mainstream of the nation, and they are banking that Democrats who want to regain the White House will take a broad view of the race.

These advisers say Mrs. Clinton's other advantages — experience, debate skills, fund-raising muscle, a well-organized political operation, her popularity in the party (as well as her husband's) and her agenda — will carry her past any second-guessing about her Iraq war vote.

Mrs. Clinton herself made a nod to her broader strengths during a house party in Nashua on Sunday, when she was asked how she would combat the hard-edged campaign tactics of Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's political adviser and a chief strategist of his two winning campaigns.

"I know what Gingrich tells people privately, I know what DeLay tells people privately, I know what Karl Rove tells people privately," Senator Clinton said in reference to Newt Gingrich, the former Republican speaker, and Tom DeLay, the former Republican congressman. "I'm the one person they are most afraid of. Bill and I have beaten them before and we will again."

Mrs. Clinton, at another house party, in Manchester on Sunday, emphasized her opposition to the war in some of her most searing language yet.

"It is a gnawing, painful sore," she said of Iraq. "People are beside themselves with frustration, and I understand that completely. We are trying in the Senate to set forth a strategy that has the best hope of getting the president's attention."

Clearly, however, Mrs. Clinton's advisers do not relish the idea of someone bringing up her 2002 Senate vote at every campaign stop.

Some advisers believe the issue of her vote will fade with time; even so, they emphasize that she is taking a principled position of responsibility for it.

Mark Penn, Mrs. Clinton's chief strategist, said in an interview: "It's important for all Democrats to keep the word 'mistake' firmly on the Republicans and on President Bush. Senator Clinton has been very clear that we, as a party, should keep the focus on Bush — these were his mistakes. Ultimately that's very important, not just for her, but for the entire Democratic party."

At Mr. Obama's rally in Waterloo, Barbara Gifford, a 69-year-old retiree, illustrated the challenge to the Clinton campaign, saying that she would not rule out supporting her candidacy but that the senator's stance on Iraq troubled her. It was reminiscent, Ms. Gifford said, of how Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts fumbled in his 2004 presidential campaign as he sought to answer questions about war financing.

"I think Hillary is kind of doing the Kerry flip-flop," she said in an interview. "People like somebody to admit when they were wrong."

Mr. Obama gained the endorsement of two top state Democratic officials in Iowa on Sunday. The attorney general, Tom Miller, and the treasurer, Michael L. Fitzgerald, signed onto his campaign, they said, at least in part because of his steady opposition to the war.

"He has the right judgment," Mr. Miller said of Mr. Obama. "He made the right call on Iraq."

Clinton Addresses 2002 Iraq Vote During N.H. Visit (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 12, 2007

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton wrapped up her first visit to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate Sunday, facing pointed questions from Democratic activists about her early support for the war in Iraq.

Clinton refused to characterize her 2002 vote authorizing the invasion as a mistake.

"If we knew then what we know now, I would never have voted to give this president the authority," she said at a private house party in Nashua, near the end of a two-day swing through the early-primary state.

"I'm sorry, what I say is what I believe," she said. "I understand that some people disagree or think it's not adequate, but it's what I believe."

Earlier in the day, Clinton reiterated her opposition to cutting funds for U.S. troops as a means to force an end to the nearly four-year war. "We don't yet have all the gear and equipment our troops are supposed to have," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0130239

Clinton, campaigning to become the nation's first female president, said her strategy to scale back U.S. involvement in the war would include new diplomatic efforts in region, including a push to restart the Middle East peace process. "We cannot be telling people what to do," she said. "We have to be moving them with carrots and sticks and a lot of coalition-building."

In news Sunday from other presidential candidates:

•Sen. Chris Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat, said he would back efforts in Congress to attach measures to spending bills to cut off some of the funding for the Iraq war. "We've got to stand up and offer real legislation with real teeth and real accountability or the American public are going to be very, very disappointed, to put it mildly," Dodd said on CBS' Face the Nation.

•In an interview televised Sunday, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee said he believes the country is in "the middle or at least the beginnings" of a worldwide religious war in which "Islamic fascists … really would like to annihilate us."

Huckabee, a Republican presidential candidate, said the next president will have combat those forces by urging moderate Muslims "to take a more visible and, frankly, vocal role in bringing a sense of balance and sanity within the Islamic community." He spoke on ABC News' This Week.

•Likely GOP contender Rudy Giuliani, in California over the weekend, defended his actions on gun measures as New York City mayor. Giuliani said he was trying to reduce crime by supporting bans on certain rifles and initiating a lawsuit against gunmakers over handgun deaths in New York. Giuliani is scheduled to deliver a speech today in Santa Clara, Calif.

Clinton's Search For Common Ground Gets Mixed Reviews In N.H. (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H., Feb. 11 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) touted the politics of the possible Sunday during her inaugural visit to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate, a message that found an energetic but not ecstatic reception in town-hall meetings and house parties across the state.

Clinton veered away from drawing simple conclusions on issues such as the war in Iraq and health care, insisting that each is a complex problem that does not lend itself to a simple solution.

On Iraq, an area where Clinton has drawn considerable criticism for her unwillingness to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing the war, she defended the Senate's effort to pass a nonbinding resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq, calling it a first step in changing U.S. policy on the war. She also said she opposes any proposal to defund U.S. troops now or in the future.

"I know that is hard medicine for people," Clinton said at a town-hall meeting Sunday night in Keene, a western New Hampshire town.

Earlier in the day in Manchester, Clinton described Iraq as a "gnawing, painful sore" and added that she understands "the anguish and the outrage of people" about the conflict. Even so, she repeatedly rejected the opportunity to call her 2002 vote a mistake.

"What I say is what I believe," Clinton said. "The problem with this president is he should not have been trusted with this authority." She added that she would love to "wave a magic wand" and change the circumstances in Iraq but that is simply not possible. She did use the phrase "civil war" to describe the conflict in Iraq -- a description she has used before but not since becoming a candidate for president.

Clinton's unwillingness to offer a rhetorical olive branch to the antiwar left contrasts sharply with the positions taken by her two main rivals for the Democratic nomination -- Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). Obama, who formally entered the race Saturday, has called for all U.S. troops to be out of Iraq by March 2008 and on Sunday called on Clinton to better explain her plan to extricate troops from Iraq. Edwards has advocated an immediate withdrawal of U.S. military forces.

Clinton is sending a message to primary voters as well as to her opponents that governing -- unlike campaigning -- is about finding common ground and forging compromise, not making difficult promises. It's a message she believes is striking fear in Republicans. "I'm the one person they are most afraid of," she said during a stop in Nashua. "Bill and I have beaten them before, and we will again."

Her approach is evident on health care, which Clinton unsuccessfully tried to revamp in the early 1990s while she was first lady. She pointedly refused to offer a comprehensive proposal over the weekend, instead theorizing on how the current system is failing and criticizing those who she said believe that throwing more money at the problem will solve it.

This month, Edwards unveiled a health-care proposal that would cost $90 billion to $120 billion annually and be funded mainly by raising taxes on the wealthiest Americans.

"I am looking for answers that will not have us spend more money," Clinton said. "I am convinced we can do that."

DOJ_NMG_0130240

The response to Clinton's approach was mixed. A woman who attended a house party in Manchester on Sunday told the senator that the explanation that her 2002 vote was not an authorization for war "doesn't fly." But she seemed satisfied when Clinton said -- as she did multiple times during her two-day trip -- that if she knew then what she knows now, she never would have voted for the war.

Others were less easily pleased. One man hoisting a sign that read "No More Pro War Candidates" said that even if Clinton apologized for her vote, he could not support her. "We want people with better judgment than that," he said.

Through it all, Clinton stuck to the script, summing up her political philosophy in Nashua: "You have to find common ground, but you also have to stand your ground."

Clinton On The Trail In N.H. (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer

Long Island Newsday, February 12, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. - With the snowcapped, windswept peaks of the White Mountains nearby, Sen. Hillary Clinton talked to residents of this city in the northernmost reaches of the Granite State in her first New Hampshire appearance as a candidate for the White House.

She was generally well-received by the overflow crowds, although she had to face tough questions about her position on Iraq.

In this paper-mill town straddling the Androscoggin River, and later in Concord, the state capital, Clinton began what she called a "conversation" that sought to cast her as a political centrist with mainstream values who cares about Main Street.

"I grew up in a middle-class family, in the middle of the country, in the middle of the last century," she said, describing her childhood in Illinois to the residents of the state where the first primary will take place.

Her upbringing, she said, instilled a conviction that any parent could provide a better future for their children through their own hard work and that the government would provide an infrastructure to make that happen.

"There was a basic bargain in America: If you did your part, if you worked hard and played by the rules, then you would be given the chance to go as far as your dreams and your ambition and your hard work would take you," Clinton said. "The other part of the bargain was that your government would be on your side ... I look now and it seems to me we are in danger of breaking that bargain because of the decisions being made by the leaders in our country."

The sounds of Aerosmith and Bob Marley filled the auditorium at Berlin City Hall, and the crowd - some of whom had driven more than four hours - rustled with excitement as the time of Clinton's appearance drew near. Some clutched copies of her autobiography, others gripped former President Bill Clinton's. A few carried both.

A button vendor did a brisk business. At three for $10 or one for $5, buyers could choose from among a half-dozen, including one with a picture of Bill Clinton that said "First Gentleman."

Wearing a wireless microphone, Clinton walked around the two venues talking about the need to provide universal health care, pitching energy independence as national security issue and emphasizing her opposition to President George W. Bush's planned troop surge in Iraq.

Clinton fielded questions from the audience - most dealing with topics she touched on during her opening remarks - that were largely friendly. But she did take occasional heat for her stance on the war.

Perhaps to head off such queries, Clinton said that if she had been president in 2003 the United States never would have gone to war, and that should she be elected, if the troops are still there, she'd take them out.

That wasn't enough for some.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," said Roger Tilton, 46, of Nashua. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters - until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded that if she knew then what she knows now, "I never would have voted for the war."

But Tilton, a financial adviser, said he still wasn't satisfied.

"I can't listen to her until I hear her say it was a mistake," he said afterward. "You know what, there were a lot of the people in the Senate [23 members] at the time who didn't vote for it. There were a lot of people in the Senate at the time who voted for it and now say it was a mistake."

Smart Money Is On Clinton As She Homes In On Primary (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In New Hampshire

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130241

It is hockey night at Mr Pizza's in Gorham, New Hampshire, but a handful of couples and a few lone diners sitting around the bar in the popular local spot are talking about the imminent arrival in the Granite State of Hillary Clinton, her first visit in more than a decade.

Ed Miars recalls how he spent an hour with Bill Clinton "just shooting the bull" during the campaign of the governor of Arkansas, whose second-place New Hampshire finish in the 1992 primary saved his candidacy. Mr Miars, a state representative, does not expect the New York senator and Democratic presidential frontrunner to spend as much time courting New Hampshire voters as her then-obscure husband did, but says he thinks she is a "great candidate" and that others "don't have a chance".

A burly veteran of both Gulf wars, named Oscar, says he does not respect Ms Clinton. "How is she going to control the country if she cannot control her husband?" he quips, before being berated by Lorraine Leclerc, a beautician who is ecstatic about Ms Clinton's run.

"I think she's going to go the whole way, and I'm not voting for her because she's a woman. I'm voting for her because she's smart," she says as a handful of other women nod in agreement.

To be relevant to the critical and largely independent voters of New Hampshire, traditionally home to the first primary, Mr Miars says Ms Clinton will have to deliver a message that speaks to the economic hardships of the state's north, which last year saw its pulp mill shut down and whose citizens are grappling with healthcare costs.

The next morning, in a packed city hall in Berlin, Ms Clinton tries to do just that, comparing the difficult economic environment to that of areas in her adopted home state of New York. "I'm not going to tell you that we have magically turned things around, but we have made progress."

In this, her first New Hampshire campaign stop, she promises to fix the healthcare crisis, implement a foreign policy that would improve the nation's standing in the world and enact a new energy strategy.

But even those who appear to adore Ms Clinton take her to task on the biggest issue for many voters: her 2002 vote to authorise President George W. Bush to invade Iraq. In a second stop in Concord that day, Monique Cesna asks Ms Clinton to explain the "seeming contradiction" between the vote and her call to end the war.

Dave Tiffany, who claims a Clinton staff member took away a sign that said "Quit stalling. Bring our troops home", criticised the senator for not urging Congress to cut off war funding. Unlike her rival, former senator John Edwards, Ms Clinton has refused to admit her 2002 vote was a mistake and insists it was not meant to give Mr Bush the authority to wage pre-emptive war.

Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, says ultimately, Ms Clinton will be able to take the issue of Iraq "off the table". The more important question now, he says, is how voters respond to Ms Clinton, who holds a lead in New Hampshire and national polls.

Candace Landroche, an administrator at a private school who attended Ms Clinton's Concord meeting, says the senator has been portrayed as being "tough and hard", but she found her "warm and sensitive".

Dick Bennett, who heads a non-partisan polling firm in New Hampshire, says that, barring any big mis-steps, Ms Clinton's candidacy is like a "freight train".

"I look at this and think, does Barack Obama know what is going to happen to him?"

Mr Bennett says his research shows Ms Clinton's advantage over rivals such as Mr Obama, who on Saturday announced his candidacy, is that voters give the senator a "pass" when it comes to having to prove she is competent and understands America's problems. "They already believe she knows. She's married to the guy who has already solved and worked on those problems," he says.

Clinton Is Pressed By Obama (NYS)

By Jill Gardiner

New York Sun, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H. — Senators Obama and Clinton banged heads over the Iraq war yesterday, marking their first dustup since the start of the presidential campaign.

Just a day after officially announcing his candidacy in Illinois, Mr. Obama took aim at Mrs. Clinton's vote to authorize the war, saying, "I think the war was a tragic mistake and it never should have been authorized."

Mrs. Clinton's vote is the one issue that has been dogging her thus far in the campaign. Otherwise, enthusiastic crowds have been giving her standing ovations on her proposals covering everything from health care to energy dependency. Mr. Obama told reporters that his early opposition to the war is proof positive that "it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well" and that it speaks "to the kind of judgment that I will be bringing to the office of president."

DOJ_NMG_0130242

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," Mr. Obama told the Associated Press in an interview. "I know that she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Howard Wolfson, issued a statement last night in response to Mr. Obama's comment, saying the former first lady has been a "forceful critic" of the war and has "strongly opposed President Bush's escalation."

"Had she been president in October of 2002, she would not have started this war and if Congress doesn't end this war by January of 2009, as president, she will," Mr. Wolfson said.

Yesterday's clash came as the two Democrats were campaigning in the two most crucial early nominating states. Mrs. Clinton was here in New Hampshire wrapping up a two-day campaign swing, while Mr. Obama was stumping in Iowa and Illinois and preparing for his own trip to New Hampshire today.

At an event at Keene High School, in the southwest corner of this state, a questioner at a town hall meeting, as if on cue, asked Mrs. Clinton to pledge that she would "not put down my fellow Democrats."

Mrs. Clinton answered with an emphatic "yes" and said a positive tone in the campaign would lead the country in a better direction. "I want to run a campaign about the future and about the issues and what I would do as president, and I would leave it to the voters to sort out the differences among us," she told roughly 2,500 people in the gym and an overflowing auditorium. "I want to be positive and optimistic about what we can do together." Earlier in the day, Mrs. Clinton bluntly told a group of about 50 New Hampshire residents that high-ranking Republicans are more afraid of her than of any of her opponents.

"I know what Gingrich tells people privately. I know what DeLay tells people privately. I know what Karl Rove tells people privately," Mrs. Clinton said at a private party in Nashua in response to a question about how she would deal with Mr. Rove's notoriously shrewd political tactics.

"I'm the one person they are most afraid of. Bill and I have beaten them before and we will again," she declared.

She also ramped up her rhetoric on the infighting in Iraq, saying several times that America would not be left to "babysit a civil war." A New Hampshire resident, Eric Schumacher, who attended yesterday's event in Keene, said it would be "disingenuous for the candidates to not talk about Iraq" and draw comparisons.

"We do not have the luxury of not focusing on that," he said as Mrs. Clinton signed copies of her book for supporters in the school's gymnasium. "I think that at the end of the day is going to emerge as the issue."

A business owner, Philip Huber — who was at Keene High School to see Mrs. Clinton, but was carrying a copy of Mr. Obama's book — called it "absurd" to ask politicians to take pledges.

Mrs. Clinton stuck largely to her stump speech in Keene, talking about CEO pay, health care costs, No Child Left Behind, global climate change, and the squeeze on the middle class.

The crowd was mostly wowed, but the decision to insist that President Bush made a mistake on Iraq rather than taking that responsibility is trailing her like a bad odor. She has introduced legislation to cap troop levels at their January 1 strength and to cut off funding for Iraqi, but not American, forces. Mr. Obama has proposed starting a troop withdrawal in May. Senator Edwards, another of her Democratic rivals, has proposed pulling out 40,000 to 50,000 troops.

At a party in Manchester, a woman told Mrs. Clinton that her explanation for voting to authorize the Iraq war "doesn't fly."

Meanwhile, Mrs. Clinton received praise yesterday from an unexpected source. A former Arkansas governor, Mike Huckabee, told George Stephanopoulos on ABC that she is a "brilliant human being" and said Republicans "underestimate Hillary Clinton at their own peril."

"I think people underestimate her. And I think, when they do, they're going to be sorry," he said. A waitress at Pappy's Pizza in Manchester, Kelly Riley, had a similar take. After Mrs. Clinton dropped in yesterday morning, Ms. Riley predicted that New York's junior senator would win the presidency.

"You usually know who is going to be the winner. She's gonna win. She's going to be the president."

Not Sold On Clinton (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The buzz in Democratic circles for the past two weeks has been over the decision to raise money for Sen. Barack Obama by two or three multimillionaire liberals from Hollywood who were thought to be supporting Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for president. An explanation that this is the movie industry's delayed reaction to some of President Bill Clinton's policies is not credible. The real reason for the defection is more troubling for Clinton's campaign.

In fact, the Hollywood defections have the same root as resistance to Clinton's candidacy among less glittering Democratic activists throughout the country. A substantial number of them do not want to participate in a coronation of the former first lady because they still doubt her viability as a presidential candidate. They question both her positions on the issues and her skills on the campaign trail.

What's wrong with Clinton was demonstrated by the Feb. 4 performance on NBC's "Meet the Press" of a competitor, former senator John Edwards, who displayed the qualities she lacks. He took firm positions and admitted error, in contrast to Clinton's careful parsing. It followed his virtuoso performance at the Democratic National Committee meeting two days earlier that overshadowed Clinton's speech there. Comparing Clinton and Edwards, one longtime observer of the Democratic scene called it "caution versus courage."

For many months, long before Clinton confirmed that she was a candidate, her agents have been pinning down commitments from a staggering array of Democrats who were connected in large or small degree to her husband to create an aura of inevitability about her nomination. That effort hit a bump two weeks ago with the announcement that David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg, the founders of the DreamWorks film studios who all were thought to be staunch Clintonites, were sponsoring a fundraiser for Obama.

According to Democratic sources, former President Clinton got Spielberg to step away from a tacit endorsement of Obama. Spielberg has let it be known that he will host a future fundraiser for Clinton as part of a policy of helping all Democratic presidential candidates. But Katzenberg and Geffen seem to be clearly in Obama's camp.

Two theories for these defections have been put out by Democrats favorable to Clinton. First, the gay community in Hollywood is seeking revenge against Bill Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" policy restricting open homosexuality in the military. Second, the entertainment industry still harbors resentment about Clinton-Gore administration criticism of the material that is presented to children.

But these explanations defy reality, in the opinion of Democrats not yet committed to any candidate. Hollywood, including the DreamWorks founders, was solidly behind Bill Clinton in 1996 and Al Gore in 2000.

The real reason for not desiring a Hillary coronation, as described to me by California Democrats, is resentment of her cautious sidestep rightward over the past six years. They still cannot get over her sponsorship in 2005 of legislation against flag burning. The whispered worry is that Clinton as the presidential nominee would be a loser in a year when the stars seem aligned for a Republican defeat.

What's wrong with Clinton was pointed out by Edwards in his "Meet the Press" performance. He not only said he was "wrong" about Iraq when he first supported the intervention, but he advocated universal health care and asserted: "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes." Clinton has hedged on each of these issues (as Edwards pointed out in the case of her stance on Iraq).

Edwards is not popular with the Democratic elite, who view him as a glib and shallow trial lawyer. They remember that he began his 2004 campaign for president as a centrist Southern Democrat in the Jimmy Carter-Bill Clinton mold, but after not getting anywhere he switched to left-wing populism. The viable alternative to Clinton may be Obama.

Nevertheless, Edwards's "courage" energized DNC members as Clinton's "caution" did not. The point is that many Democrats are voting no on a Hillary coronation.

Campaign '08: Who Is The 'Real' John Edwards? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

In the fall of 2005, John Edwards sat down with a pad and pen and scrawled out three simple words: "I was wrong." It was nearly three years after he'd joined a Senate majority in voting to authorize war in Iraq. After an unsuccessful run as John Kerry's vice presidential candidate in the 2004 election, Edwards had returned home to North Carolina and watched as the war descended into chaos. Increasingly filled with regret, he concluded that the three-word confession would be the right way to start a Washington Post op-ed admitting his vote was a mistake.

But when a draft came back from his aides in Washington, Edwards's admission was gone. Determined, the senator reinserted the sentence. Again a draft came back from Washington; again the sentence had been taken out. "We went back and forth, back and forth," Edwards tells NEWSWEEK. "They didn't want me to say it. They were saying I should stress that I'd been misled." The opening sentence remained. "That was the single most important thing for me to say," Edwards recalls. "I had to show how I really feel."

The "real" John Edwards is not someone America knows well. When he first crossed the national stage, he called himself the "son of a mill worker," but he seemed more like a creature spawned in a focus group—attractive, well spoken and safe. Since then, he has weathered enormous hardship—his wife, Elizabeth, has battled breast cancer—but hardly a wrinkle has crossed his perpetually tanned face. He has spent the better part of five years in one of the most contrived careers known to man: candidate for president of the United States.

In recent weeks, however, Edwards has been trying to draw attention to his less- scripted side. First there was his "silence is betrayal" attack on his main rivals for the 2008 Democratic nomination, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, for not speaking out against the escalation of the Iraq war. On Feb. 4, in an appearance on "Meet the Press," he broke the cardinal rule of presidential politics and admitted that his proposal for universal health care would require raising taxes. Then, last week, he refused to fire two campaign employees who'd criticized Roman Catholics and religious conservatives on their personal blogs, despite pressure from conservative leaders.

It's perhaps no accident that Genuine John Edwards has chosen this particular moment to emerge. The senator is campaigning as an alternative to Clinton, the front runner whose chief weakness with primary voters is the impression she is driven more by polling than principle. He has lost supporters, and even some staff, to Obama—a candidate who's connected with Democrats by seeming to always speak from his heart. And the success of blunt-spoken Democratic Senate candidates like Montana's Jon Tester and Virginia's Jim Webb has left Washington consultants advising their clients to act like, well, they don't listen to consultants.

Still, Edwards's new commitment to authenticity may have real roots: in 2004, the candidate learned the hard way that too much caution can be fatal. When the Kerry campaign faltered, Edwards and his wife were convinced that a broad swath of competing consultants, offering conflicting advice, were largely to blame. "Consultants can make it hard to tell the truth," Edwards says. "They want you to be so cautious it makes it hard to say anything." Aides, who didn't want to be named discussing their boss's internal thinking, say he walked away from 2004 convinced that only strong, centralized decision making works in presidential campaigns.

He was already thinking of the next election—but Edwards had a more pressing task. When Elizabeth was diagnosed with breast cancer, Edwards became her chief caretaker, sitting beside her as she underwent debilitating treatment. (Elizabeth is now in remission.) By her bedside, he pondered his own future and contemplated Iraq. How could he go on rationalizing his vote to authorize support for the war? "I knew I couldn't keep explaining a vote ... I had serious doubts about," he says.

Aides saw a new confidence in Edwards after he publicly repudiated his war vote in November 2005. He had developed his own world view and could converse easily about foreign policy. He'd also taken on fighting poverty as his central cause. It seemed an odd choice for the old John Edwards—"electable" centrist candidates don't waste time on the poor while vying for middle-class voters. "Yeah, I heard all that," Edwards told NEWSWEEK in 2006. "It's what I want to do." (Critics claim Edwards's new 28,000-square-foot home in Orange County, N.C., shows his commitment to the poor may not be as all-consuming as he suggests.)

All his talk about the working class has helped Edwards get cozy with labor. In 2004, he peppered his speeches with sympathy for unions but largely sat out of the major jockeying for endorsements from Big Labor. Now he has led an aggressive courtship, naming union-friendly former congressman David Bonior as his campaign chairman and pitching labor leaders. Andy Stern, president of the influential Service Employees International Union (SEIU), has seemed especially drawn to Edwards's message. But associates, who would only speak about his intentions anonymously, say he is wary of alienating the Clintons. (An SEIU spokesman said the union would not make an endorsement until September at the earliest.)

Edwards has also recast himself as the Internet candidate. In 2004, his campaign largely ceded the Web money chase to Howard Dean. But Elizabeth, who was an early habitué of online communities, has long urged her husband to take more-aggressive steps on the Internet. He has wooed bloggers during private dinners and invested in a Web site that many consider to be the most sophisticated of any candidate in either party. Last week he declined calls to dismiss campaign bloggers Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, amid allegations they were antireligion. "The first response normally would have been to listen to these Beltway actors who were saying, 'Clearly, you have to fire these people'," says Jonathan Singer, a blogger for the liberal site MyDD. "He has some spine."

But to win the Democratic nomination, Edwards needs cash as much as he needs resolve. To stay in the same sentence as Clinton and Obama, Edwards must have an impressive fund-raising total at the end of the first filing period on March 31. He will spend the next two months crisscrossing the country, picking up checks. "The travel bothers me more than it used to," he admits. "Maybe it's just that I'm older." The new John Edwards is still running for president—but now admits when he feels a little pain.

A 'Straight Shooter' Or A Temperament Problem? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130245

Until recently, discussion about which GOP candidate might be temperamentally unsuited for the presidency has revolved around Sen. John McCain, who has a short fuse. But with former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani now poised to run, questions about the Big T are also hovering over Hizzoner.

Giuliani gets mostly high marks as mayor—for cutting crime and welfare and for heroic leadership after 9/11. But New Yorkers also remember his thirst for power and bouts of unwarranted nastiness. After 9/11, the mayor briefly weighed challenging the city constitution that barred a third term. "He was hellbent on doing it," says one former aide from this period, who wouldn't be named for fear of retaliation. McCain was among those who talked Giuliani out of it, arguing that he'd be better off going out on top.

Other examples of temperamentally questionable behavior go back more than a decade. After Police Commissioner William Bratton's innovative crime-fighting landed him on the cover of Time magazine in 1994, Giuliani sacked him, apparently for getting too much publicity. When New York Magazine placed ads on buses in 1997 referring to the publication as "Possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for," Giuliani leaned on the transit authority to take the ads down. A judge upheld the magazine's free-speech rights.

A critical new documentary, "Giuliani Time," chronicles the mayor's tone-deaf response to local police shootings. For instance, after police killed Patrick Dorismond, an unarmed Haitian-American, in 2000, the mayor improperly released Dorismond's juvenile arrest record, bizarrely said that an earlier argument between Dorismond and his girlfriend might have been a factor in his death and refused to express sympathy to his family. Giuliani later apologized. The same year, he used a press conference to inform his second wife, Donna Hanover, that he wanted a divorce. (She responded with her own announcement that her husband had been having an affair with an aide for "several years.")

A Giuliani campaign spokesperson, Katie Levinson, says his temperament is a plus: "Rudy is a straight shooter." But will a less flattering version of the personality issue be used against him in debates? Says an aide to one rival, insisting on anonymity for himself and his candidate: "You just have to wait and watch."

Democrats Accelerate Effort To Aid Johnson (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

In what may be the strongest signal yet that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) will run for re-election in 2008, at least seven of his Democratic Senate colleagues are organizing big-ticket fundraisers in the coming weeks to help him fill his campaign coffers as he continues to recover from emergency brain surgery.

Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman and Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) and five other prominent Democratic Senators are hosting the D.C. events that begin Wednesday and run through March. Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) is organizing the Wednesday fundraiser in a private office at 101 Constitution Ave. NW, with Reid holding an event on Thursday at a private home on Capitol Hill.

“A number of Senators are holding fundraisers for Tim,” said Drey Samuelson, Johnson’s chief of staff. “We’ve been really touched by the outpouring of support from different Senators.”

Johnson continues to recover at The George Washington University Hospital, where he has been undergoing rehabilitation since suffering a brain hemorrhage on Dec. 13. The South Dakota Democrat is making major strides, and sources say he possibly could return to work part-time in the coming months.

In a statement from Johnson’s office Friday afternoon, Philip Marion, medical director for the Department of Rehabilitative Medicine at George Washington University Hospital, said Johnson “is actively making decisions about his health care and expressing his opinions about his daily activities. He continues to initiate more conversations and questions. His therapy now includes computer exercises and problem-solving activities.”

Samuelson said those close to the Senator are “encouraged by his recovery” and by the level of support shown by his fellow Senate Democrats for a possible 2008 campaign. Samuelson said Johnson’s staff has done little to solicit the financial help from Senators; rather, “most of them have offered on their own.”

“We are excited about the prospect of him running again, and we are doing everything we can so if he chooses to do that, he will be in an excellent position to do so,” Samuelson said. “We’ve gotten calls from different folks who said, ‘Anything we can to do to help, we’re happy to host a fundraiser for you.’”

A Democratic operative with ties to South Dakota politics said the upcoming rash of Johnson fundraisers is a clear indicator that he is preparing to run for re-election and that he understands he cannot afford to waste any time filling his campaign accounts. “This is essentially what Tim would be doing himself if he were able to,” the source said. “It is absolutely right to view this as a pretty strong signal to everyone that he is operating under the assumption he’s running for re-election.”

Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.) kicked off the Johnson fundraising efforts earlier this month when he created a joint fundraising committee to allow him to raise money for his own re-election campaign while simultaneously collecting funds for his Midwestern Democratic colleague.

Baucus also is one of the seven Senators who will host an event on Johnson's behalf in the coming weeks. The Montana Democrat is planning a luncheon on March 12 at The Monocle Restaurant to raise money for the two Senators' joint fundraising committee, asking $5,000 per host, $2,500 per political action committee and $1,000 per person.

"Everyone who has ever met Tim Johnson knows what a great person and a national leader he is," said Baucus' top aide, Jim Messina. "True friends help when their friends need it, and Tim needs it."

Indeed, Johnson could use the financial boost from his allies. As of Dec. 31, Johnson had just $629,000 in the bank — a relatively small sum in a state that easily could tilt to a Republican next cycle.

So far, no one has stepped in to challenge Johnson, but some well-known candidates could emerge, including Republican Gov. Mike Rounds. Rounds is almost a sure bet to run if Johnson opts out of a re-election bid, but the GOP governor's candidacy is less clear if Johnson enters the race. On the Democratic side, Rep. Stephanie Herseth is a likely and formidable candidate if Johnson decides to sit it out.

Regardless, Democratic Senators clearly don't want to take any chances, especially as they look to increase their narrow 51-49 seat hold on the Senate in 2008. In addition to the upcoming events hosted by Conrad, Reid, Schumer and Baucus, Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Evan Bayh (Ind.) and Edward Kennedy (Mass.) also are putting together Johnson fundraisers.

"We are putting our full support behind Senator Tim Johnson and are urging senators and others to support his reelection bid," Schumer said in a statement.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Reid, said his boss has made it clear he will do whatever is necessary to help Johnson as he recovers. "Everyone is extremely pleased with the fact that Sen. Johnson is progressing so well, and while he's still away they are happy to do everything possible to make sure he can run a vigorous campaign when he returns."

K Street Democrats said they will rally to the cause. "I think there is a strong level of support for Sen. Johnson, and people respect and appreciate his colleagues' efforts to be helpful," said Bruce Andrews, a Democratic lobbyist with Quinn Gillespie & Associates.

Paul Equale, a Democratic consultant, said he will attend the Conrad event that will kick off the series of fundraisers. "There is a vast wellspring of affection for Tim Johnson in the Washington community," he said.

For Democrats, Time To Pad Senate Majority And Think 60 Seats (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

Democrats probably don't have to worry about losing their Senate majority in 2008, but that doesn't mean next year's elections aren't crucial for them.

A strong '08 could put the party in sight of a 60-seat majority in 2010, and that filibuster-proof majority would change the rules of the game on Capitol Hill.

Last year, Democrats won a stunning 24 of 33 races, which means over the next two Senate cycles they will need to win another 36 seats, out of the 67 that will be up, to give them the magic number of 60. Given the small Democratic classes next year (12) and in 2010 (15), and the fact that Republicans will be defending a total of 40 seats over the two cycles, it's certainly possible that Democrats can net nine seats to get to 60.

Sixty-seat majorities are possible only when a party has a mega-year that produces a huge class. The Republicans did that in 2002 and put themselves in reach of 60 seats with a good 2004. But last year was a disaster, and now it is the Democrats who have a mathematical chance to hit the all-important 60-seat mark. But first, they must build on their numbers next year.

Five or six of the GOP's 21 Senate seats up next year already look to be at some risk, and that number could grow if there are key retirements and if President Bush's problems continue to drag down Republican Party numbers.

Colorado topped the list of vulnerable '08 Senate seats even before Sen. Wayne Allard (R) announced that he would not seek re-election. Democratic Rep. Mark Udall already had signaled he would run for the Senate, and it is far from clear whether Republican chances of holding the Colorado seat have been hurt or improved by Allard's decision.

Udall's appeal, combined with Colorado's recent Democratic drift and the GOP's current national dilemma, certainly improves Democrats' chances of picking up the Senate seat.

Another Democratic Representative, Maine's Tom Allen, also is heading for a Senate race, and his challenge of incumbent Republican Sen. Susan Collins immediately makes the race a top-tier contest. Collins is always underestimated, and she begins her reelection bid well-liked, but the state's Democratic bent, Allen's assets and the Republican Party's current standing mean that Collins will have a tough race.

At least three GOP Senators in competitive or Democratic-leaning states also could have tough races, depending on Democratic recruitment efforts.

Minnesota Sen. Norm Coleman seems certain to draw a serious challenger, while Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith can't take his re-election for granted. Both Republicans have started to criticize Bush's Iraq policy, but they represent states that went for Democratic Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race and that could well go Democratic again in 2008.

New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu (R) also could have a very tough fight for a second term. He won narrowly in 2002, and his party took an absolute bath in the state in 2006, losing two House seats and getting swept out of both chambers of the state Legislature.

Other Republicans look to be in relatively good shape for re-election — if they seek it. And that could be the National Republican Senatorial Committee's problem.

At least a few Republican Senators up next year will remain on everyone's retirement watch list, and while all of them eventually may seek (and win) re-election, for now NRSC Chairman John Ensign (Nev.) has to be worrying at least a bit about their decisions.

The names on this list include Sens. John Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Thad Cochran (Miss.) and Elizabeth Dole (N.C.).

Savvy Republican observers agree that this cycle is a "very challenging" one for the GOP, given the numbers of Republican and Democratic seats up and the current national political environment, which would slow GOP candidate recruitment and hurt committee fundraising.

But they also know that election cycles have a way of changing dramatically over two years, and it's possible that the picture could be brighter for the GOP 18 months from now when it comes to the 2008 elections.

Right now, Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu is the most vulnerable Democratic Senator up next year, but other Democratic Senate seats could become competitive depending on retirements and Republican recruiting.

Still, given the recent electoral performance of states with Democratic-held seats up in 2008 — including Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Michigan and Rhode Island — it is hard to see Republicans seriously contesting more than a few of those seats. So the most likely Republican scenario for winning back the Senate is to retain all of the GOP seats, knock off Landrieu and win the White House again, giving them a tie in the Senate and control with the vice president breaking the tie.

Talking about a Democratic super-majority in the Senate in 2010 may seem odd and premature, and it is. The 2008 presidential results and unknowable events over the next few years could change the political equation completely, denying Democrats an opportunity to keep their majority, let alone grow it to 60. But given the makeup of the three Senate classes, party strategists would be foolish not to be thinking about the arithmetic even now.

Lawmakers Hold 'Tele-town Hall Meetings' (USAT/AP)

By Sam Hananel

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — On a recent weeknight, Kansas Rep. Jerry Moran spoke to nearly 10,000 of his constituents at once — from the comfort of his Capitol Hill office.

Technology that can connect thousands of people on a single phone call is letting Moran and other members of Congress connect with voters like never before.

"I'm not trying to replace the time I spend in Kansas," said Moran, a Republican. "But this kind of technology allows me to tie my district together in a way that 69 individual town hall meetings does not."

A "tele-town hall meeting" lets lawmakers call up to 35,000 households in their district at random by using a special automated dialing system. A recorded voice tells those who answer to stay on the line if they want to participate in the meeting.

More than 50 members of Congress, including a few senators, have tried the technology over the past year, said Rodney Smith, founder of Washington, D.C.-based Tele-Town Hall LLC.

"It's like listening to a party line," Smith said. "People very much enjoy the interaction, the fact that a congressman would call them, the fact that they get a chance to ask a question."

Between 200 and 1,000 constituents stay on for an extended portion of a typical call. Thousands more drift on and off the line as the system dials 6,000 numbers per minute. As many as 12,000 people can be on the line at one time.

Listeners can participate too. Press the pound key and you can get in line to ask a question. A lawmaker can also poll the audience on a topic and listeners can press numbers to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0130248

"The technology is terrific because it allows me to have conversations with constituents in a way that, prior to this, was simply impossible," said Rep. John Kline, R-Minn. He has held eight tele-town hall meetings since hearing about the concept from Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., who was the first lawmaker to try the service.

The lawmaker conducting the call can track the names and addresses of everyone lining up to ask questions on a computer screen through a special website.

About a half hour into Moran's most recent tele-town hall meeting, the screen shows 946 households on the call and 230 waiting to ask a question. He sounds like a radio talk show host as he scrolls through the list of those who want to talk, looking for a sampling of residents from different parts of his district.

"Let's go to Hutchinson, is this a caller from Hutchinson?" Moran asks.

He has asked his listeners to let him know what they think about President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq. The computer screen keeps a running total of those who have pressed the number one for yes and two for no. By the end of the call, the tally is 479 in favor and 298 against.

Tele-Town Hall founder Smith, a former political fundraiser, said he first tried the concept 10 years ago, but at that time the phone system could not handle the call volume. Today, he has 22 computers located at strategic sites in New York City and Las Vegas that can handle more than one meeting at a time.

The service has a patent pending and Smith just finished a business plan to see if he can get outside financing to help boost his customer base.

The service costs $2,500 for the first 25,000 answered calls, those either picked up by a live person, or go to an answering machine or voice mail. Lawmakers pay for the service with the same funds used to set up local town hall meetings.

At one of those usual get-togethers in his suburban Minneapolis district, Kline said he can expect between 25 and 100 people to show up. The chance to draw thousands of constituents without having to advertise lets lawmakers broaden their reach beyond political activists and interest groups that can dominate local meetings, he said.

"You get to hear things from people who probably wouldn't pack up and head down on a winter night in Minnesota to come to a town hall meeting, but they will sit in their kitchen and happily participate," Kline said.

Moran, whose district covers 69 counties over more than 55,000 square miles, said he likes how the tele-town hall can bring people together from all over the state.

Residents in Liberal, Kan., in the southeast corner of the state, can hear what people from Sabetha, in the far northeast corner have to say.

At the end of the meeting, anyone who stays on the line can leave a voice mail with comments that will later be e-mailed to Moran's office as audio files. His staff will listen to every message and respond with an e-mail or follow-up phone call.

Not everyone is impressed by the new technology.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, guessed that most of the callers who stay on the line are more politically active than those who drop off.

"It's not a revolution," Gans said. "As it takes hold and people talk about it, it may bring in people beyond the activist community, but that hasn't been proved yet."

Taming The Deficit, Together (NYT)

By Bill Frenzel, Charles Stenholm, William Hoagland And Isabel Sawhill

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WITH the new Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush finally talking about fiscal responsibility and the 2008 primary season about to begin, finding common ground between Democrats and Republicans on budget issues could not be more important. We are borrowing large sums from foreigners, leaving a legacy of debt, paying more than $1,600 per family in taxes just to cover the interest on the debt, and setting aside nothing to deal with future contingencies or investments.

True, last year's deficit of $248 billion, at 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, was not large by historical standards, and next year's may be even smaller. But a failure to deal with deficits and overall debt sends the message that we have no plan for the sea of red ink that will engulf the nation when the baby boomers begin to retire next year.

With this in mind, the four of us propose a balanced package of spending cuts and revenue increases that could eliminate the deficit in five years and set the nation on a sustainable course for the long term. None of us agrees with every part of this proposal, but we think as a whole it works as a model for compromise. More important, it demonstrates how people of good will from both parties can come together to produce a package that not only curtails deficits but also greatly improves the long-term fiscal outlook.

On spending, we would put a hard cap on all appropriations that freezes spending at fiscal 2008 levels. This would allow one federal program's financing to increase only if another program's budget were cut. We also propose accelerating the increase in the retirement age to 67 from 66, improving the way Social Security benefits are indexed for inflation and making other modest adjustments in the major entitlement programs.

These cuts to spending, however, would save only about half of the money needed to balance the budget in 2013. Further spending reductions are unlikely to garner much Congressional support and could even compromise national security. To make up the balance we propose to increase revenues — not by raising income tax rates but by dealing with some of the flaws in the current tax system.

The major reform would be to broaden and simplify the tax base by turning almost all itemized deductions into 15 percent credits against taxes. We would also place a cap on how much of employer-paid health insurance premiums could be excluded from taxes.

To increase energy security and reduce global warming, we would impose a carbon fee or tax on energy producers of $15 per metric ton of carbon emissions, phased in over a three-year interval, which could raise about $35 billion a year. This fee could be collected by auctioning off permits to private companies under a cap-and-trade system, or levied as a direct tax on the businesses (which in turn, of course, would pass costs along to consumers).

We must also collect more of the taxes already owed. The Internal Revenue Service recently did an audit analysis of the tax year 2001, and found a gap between what was owed and what was remitted of at least $290 billion.

Finally, we suggest reforming the alternative minimum tax, probably through adjusting the way it is pegged to inflation; as it is, too many middle- and upper-middle-class families will find their taxes rising in the next few years because of the tax. The resulting shortfall in revenues would be made up for by continuing to tax the very small number of estates worth more than $7 million per couple.

In all, our plan would give the nation a fiscal-responsibility dividend of $57 billion per year over five years, the interest saved on the debt. Some of this money would be put toward deficit reduction, but the remainder could be invested in high-priority programs like early childhood education, combating terrorism around the globe and state-based children's health insurance programs.

Of course, reining in the deficit is only part of the challenge. To chip away at the national debt and sustain a healthy fiscal outlook into the deep future, fundamental reform of Social Security and Medicare will be needed, and everything will have to be on the table. On Social Security, for example, lifting or removing the cap on payroll taxes, indexing benefits for our increased longevity, and slowing the growth of payments to wealthier retirees would go a long way toward improving its solvency.

Festering deficits, a poorly designed tax system, an addiction to oil and uncontrolled entitlement spending are all symptoms of what is wrong with our current politics. Those jockeying for position in the 2008 presidential race should emphasize that deficits matter, that bipartisan solutions are needed and that it is possible to make fiscal progress while improving the tax system, health care and energy security. More specifically, they should promise to eliminate the deficit within five years and to set the budget on a sustainable trajectory for the longer term. Our package shows that it can be done.

800,000 Uninsured (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Helping them is a worthy goal -- but worthy compared to what?

IN A RICH STATE such as Maryland, the presence of 800,000 people without medical insurance is an embarrassment and a burden on state finances. But a $600 million proposal in the House of Delegates, which would double the cigarette tax to $2 a pack and extend coverage to nearly a third of the uninsured, raises an ever-larger question: How is Maryland to tackle projected annual deficits of well over $1 billion starting next year? And when it comes to health insurance, what can the state afford?

Backers of the health plan in the House, including Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), argue their case in moral terms, not without justification. They point out that cigarette-related diseases account for a sixth of the deaths in the state; that those covered by insurance pay an extra $1,000 on their premiums a year to compensate for the uninsured; that middle-class and well-to-do individuals and families should be required to buy coverage.

The bill they have proposed would expand Medicaid eligibility, extend subsidies to small businesses to help them provide insurance to their workers, and force families in the middle class and above to buy insurance if they don't have it. Doubling the cigarette tax and expanding Medicaid would not only leverage matching funds from the federal government but also cut the rate of smoking. All worthy goals.

But worthy compared with what? Like it or not, that's the debate that lawmakers need to have now, before it is forced on them by next year's projected budget shortfalls. Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) contends that any new revenue, including a cigarette tax, should be used to help eliminate the deficit, as the law requires. Mr. Miller has a not-so-hidden agenda -- he is prepared to hold any initiative hostage to his perennial goal of expanding slot machine gambling -- but that does not negate the logic of his argument.

Thanks to a robust economy and a runaway housing market, Maryland has had the luxury for several years of ignoring the gathering budgetary storm. But it can no longer consider spending and revenue proposals piecemeal without looking at the deficits and to competing priorities. Expanding health coverage is important; so are improvements to the transportation network, and to public schools, and to higher education, and to juvenile detention facilities, and to the Chesapeake Bay. It's time for a comprehensive debate that addresses health care and much more.

Now She Tells Us (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

After hiding her intentions during last year's campaign, Connecticut Governor M. Jodi Rell wants to thank constituents for electing her with 63% of the vote by socking them with a 10% hike in the personal income tax rate. Fellow Republicans in the state legislature are understandably scratching their heads. But the proposal has no doubt also left many taxpayers wondering why they even bother to pull the lever for Republicans.

Ms. Rell dropped this bombshell last week when she presented her biennial budget. In addition to the income tax increase, which would push the top marginal rate to 5.5% from the current 5% over two years, the Governor also proposes increasing cigarette taxes, hiking bus fares and phasing out a $500 property tax credit.

Democrats, who control both houses of the legislature, welcome the plan. So does much of the state's liberal media, who are hailing Ms. Rell as "brave" and "courageous." But as Susan Kniep of the Federation of Connecticut Taxpayer Organizations put it to the Associated Press, "Gee, why didn't we kind of hear about this before we went into the polls?"

Governor Rell says a tax increase is necessary to fund more education spending. But Connecticut already spends more money per student on public schools than all but three states. According to the latest Census data, which is from the 2004 school year, Connecticut's per-pupil spending is $10,788, or more than 30% above the national average of $8,287. In such urban districts as New Haven and Hartford, the state is spending well over $13,000 per student, and the state's teachers are among the highest paid in the nation.

All of which suggests that Connecticut's problem isn't too little education spending so much as how current expenditures are being used. For instance, public charter schools in the state, such as New Haven's Amistad Academy and Bridgeport's Bridge Academy, spend thousands of dollars less per-pupil than surrounding traditional public schools. Yet student test scores in math and reading far surpass those of neighboring schools and often match the scores of students in wealthier towns such as Greenwich. Perhaps money isn't what really matters in education achievement.

The larger danger of a tax increase is its impact on the state's overall economy. Connecticut adopted its income tax in 1991, and it has since ranked last nationally in employment growth while losing tens of thousands of people to other states. Increasing the income tax rate seems an odd way to reverse these trends.

"When looking at states that have growing economies and are thriving," said Republican state senator David Cappiello in an interview, "they're the states that either have no income tax or are looking to phase down their income tax. Connecticut is moving in the opposite direction." An income tax hike could also affect whether a small business -- such as a limited liability or Subchapter S corporation -- decides to expand or move to a more business-friendly environment.

By the way, it's not as if Connecticut taxpayers haven't been doing their part; the state will end the current fiscal year with a $600 million revenue surplus. The problem is that the politicians want to spend the money faster than it comes in. Governor Rell's budget would grow government by nearly 13% over two years and bust constitutional spending caps approved by 81% of voters back in 1992. No wonder she kept her plans secret until after the election.

America's Long Dance With The Mideast (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

The Statue of Liberty, in her curious way, helps tell the tale of America's long, complicated experiences and profoundly contradictory ambitions in the Middle East. The French sculptor Frédéric Bartholdi wanted to build a colossus bestriding the entrance to the newly opened Suez Canal in the 1870s. She would be veiled, like a peasant woman of the Nile, and would hold aloft her torch as "Egypt (or Progress) Bringing Light to Asia." But the pasha whose largesse was supposed to fund the project went bankrupt, the British occupied his country to collect their debts and Egypt's light failed. Bartholdi rethought his plan, redrew the design, and the Orient's loss was America's gain: "Liberty Enlightening the World."

DOJ_NMG_0130251

This anecdote about the statue stands near the middle of Michael Oren's vast new best seller, "Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present." It served as a metaphor for the mingled, often mirrored fates of two regions strangely bound by grandiose dreams and hardheaded commerce, conflicting beliefs in one God, mutual fears, great hopes and grim bloodshed. Because there is no other book with such a sweeping view of the subject, the vast cast of characters Oren presents and the exhaustively researched tales of the way they played on each other will shape our thinking about America and the Middle East for years. And because much of this largely unremembered past reads as prologue to the present day, the admonition of Ecclesiastes that "there is no new thing under the sun" seems to emerge constantly from between the lines.

Thus one of the first great tests for the newly formed United States of America was a decades-long confrontation with the Arab corsairs of North Africa. In the aftermath of independence, the American central government was weak, the Navy almost nonexistent, and debate raged at the highest levels—between Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, among others. Should the United States pay ransoms to the pirates (which was cheaper) or build a military strong enough to prevent them from preying on merchantmen that flew the Stars and Stripes? The young American nation would learn "that in the Middle East power alone was respected and that, in order to gain peace, the United States had no alternative but to wield it," Oren writes—a theme he underscores at several opportunities. But his narrative is also honest enough to show us that the feckless leaders of North Africa became convenient scapegoats once the United States finally had its Navy. Thus after the British returned to American shores in 1812 and burned Washington, D.C., the American public turned its anger against ... the Arabs. In 1815, scant months after a stalemated peace was signed with Britain, Washington shifted its attention to the Barbary pirates, declared war, and defeated them with great fanfare.

But of course problems in the Middle East seem to endure like the Pyramids. Almost 90 years later, President Teddy Roosevelt would once again send gunboats to the North African coast, this time to win the freedom of an American businessman named Ion Pedicaris, who was held by a local Berber chieftain known as Raisuli. Roosevelt sent the bluntest possible warning to the sultan in Tangiers: we want Pedicaris alive or Raisuli dead. The hostage was freed. American pride and power were preserved once again.

It wasn't just the projection of military might that characterized America's interaction with the Middle East, it was also the projection of missionary zeal—the faith that Oren talks about in the title of his book. From the time of the Puritans, American Christians had seen the New World as a New Zion or Promised Land, "a light unto the nations." But by the early 19th century, there was growing enthusiasm for expeditions to the original Zion. Indeed, Palestine in the 1840s was viewed by some Americans as part of their self-proclaimed "manifest destiny." And a large part of their zeal sprang from the notion that restoring the Jews to the Holy Land, and converting them to Christianity, would bring on the Second Coming. This "restorationism," or Christian Zionism, was a powerful force in 19th-century America—just as it is in the 21st-century United States.

As if the sense of déjà vu were not strong enough already, Oren informs us that in 1844 a Biblical scholar and professor of Hebrew at New York University by the name of George Bush wrote an influential tract called "The Valley of Vision; or, The Dry Bones of Israel Revived," which advocated "elevating" the Jews "to a rank of honorable repute among the nations of the earth" by re-creating the state of Palestine for them. (According to Oren, who spent two days in the genealogical room of the Library of Congress researching family trees, George Bush was a direct forebear of the two presidents with the same name, both of whom made a major impact on the Middle East.) For Oren, questions of Zionism, first as dreamed of by American Christians and then as conceived and implemented by 20th-century Jews, are absolutely central to the story of U.S. involvement in the Middle East.

Oren's account of President Truman's role in the creation of Israel is one of the most complex and compelling chapters of the book. Here was an American leader who fiercely resisted the lobbying of American Zionists. "The Jews, I find are very, very selfish," Truman ranted in his diary, "neither Hitler nor Stalin has anything on them for cruelty or mistreatment to the under dog." Yet when the final decision had to be made, Truman's government was the first in the world to recognize the Jewish state. His reasons were political (he noted that he had few Arab constituents) and moral (the Holocaust weighed more heavily on his mind than the fear of Arab retaliation in the oil market). And the president's Baptist background gave him an intimate sense of Biblical history. By the 1950s, Oren writes, Americans had "transformed themselves from largely passive observers of Middle Eastern affairs into the region's primary architects and arbiters."

Oren, who has four degrees in Arab history and the best-selling "Six Days of War" to his credit, is himself an ardent Zionist. Born in New Jersey 51 years ago, he immigrated to Israel as a young man and has served as a reserve officer in the Israeli military ever since, now with the rank of major. In 1982, he was on the front with Lebanon and took part in the invasion. Also in the 1980s, he worked underground in the Soviet Union making contact with dissident Jews. More recently, he served in last summer's war against Hizbullah. Oren often contributes passionate op-ed pieces to The Wall Street Journal and other publications defending Israel and its policies. He says writing "Power, Faith and Fantasy" was partly meant to bring together the two halves of his identity, American and Israeli, and he admits that balanced historical reporting doesn't come easy. "If you want to understand how we got from point A to point Z and point A is 1776 and Z is Iraq, indulging your prejudices is not very helpful," Oren told NEWSWEEK. "It's something I struggle with. I weigh every word." Indeed, for all his emphasis on showing strength in the Middle East, Oren publicly opposed the American invasion of Iraq, arguing the United States could never be, and probably should never be, ruthless enough to suppress rebellion there. And for all his emphasis on the spiritual virtues of the United States, he sees calls for U.S.-style democracy in the Arab world as naive. Its culture is not, he says, a tarnished mirror image of America waiting to be polished into a replica of America.

What is it, then? What did the Arabs themselves think through this long chronicle of disillusionments and disasters? Oren says "that book is yet to be written." For now "Power, Faith and Fantasy" is the best history we have of the history we've had, and an indispensable guide from point A to point Z.

Gates Brushes Aside Putin's Anti-US Tirade (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Stephen Fidle

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Robert Gates, the US defence secretary, on Sunday brushed aside a blistering attack on US foreign policy by Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, saying that "one cold war was quite enough".

Mr Putin lambasted US foreign policy in a theatrical display at a high-profile Munich security conference on Saturday, saying "illegal" unilateral military action had plunged the world into an "abyss of permanent conflicts".

In his first major international speech since succeeding Donald Rumsfeld in December, Mr Gates avoided upping the ante with the former KGB officer by laughing off his polemic.

"As an old cold warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time," said Mr Gates. "Almost."

The former head of the Central Intelligence Agency continued: "I guess, old spies have a habit of blunt speaking. However, I have been to re-education camp, spending four and-[a]-half years as a university president and dealing with faculty. And, as more than a few university presidents have learned in recent years, when it comes to faculty it is either 'be nice' or 'be gone'."

Mr Gates, who said he had accepted an offer from Mr Putin to visit Russia, dismissed suggestions of a new cold war. But he did register US displeasure with Russian foreign policy, including its use of energy resources for "political coercion".

Mr Putin had also accused Washington of sparking a new arms race with its missile defence system, and criticised the expansion of Nato to include former members of the Soviet Union.

Mr Putin's speech at the normally august conference drew surprise and criticism. Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato's secretary-general, expressed disappointment that the Russian president had made such a "remarkable" speech at such a venue.

US senator Lindsey Graham half-joked that Mr Putin had done "more in a single speech to unite Europe and America than anything we could have done in a decade", while Senator John McCain said the speech included the "most aggressive remarks by a Russian leader since the end of the cold war".

But Karel Schwarzenberg, the Czech Republic foreign minister, drew loud applause – and a smile on the face of Russian defence minister Sergei Ivanov – by thanking Mr Putin for bringing attention to the normally sleepier conference. In a more serious vein, however, he said the Russian president had "clearly and convincingly" shown why Nato should be enlarged.

Mr Ivanov agreed on Sunday that a new cold war was not imminent. He said Russia was spending just 2.6 per cent of GDP on defence. "We are not spending on defence what the Soviet Union did – which was 30 per cent. Three per cent: feel the difference," he said.

Speaking to an audience that included defence ministers from many Nato countries, Mr Gates also stressed the importance of resolve in Afghanistan, saying the alliance needed to ensure the "offensive in Afghanistan this spring will be our offensive".

In comments intended to up the pressure on European allies, Mr Gates said it would be a "mark of shame" if Nato let its successes in Afghanistan "slip away through neglect of lack of political will or resolve".

Responding to Kenneth Roth, the director of Human Rights Watch, Mr Gates conceded that the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay and prisoner abuses in Iraq had damaged the reputation of the US. He added that the military tribunals to try the prisoners would be "transparent", with full media access.

Gates Counters Putin's Words On U.S. Power (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

New York Times, February 12, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 11 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, disputing a lengthy critique of American power by President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Saturday, said Sunday at a European security conference here, "One cold war was quite enough."

DOJ_NMG_0130253

Government leaders, legislators and military officials here continued speculating on Mr. Putin's motivation for delivering his long list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, but Mr. Gates chose words of velvet, not steel, in offering Washington's fullest response. As Mr. Putin had, he invoked the cold war more than once.

"As an old cold warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time," he said. "Almost."

Mr. Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency called back to government service from academia to become defense secretary, told attendees of the 43rd Munich Conference on Security Policy that both he and Mr. Putin had spent most of their careers in their governments' spy agencies.

"And, I guess, old spies have a habit of blunt speaking," Mr. Gates said. "However, I have been to re-education camp — spending four and half years as a university president and dealing with faculty." His remark drew laughs and applause.

His sharpest response to Mr. Putin was gently couched. "Russia is a partner in endeavors," Mr. Gates said. "But we wonder, too, about some Russian policies that seem to work against international stability, such as its arms transfers and its temptation to use energy resources for political coercion."

Throughout the rebuttal, and in a longer discourse on how America's European allies must help rebuild Afghanistan and remain engaged in the fight against terrorism, Mr. Gates mentioned Mr. Putin only once by name. That came when he said he had accepted an invitation from Mr. Putin to visit Moscow.

On Saturday, Russia's defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, a Putin confidant, denied that Mr. Putin's speech had been confrontational. "We are not interested in imposing our opinion on anybody," Mr. Ivanov said. But he cautioned that his government would not support international actions taken without consultation with Russia, nor those taken without its consent, and certainly none that are "imposed on Russia."

The speech by Mr. Gates was delivered under the long shadow of his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who both charmed and offended European audiences during his tenure as defense secretary, which included several speeches to this conference.

Mr. Gates cast himself as a geopolitical realist and drew a knowing laugh when he focused on Mr. Putin's assertion that the United States and its allies were dividing Europe.

"All of these characterizations belong in the past," Mr. Gates said. "The free world versus those behind the Iron Curtain. North versus South. East versus West, and I am told that some have even spoken in terms of 'Old Europe' versus 'new.' "
